Many pages later we are told "the General had at 9 a.m. detailed a flying column to move out and make an effort to intercept the routed enemy." Move your red flag again one-eighth of an inch, but if you could only have seen that flying column!—the faces pallid and hollow, every bone visible through the skin, legs bent on the march or at the halt like a broken-kneed cab-horse's, uniforms torn and black, trousers patched with socks, feet bare. The men clung to their rifles with both arms, or carried them as women carry babies. Every few minutes they halted to rest. Every hundred yards one fell down or dragged himself on all fours into the rocks. The artillery horses that had been kept alive struggled feebly up the road, tugging at the chains. From every side arose the stupefying smell of horses that had cheated the soup cauldrons by starvation. As you passed a man, a faint odour of perfumery told you he had been enjoying condensed horse flavoured with hair-oil in a hospital. Doubled together with dysentery, twisted with rheumatism, green with hunger, so the flying column crawled out to intercept the routed enemy.

In May 44,000 men and 203 guns were disposable for the advance to Pretoria, and we read that "on the 27th the main body crossed the Vaal." For a military history that is quite sufficient. But the words call up a vision of the ten miles of loose sand over which the heavy guns and supply waggons had to be dragged before the river was reached, where the main body crossed in just a line of print. Was more suffering ever crowded into so short a space? Ten years' bull-fighting in Spain could not made up its sum. Sixteen oxen went to a load, and twenty-two for the big guns. Knee-deep in sand they ploughed their way, the wheels often hidden to the axle. In front a Kaffir guided the span, another held the ropes upon the waggon, a third walked at the side with an enormous raw-hide whip. All yelled and screamed in the peculiar language oxen best understand. If a waggon stuck, all the Kaffirs around stood by with their whips and lashed the living hides into great lines and gashes. The oxen bellowed and groaned, writhing backwards and forwards, trying in vain to tear themselves from the yokes and the heavy chain which runs down the centre of a span. Many rolled over dead of pain and terror; many lay down and let man do his worst. These were shot or poleaxed, and others took their places. But usually, when torture reached a certain pitch, the waggon moved, the purpose of strategy was accomplished, and the main body crossed the Vaal.

Since the beginning of wars it has been the same. We talk easily of Sennacherib's hosts and Persian invasions, of Alexander on the Indus, Hannibal over the Alps, or Cæsar in Gaul. We hear about hordes of Huns and Goths and Tartars, Turkish conquests, Marlborough victories, Napoleonic campaigns. Vast bodies of men are dimly seen moving like patches of cloud upon the blue. Sometimes, as in Mr. Hardy's "Dynasts," "the invisible presence of the countless thousands of massed humanity makes itself felt indefinably." Sometimes, as at the lifting of a fog, we perceive the vanished armies of the past vaguely running to and fro like hardly perceptible insects on a leaf. We classify the items, we group them into abstractions, and play their disposable forces like a draught-board game. Strategy must be studied that mankind may fight again, and military studies must be succinct. The movements of men trying to kill each other will still be operations, and the killed and wounded still be totted up as casualties. But behind this veil of useful words the "Spirit of the Pities," standing beside the "Spirit of the Years," realises that the background of all wars is the same. There go the lines of animals, dragging and carrying, strained, tortured, and slain for purposes they cannot conceive; and there stand the living men, the souls that are added up in columns of "strengths and casualties." They are hungry and thirsty; they are sick with pain. At night their little fires are kindled, and they jest about the rations. They sleep with their faces to the stars, but before the stars are pale they are roused again and given hot drink and a piece of bread to hearten them for the work now coming. This life on earth is their one sure and certain existence; most of them like something or other, some are in love with at least one woman, not a man among them wishes to be a casualty before evening. But they are going into action, the order to fall in comes; they take a last gulp, utter a last curse, snatch up the rifle, and hurry away with the rest; for the strength of an army, like the power in mechanics, is estimated by multiplying the mass by the rapidity.

MEN AGAINST SPORTSMEN.

The work of the present Parliament is very largely directed towards getting back for the common people of this country some of the elementary liberties which they have lost. It is in this light that the debate in the House of Commons on Mr. Trevelyan's Bill, to secure the right of free access to uncultivated mountain and moorland, deserves serious consideration. Sir Walter Scott invoked dire poetic penalties upon the returning voyager whose soul failed to thrill with the feeling, "This is my own, my native land." But this sentiment is not generated in the void, and cannot live without sustenance. It is not essential to the love of country that every man shall own or work a piece of land as his private property. But it is essential that, as a child, he shall grow up with some fixed sense of home, some gathering of memories round a spot of land, even though it be in a suburban street, and that, as child or man, he shall enjoy the liberty of wandering innocently in such wild and beautiful country as is within his reach. There is grave danger lest to large masses of our people their "native land" should become an unmeaning phrase. Born in a country almost wholly parcelled out to a little group of proprietors, they have no right of settlement for work or home. On the high roads and such fragments of public land as remain they are not allowed to loiter or camp out. Save where they have made a precarious and costly bargain with some owner of their native land, they are living in a constant state of trespass.

There were members who feigned to treat Mr. Trevelyan's Bill as a sentimental grievance of trifling dimensions. But in truth it is a phase of an exceedingly grave antagonism in our modern life. It is often stated, perhaps truly, that country-bred folk do not consciously enjoy the beauties of scenery, and that they have little curiosity about the treasure-house of Nature. Possibly it requires a generation of town dwelling to bring out into consciousness these latent capacities of interest and pleasure. Whether this be so or not, we know no more striking vindication of the city civilisation, which now absorbs about three-quarters of our population, than the innumerable signs of a genuine and even a passionate love of scenery and quiet country recreations that are everywhere visible. The stress of city work and life demands such relief; our growing wealth allows ampler holidays further afield for large sections of our workers; cheaper and fuller facilities of movement by rail or cycle furnish the opportunity to make a real and living acquaintance with what is imposing, beautiful, or interesting in their native land. The health, the recreation, the education of our people demand this measure of liberty. It is a requirement of civilisation in the strictest sense.

But over against this growing, wholesome need of the people stands a selfish theory of ownership. We will not here revert to the familiar story of the enclosures of the commons and wastes which in the recent past have furnished the largest encroachment by private ownership on popular access to and use of lands. It must suffice to remind readers who may imagine that the policy and the spirit which it contains belong to the dead past, that the very class whose sense of the rights of their own property and liberty is keenest are still persistent in curtailing the landed rights and liberties of the people, whenever these interfere with their own convenience or pleasures. Enclosure, or in other words land-stealing, is still carried on in a necessarily restricted shape, for there is so little left to take, and nothing but the closest vigilance prevents the constant stoppings of public footpaths. But the most serious encroachments are of a different order. The civilising influences which free access to mountains and moorlands and the beauty and sacredness of nature can exercise, are subject to new irruptions of barbarism in the shape of organised exclusive sports. Though political considerations obviously tempered the language of the other night's debate, the real issue presented was that of the right of a privileged possessing few to cancel in the name of sport the few lingering remnants of rights in their country left by law or usage to the body of the people. Sir Thomas More complained four centuries ago that men had been ousted from the land to make way for sheep: this he regarded as an outrage of selfish land-owning industrialism. Now, it appears, sheep must give place to deer and grouse, industrialism to the new barbarism. It is true that the owners of these great Scottish tracts which thus revert are prompted by no uncommercial instincts. For we learn from Mr. Mason, and the statement deserves pondering, that an estate which formerly fetched £700 rent for sheep rearing fetches £3,000 as a deer forest, and that other instances bear out this same rental economy. In other words, it is within the power of a little handful of men, some of them foreigners, to convert at their will large sections of our "native land" from farms growing food with peasant labor into vast pleasure grounds for a few rich men to kill half-tame birds and deer, made up for them by retainers and caretakers. Is there no sense of shame and of peril accompanying the placid admission of a speaker in the Commons debate that "the sporting value of Scotland is one of its greatest present assets"?

But it is not with Scotland alone we are concerned; it is with the wider spirit of exclusion which, in England as well, denies to the common people the use and enjoyment of nature, and, in a dozen different ways, sets sporting rights above the rights of man. If it is monstrous that the glorious beauty of the Trossachs or of Lakeland should be denied to the artist, the naturalist, or the simple pleasure seeker for fear some "sanctuary" of game should be desecrated, it is not less monstrous that commons within a few miles of London should become preserves of small clubs of golfers, or that the main high roads should be virtually annexed by supermen in motor cars. Indeed, nothing can better illustrate the attitude of the sportsman to the simple pleasures of the poor than one of the "arguments" against Mr. Trevelyan's Bill adduced by Lord Willoughby d'Eresby, who urged that, if the people were permitted to walk freely even upon such commons, there was "nothing to prevent them sitting down on a golf green." Many hard things were said about tourists and vulgar trippers by gentlemen whose purses enable them to travel expensively and exclusively: and it appeared to be held a positive grievance that modern facilities of travel should enable a large number of persons to seek their profit or enjoyment of scenery in company.

Though the very conciliatory manners of the promoters of the Bill carried the sense of the House of Commons, its fate, if it enters the other House, may well be precarious. On our part, we deprecate undue timidity in handling a crucial question of popular rights. There is something really ignominious at this time of day in Radical members of Parliament having thus humbly to plead for liberty for the people who live in the vicinity of mountains, moors, and streams, or who visit them as travellers, to get what good they can for their souls and bodies out of the free gifts of nature. Nor are we particularly favourable to the notion of compromising these rights of access by some niggling policy of public preserves in special beauty spots. This, in our judgment, is an unworthy remedy for a grave and growing grievance. Where no injury is threatened to the industrial use of land, or to any reasonable privacy of occupation, we see no grounds for landowners being permitted to refuse access to their lands or waters to peaceable and orderly persons who wish to enjoy this liberty. A moment's scaring of a deer or of grouse does not outweigh the pleasure and profit of human beings, and it remains for a gentleman with the traditions of a Castlereagh to denounce the very moderate endeavour to assert this plain doctrine as "an invasion of the rights of property."

THE MILLINERY OF MURDER.

We wish that our modern fashionable women would bethink themselves that the savage who adorns himself with the plumage of birds and the skins of beasts has excuses which they cannot plead. The beasts are his personal enemies, and the dead birds at least attest his skilful archery. If he delights in the gay colouring of slaughtered creatures, he can plead that it is because he knows nothing of the arts which lend to rare dyes and subtle textures an element of human triumph that enhances their intrinsic beauty. The taste for these adornments disappears with the growth of a real pride in craftsmanship. It has returned in our time as an incident in the evolution of dress. The pleasure in durable hand-woven textures, in embroideries that represented the slow work of individual skill, has gone down before the organisation of labor—and this sweated labor—and the pillage of distant forests. Women compete to-day in the crowding of effects, and machinery has killed the feeling for decorations which were a proof of pleasant toil and conscious skill. The old finery, with its laces and its silks, told to the eye its tale of busy Flemish villages and opulent Indian towns. The new millinery, with its skins torn from dead herons and kingfishers, speaks too often of suffering and the waste of life. Somewhere in the process of this evolution imagination has decayed. Our grandmothers wore their exotic fabrics with a sense of their origin, a consciousness of the romance that came from the adventure in distant seas, and felt in the rare textures the touch of the dusky idolatrous fingers that had made them. The things had a place in their lives which tempted the fancy to play on the history of their making and their getting. The modern woman who wears an osprey plume or a stuffed humming-bird is manifestly thinking only of its crude visible effect.

The figures which Lord Avebury gave on Tuesday in introducing his Bill to prohibit the importation of the plumage of wild birds were a record of massacre on a gigantic scale. London has become the world's market for the sale of the bird life that fashion demands. In the last six months of 1907, 19,742 skins of birds of paradise and plumes torn from 115,000 white herons were sold by auction, and one firm alone catalogued the skins of 20,000 kingfishers. But the figures give no conception either of the cruelty or of the waste of life. The sportsman who kills for pleasure or for food respects his prey during the breeding season. The plumage-hunter, on the contrary, concentrates his depredations in the period when the birds are mating and nesting. The colours he requires for the hats of his customers are the very expression of the birds' exuberance of happiness and life. The plumes which milliners call "ospreys" or "aigrettes" are borne by the herons only during the nuptial season. The heron is then killed with ease, because its natural shyness has disappeared in its absorbing care for its young. Every plume means not merely the death of a bird, but the slow starvation of all its young, and every feather worn in a fashionable hat tells its history of a ruined nest. To the woman who wears it, ignorant or callous, it means the happy sense of conformity to a social type, and an outlay of money that marks her social status. To the spectator who watches her, it calls up the picture of a savage deed and a cruel end. Year by year the swamps and rivers where these creatures breed are growing desolate, and it can be a matter only of a decade before the species is altogether obsolete. For rare and exceptionally beautiful birds like the white heron it is easy to arouse regret. But there is no discrimination in a fashion which carries its demoralisation from stratum to stratum of society. The woman who cannot afford an osprey or a kingfisher wears half a sea bird or the wing of a swallow shot in its flight over Italy or France. There is scarcely a species which vulgarity has not laid under tribute. If the process continues it can only be ugliness which will survive, and mankind will inhabit the world which it deserves.

Lord Avebury's Bill makes a courageous attack upon a trade which stands entrenched behind a substantial wall of interest. One has only to open a newspaper to realise how powerful this interest is. The leading columns may welcome the Bill, but the fashion article on another page directs its readers where best to obtain these brutal adornments. The Bill was not opposed in the Lords, but the spokesmen of the Government expressed a semi-official reserve, and prescribed a highly dilatory procedure. It is no doubt true, as Lord Beauchamp pointed out, that the closing of the market in London would drive at least a part of the trade to Paris or Vienna. But even so, the diminution of the demand by the whole extent of the sales in this country must exert a considerable influence on the world's supply. Even a temporary disorganisation of the trade would give a respite to several harried species, and the permanent suppression of the trade in England would mean at the very least the slaughter of only three birds where four are killed to-day. It is to be hoped that the Government will use its influence, as Lord Beauchamp suggested, to bring about the prohibition of the export of skins and plumes from the countries of supply. India, some of our tropical colonies, and several States of North America, have already prohibited exportation. But these two methods of checking the trade should be complementary and not exclusive. If we shrink from injuring our own traders in dead wings by prohibiting imports, we shall exert small influence when we go to poorer nations abroad with a suggestion that they should first ruin their export trade.

This surely is a question on which any Government may dare to be bold. Public opinion is divided about vivisection; it is not even absolutely unanimous about some of the practices covered by the Spurious Sports Bill. But this use of murdered beauty for adornment has no articulate defender. There is hardly even a fashion paper base enough to advocate it outside its advertising columns. For it is the mark and criterion of an educated mind to feel a disinterested joy in a beauty which it does not thirst to own and possess. It knows that the beauty of living things is in their function and their motion. It realises that a skin, stripped though it may be with all its resplendent colouring from a still living creature, is no more than a relic of a lost beauty. The hand of the vandal who must possess what he admires destroys in the act the very thing that aroused his desire. He violates a mystery, and makes it common. He steals a life, and wins in the act only a monument to his own cruelty. An imaginative child is happy in the thought of romantic jungles and virgin forests which he will never penetrate and but dimly conceives. An educated man moves through mean streets and the squalor of civilisation with a constant vision before his eyes of past glories and beauties unravished. It is a joy to know in England that there are parrots on the Amazon, as it is solace to think in the Strand that there are wood hyacinths in Sussex. To those who have this vision of lives inviolate and glories unseen, it is an imperative duty to oppose this waste of life. Even were there no cruelty involved, the extinction of one species of birds of paradise is a vandalism as gross as the erasing of a Giorgione or the burning of the Alexandrian library. Races which have escaped the long perils of geological change must not perish in the end at the bidding of a Paris fashion. When Watts painted his angel of pity, weeping with veiled face, it was over a table strewn with dead wings and mutilated plumes.

THE CUCKOO HABIT.

The silence of a May afternoon is slightly ruffled by a series of little coughs like the whisper of a locomotive, as a shadow-grey bird slants down through the ash boughs and comes to rest on a green bank. It sits still for a few moments, turns once, then rises again and makes for a little crest where the grass grows long and dry in little brow-like dashes. A passing inspection is made as though the thought had occurred that something edible might be there, and the pointed grey wings are spread once more and the hawk-like bird passes from sight. Thus neatly and silently must the parasite do her work. Bungling or hesitation is fatal; smoothness approaching self-effacement the whole stock-in-trade of those who wish to impose on the carelessness or good nature of others. Like a perfectly oiled and mathematically adjusted machine, the hen cuckoo has done her work and the tit-lark's nest now contains that which will rob it of its other treasures and make exacting work for a pair of tiny foster parents of a monstrous chick.

The life history of the young cuckoo has been abundantly described since the time when Jenner professed to have witnessed it, confessing later that he had relied on the testimony of a paid watcher. The watcher, however, was a good observer. We have now, from several naturalists, photographs of the blind, hollow-backed nestling stooping beneath eggs or fellow chicks and heaving them from the nest, panting terribly between the instalments of its horrible task, but persisting till it has the whole nursery to itself. Not only the photographers, but many casual observers have seen the wretched foster parents feeding their monstrous charge, often having to perch upon its shoulders to reach its mouth, and so pecked by its impatient ingratitude as to be bald. Often the work wears them to death, and if this occurs before the maturity of the cuckoo, its plaintive baby cry fetches to it new nurses who undertake to feed it though the incubus has not grown upon them out of a strange mishap to a clutch of their own beautiful eggs.

Beyond the grand question, how the cuckoo habit ever came to be contracted, there is one notable link in the bird's life history still rather dim. In what way is its hawk-like appearance useful to it? Is it true that the process of introducing the egg into the nest is preceded by a taunting visit from the cock, so that the small birds absent themselves from the nest in order to chase a supposed hawk from the neighbourhood? And is there to the senses of birds some subtle difference by virtue of which the hen is less hawk-like, and so more tolerable to her intended dupes? That, at any rate, is the line of development taken by the Indian koel, the male of which resembles a crow, while the female is a poor, drab, inoffensive looking bird which slips quietly up to the nest while her dangerous-looking mate is being chased away. Other Indian cuckoos, on the other hand, succeed by virtue of their exact resemblance to the destined host, a resemblance that can never aid our only practitioner of the foisting art.

If the impish human experimenter tries the effect of putting canaries' eggs into chaffinches' nests and of exchanging the eggs of robins and wagtails, he fails in a large proportion of cases to secure adoption, while the cuckoo hardly ever fails. Every parish has its one or two chanters of the familiar and typical spring song, and few districts have more than the average share, though Sir Herbert Maxwell's sister has counted as many as fourteen at once feeding on currant moth caterpillars in her Renfrewshire garden. The wonder is, not that there are so many cuckoos but that there are not many more. If the bird lays only the five eggs of the average small bird, she has a five times better chance than any one of them of bringing four of them up. She must, in order to succeed, show not the least solicitude for the welfare of her progeny, and no cuckoo has been known to wreck the scheme by paying furtive visits to see whether the egg is still in the nest, or whether the chick has duly ejected its foster sisters. In some books the story is vaguely told that once a pair of cuckoos built a nest in England and reared their own progeny. We do not believe that such a thing occurred within the period of human history. Long before man appeared on the planet the cuckoo habit was perfected and sealed by complete callousness, and the way of return to an honester mode of life seems to be barred beyond hope. The cuckoo that took suddenly to housekeeping would make a hopeless failure of her incubation or the feeding of her progeny, and would at every stage run a far greater risk than her much-experienced neighbours of falling into the clutch of the crow, the hawk, and innumerable other dangers. Meanwhile, the rival of her own species would have her five children, heirs to the vitality acquired in an irresponsible life of vagabondage, safely boarded out with capable nurses, who could be relied upon to bring them safely up even at the cost of their own lives. And as there is evidently no half-way house between full maternity and parasitism, the cuckoos seem destined to remain cuckoos to the end of time.

The descent into cuckoodom can be shown to be just as easy as ascent out of it is difficult. Every season some one or another comes across an instance of laxness in the nesting arrangement of some bird that seems to point in this dangerous direction. It behoves every bird to maintain jealously the pride of individualism, to insist on making its own nest in its own place, building it in the time-honored way, and guarding and maintaining it as its very own. Pheasants and partridges are the worst offenders against this ideal in this country and at the present time. It is comparatively common to find a pheasant and a partridge laying their eggs in the same nest, or a French and an English partridge taking this bad reading of the entente cordiale. The subsequent history of such experiments varies. More often, the two birds sit side by side, each hatching half the combined clutch. Sometimes the birds fight for the nest, and one of them is driven away not only from the other's eggs, but from her own also.

Perhaps the original cuckoo thought to steal a march on some other bird by appropriating the nest that had been built, with the intention of rearing her own offspring therein. Then the rightful owner drove her off and hatched the cuckoo's egg as well as her own, not to her own chagrin, but that of the cuckoo. Those fond of strange speculations may consider the alternative theory —namely, that some other bird stole the nest of the cuckoo, who has been trying to get her own back ever since. We cannot ourselves entertain the suggestion. The cuckoo must have been the prime offender against avine morality. Is there any excuse for her? We find to-day that not only is the anatomy of her breast little fitted to the duties of incubation, that she is almost unique among English birds in the shape of her feet, two claws of which turn backward instead of the usual one. That may be an impediment to the craft of nest-building, though it must be remembered that the parrots, and our own woodpeckers, with similar feet make very good use of them. The zygodactylic feet may be an inheritance from more honest days; they may be the result of the young cuckoo's straining for full possession of the nest, and useful tools for that diabolic proceeding; they may be only intended as a means for making the gamekeeper look thoroughly foolish when he has shot a cuckoo in mistake for a sparrow-hawk.

Music.

THREE OPERA SINGERS.

The concert season is in full swing, and Melba has sung to the most fashionable audience of the season. Of all these concerts there is but little to say. They arouse a sense of profound sadness in thinking of the musical profession crowded with such talent, and of the barren future for it. Of concerts that remain in the memory for more than a week there are but few. Among those few are the orchestral concerts conducted by that wizard of the orchestra, Herr Arthur Nikisch, and the violin and piano recitals given by M. Eugène Ysaye and M. Raoul Pugno. Two of these sonata recitals have already taken place, and reached absolute perfection. No such playing has ever been heard in London before. With regard to the opera, the performances of "Die Walküre" and "Götterdämmerung" were satisfactory but no more, unless the orchestra under Dr. Richter be considered the chief factor in these special Wagner performances. "Tristan und Isolde," performed last Saturday, did introduce us, however, to a new soprano, Miss Edyth Walker.

The standards of musical criticism when applied to opera invariably fail because musical critics as a rule persist in their absolute musical view of music-drama. A little acting goes a very long way with them. Hence it has come about that Miss Edyth Walker's Isolde has been lauded to the skies in some quarters. She was "superb," "splendid," "magnificent," and possessed every quality for which the critics could find adjectives. Certainly Miss Edyth Walker is an intelligent and painstaking artist with a full experience of the opera stage. In the sense that acting is a series of vehement and appropriate gestures, together with obvious changes of facial expression, Miss Edyth Walker is an actress of talent, and her Isolde was a dramatic impersonation. But her gestures and facial expressions are quite on the surface. There is always this distinction to be made in criticising acting: the outward expression can be taught and resolves itself into fairly well-defined and appropriate physical movements; the inward acting springs from imagination and feeling, or from the power of making pretence of these qualities. Properly speaking, gestures and facial expression should follow the mind and be inspired by it, almost unconsciously, and to attain to that plasticity a certain amount of physical training is required. Music-drama, with its broad effects, can be carried through with the artificial, outward type of acting, it is true, and in Wagner's works there is always the orchestra to reinforce the acting of the protagonists, but the part of Isolde is in a different case. The first act of that drama is not intelligible unless the Isolde can make you feel that her anger with Tristan is the anger that springs from slighted love and injured pride. This hidden drama is not to be expressed only by gesture, but by the same kind of telepathy which enables us in private life to understand that which is not expressed. Ternina had that power; Miss Edyth Walker has not, and, lacking it, she should not be called "superb," "splendid," or "magnificent." Then, in music-drama variety of vocal expression is as important as variety of tones of voice in spoken drama. The ordinary Isolde screams and her voice loses all meaning. Miss Walker does not scream, but, at the same time, the upper notes of her voice are hard and inexpressive, and, in general, she sings with insufficient variety of tone. She is a clever, experienced, and capable artist, and well worth hearing, but she is not a genius.

It may be that certain newspapers desired to create a new "boom." There is nothing new to be said of Tetrazzini, who is now accepted at Covent Garden as a remarkable singer, and therefore the New Isolde was a temptation. The vice of modern newspapers is a feverish desire to be sensational in their enthusiasms. It is a kind of mental hysteria. Tetrazzini was certainly worthy of uncommon praise. Now that she has sung more often her faults of style are patent enough. She does not phrase well because she is always so careful to prepare for her high notes and amazing voice gymnastics. This preparation resolves itself into a noticeable pause before attacking a high note or beginning a difficult run. The great singers of the old school would not have been guilty of this vocal solecism. Also the Tetrazzini's voice is not equally good from end to end of its range. Her middle notes are weak and toneless, compared with Patti's or Melba's. With all these faults and weaknesses Tetrazzini is a most remarkable singer, and deserves the fame she has so suddenly gained. But it is to be hoped that newspaper critics will not find it necessary to discover a new "star" every season, and it is still more devoutly to be hoped that Madame Melba will not be played off against Tetrazzini.

To compare one artist with another is always a temptation, and to some extent all criticism is a question of comparison, but any comparisons in a party spirit are to be deprecated. Is Tetrazzini as great a singer as Melba, is a foolish question. For one thing, the occasion of Melba's first appearance this season provided no basis for any sort of comparison. The music of Puccini's "La Bohême" is not the type of music in which Tetrazzini has excelled, but is suave, sentimental, impassioned stuff in the Neo-Italian manner. It is possible that Tetrazzini could sing it with wonderful expression and charm, for her concerts last autumn proved that she is by no means limited to fioritura, but until the two singers can be compared, we must have a firmer basis than our recollection of Melba in "Lucia," or "Rigoletto," or "Traviata." Even then it may be doubted if any comparison can be made, for the character of each artist's voice is so different. The evenness, perfect production, and sustained tone of Melba's singing were very impressive on Tuesday night. It is her desire to be considered an actress as well as a singer, and she is reported to be enamoured of the part of Mimi in Puccini's opera. But although Melba has learned some of the technical tricks of acting, of which at one time she was quite ignorant, she is never anyone but Melba as far as her voice is concerned. Its great beauty is absolute, and, although not impersonal, it has no power of expressing intimate shades of expression. She can caress a phrase, but not an idea or feeling. Whatever she sings is sung in exactly the same way, with beautiful tone, ease of production, and thrilling truth of intonation.

This absolute beauty has its own emotional effect. Madame Melba sings "I Love You" without any suggestion of passion in her voice; but its tone seems to have a meaning, simply because she sings the notes as written by the composer, and the human voice, however perfect it may be used in a mechanical sense, is never a mere musical instrument. Mr. Gomez might play the same phrase on his clarionet with more expression and to perfection, but it would not have the same effect. It is a question of timbre. Madame Melba's voice has a distinctive, human timbre of its own, and that does suggest feeling if it does not convey it. The timbre of Miss Edyth Walker's voice, on the other hand, arouses no thrill, although, compared with Melba, she is a mistress of dramatic expression, simply because the new Isolde's voice is not really a beautiful organ. For support of this argument in favour of the intrinsic expression of a beautiful voice, the Tristan of Jean de Reszke may be instanced. He did not even aim at the dramatic expression of Herr Knote, who is by no means a tenor of the German declamatory type. But by sheer beauty of tone Jean de Reszke sometimes achieved the most surprising effects. No one who heard it can forget the thrilling passion of his Tristan's cry of "Isolde!" when the two have thrown down the barriers. It was a drama in miniature. Many tenors have made a good deal of that cry, but none has approached Jean de Reszke's intensity of expression. Yet it is not to be believed that he felt the situation with more keenness than a Max Alvary, a Burrian, or a Knote felt it. It is merely that Wagner conceived the right musical expression for that brief outburst of love, and that Jean de Reszke's voice could give it full expression, so that the cry was at once beautiful as sound and poignant as a human utterance. Tetrazzini in "Traviata," and Melba in "La Bohème," have also shown the dramatic power of the beautiful voice. It is a power which the musical dramatist of the future will take into account, and so opera may circle back to the ideals of an older school of musical art.

The Drama.

MR. PINERO'S STUDY OF PROVINCIAL LIFE.

It is an interesting coincidence that at the time when the movement for establishing a national standard of dramatic art visibly approaches success, Mr. Pinero should produce a play not unsuited to a national theatre. This is not at all surprising. Mr. Pinero is a kind of barometer of the state of the British drama. He does not himself produce any changes in it, but he is a sensitive medium—he records them. In the days of "Sturm und Drang" I imagine that he would be stormy and emotional. When the theatrical airs were "light and variable," he would be sunny and not too strenuous. When we were all for analysis he, too, would look within, and when we criticise broadly our political ideas and tendencies, as Mr. Shaw criticises them in "John Bull's Other Island," or the dismal, illiberal side of middle-class existence, as Mr. Barker surveys it in the funeral scene in "The Voysey Inheritance," Mr. Pinero can be up and doing, and can develop an excellent study of English provincialism.

This adaptable, many-sided talent, joined to long-standing and inside knowledge of theatrical devices, is no doubt a considerable asset. Those of us who care only or chiefly for the intimate secrets of literature, for feeling, deep and sincere, will not prize such a gift too highly. Others again, who chiefly admire skill, will always be drawn to it. And no one who compares "The Thunderbolt" with "His House in Order" will deny that Mr. Pinero is able to advance from the artificialities of the stage to criticism of life. He can note and describe types and individuals. But then, again, he observes with obvious limitations. He does not follow the full, free play of character. His men and women must first obey the laws of exit and entrance, and then take on such freshness and originality as this obedience to stage convention has left to them.

Observe, for example, the movements of the Mortimore family in "The Thunderbolt," on whose fortunes the play depends. Each member is carefully studied. James, the vulgar, aggressive man with brains; Stephen, the journalist-tradesman without them, the editor Pott of a modern Eatanswill; Thaddeus, the half-baked, ineffective, artistic temperament—all are good. Their wives are even better, for they bring out one salient side of the family environment in provincial life, the way, mainly, in which feminine bitterness and jealousy accentuate the men's quarrels, and create the narrow, self-absorbed atmosphere that so easily becomes electric with hatred and revenge. And, on a third point, the way in which the disposition of money affects family relationships, Mr. Pinero seizes a fact not at all new but true and suggestive. "That'll take the blanket off 'em," said a local philosopher to a clergyman of my acquaintance about to read a will before an assembly of expectant legatees, closely resembling the impassioned gathering round the table in the third act of "The Thunderbolt." Such episodes do "take the blanket off" average men and women, and it is a tribute to Mr. Pinero's talent that building on an old resource of the theatre, namely, the destruction of a will, and the alternative triumph and disappointment of a mass of selfish heirs and heiresses, he is able to erect something human and instructive.

But then comes the weakness that besets the Old Theatrical Hand. Mr. Pinero's Provincial Family must not only love and hate after their kind; they must yield him his meed of sensational effect. They must furnish a series of splendidly impressive tableaux. They must all rave and shout together; their faces must all fall together; the curtain must rise on them set in eager or hopeful groupings, and fall on them in disappointed or agitated ones. These attitudes are not without meaning or significance. The fortunes of the Mortimores are all cleverly associated with the central idea of the play—the want of money. The builder is on the brink of poverty for want of capital; the editor-proprietor has a progressive rival and an obsolete plant; the snobs live beyond their income; the music-master has been dragged down by his wife, whose father was "in the retail," and an angel with a flaming sword guards his ascent to the seraphic ranks of "the wholesale," or the still more exalted beings who are uncontaminated by buying and selling. Money saves them all; the money they have got through the crime of one of their number who has destroyed the will that disinherits them. The discovery of that crime must drag them down again to the old obscure struggle, with new disgrace heaped on their luckless heads. How can they avoid it? How find a compromise? At least, and as a last device, they can grovel before the despised girl who holds the key to their tiny, imperilled ambitions. All these ideas are, as I have said, suggestive and truthful, though they are presented rather hardly and without the feeling which is a great artist's attitude to his creatures. Yet in the expression of them Mr. Pinero is impelled to leave nature, and give us a series of half-farcical scenic arrangements more appropriate to the "musical comedy" than to this interesting picture of our "mœurs de province."

But the play is not all melodrama, and its conclusion, at least, has dignity and worth. In Helen Thornhill, the illegitimate daughter of the dead brewer, Mr. Pinero has drawn a character of singular refinement. The idea of associating justice and calm strength and balance of nature, without sentimentality or Quixotry, with a young girl, who sets right all these conventional strugglers and schemers, is a fine one, and its development in the last act seems to me to represent Mr. Pinero's best achievement in dramatic literature. More conventional, but drawn also with great delicacy, is the presentment of the family lawyer, the medium through which the grasping vulgarities of the Mortimores are made visible. We all know this stage lawyer; yet in Mr. Pinero's and Mr. Beveridge's hands he was a figure of distinction, such as one looks for with more confidence on the French than on the English stage. And, unfortunately, it is the English stage under the control of the actor-manager for which, until we get our national, or standard, theatre, all our playwrights must work. I see that Mr. George Alexander is praised for his acting in "The Thunderbolt." I wish I could join in that praise, for it is clear that at least one scene in the play is written for him. Mr. Alexander plays it as, with his triumphant experience of thousands of playgoers hanging upon his lips, he is bound to play it, just as Mr. Tree plays his parts, and as Irving, a far greater and more highly endowed actor, used to play his—I mean with undue emphasis and self-consciousness. I have no doubt that such a representation was pleasing to the majority of the audience at the St. James's Theatre, to whom the more perfectly conceived art of Mr. Calvert and Mr. Beveridge was less agreeable. But I confess that in my acute and continually realised prevision of what Mr. Alexander would do next and how he would do it, of the moment when his sensitive mouth would take its upward curl, and his expressive eyes look eloquent reproach or generous forgiveness, I suffered more than I should care to express. This is a mere effect of personal sensitiveness; but if it has any substance, we must blame, not the actor, but the system which destroys the ensemble of our stage, and at once weakens and coarsens many of its conspicuous talents.

PICTURES AT THE ARTISTES FRANCAIS.

Considering the importance of the Salon des Artistes Français, its world-wide reputation, and the halo that still surrounds its name, any estimate of the vast collection of pictures now on view in the Grand Palais deserves a corresponding care. Outside Paris, at any rate, admission to its exhibitions, and still more its approval in the shape of medals and "mentions," are considered, even now, in the light of an artistic consecration. Despite the fact of the great secession, when the majority of its more talented members broke away and founded the rival Société des Beaux Arts, the older branch is unquestionably the more popular, and it certainly keeps up the standard of high technical achievement.

This being so, it is only fair to state that the vast majority of canvasses on these walls show an entire absence of the significant and of that vitally important quality in painting—interpretation. With the exception of M. Henri Martin's decorations, anyone at all familiar with former exhibitions knows that three-fourths of the pictures will be merely large illustrations from which all sense of the decorative has been excluded, and this year this impression has been confirmed on each subsequent visit.

At the head of the staircase, in the large room hangs M. Detaille's immense "Chant du Départ." Here it seems out of place, whereas in a panorama of a battle it would be more than adequate. In spite of much skill, the result leaves you cold, and the great white charger, far from sublime, only raises a smile. The charger is winged, but the artist's idea stops short at the frame, not having wings to fly.

In the same room begins the series of pictures illustrating the history of France from Charlemagne to the present day. Here is a "Death of Charles the Bold," the naked corpse of the Duke of Burgundy lying in a frozen stream under the walls of Nancy. Here M. Styka shows "Polish Ambassadors Proclaiming the Duc d'Anjou's election to the Polish Crown." In a room to the left we are confronted with M. Faivré's "Death of Mme. de Lamballe," also a naked corpse, this time lying in a gutter, jeered at by a crowd of sans-culottes.

To the right of the first room is M. Jacquier's "Glorieux Bûcher," a Napoleonic episode. This type of picture is as numerous as ever, the range of history as wide, and, let it be said, there is greater reticence in choice of subject. Some of these huge illustrations are often well composed and correctly coloured, though a glance at the catalogue will soon dispel any doubts as to their merits of harmony, for they all gain in black and white reproduction. In hardly a single case can they be said to have been evolved from a mind that has grasped the fundamental truths of what is pictorial, nor what an artistic conception implies. Their authors seem to have drawn their inspiration from a "set" at the Porte St. Martin, and M. Sardou and the scene-painter have dethroned Tintoretto. Not choice of subject so much as ignorance and lack of artistic purpose have been their prisons. Certainly Napoleonic anecdotes are more familiar to modern minds than legends of St. Mark, yet the great Venetian holds you enthralled in the Accademia; he needs no quotations from Michelet nor pages from mémoires to tell his story, for his aims have been other than mere illustration and expression.

M. H. Martin's "l'Etude," designed for the Sorbonne, is on a plane so much above its surroundings that, though less successful than usual, is yet a work of beauty. Mr. Sim's fine canvas, too, comes as an ocean breeze across the stagnant air of modern school traditions and facility mistaken for original talent. We stand in the presence of a temperament revelling in life and air. His "Fête sur l'Isle" is a joy to the eye, the pearly greys and iridescence recalling Tiepolo ceilings and sunlit palaces in Venice. Decorative, too, are Mlle. Dufau's panels for the Sorbonne, which are attracting so much attention, and deservedly. The influence of Besnard is too obvious to entitle her to claim any great originality, but her work must be mentioned for its freedom from the commonplace, and her success in personifying such abstractions as "Mathematics and Radioactivity." All decorative possibilities have been wilfully neglected in the "Commandes de l'Etat," in which President Fallières is depicted laying foundation stones, opening flower shows, and driving with a mounted escort to a banquet. All show ability; they are the hardy annuals of a Salon, but they leave no secret behind.

The genre painters are, as usual, led by the brilliant M. J. Bail, whose talent for painting copper vessels is too well known to need further mention. M. Lartaud's faithful study of soldiers in a third-class railway carriage in the lurid light of an oil lamp is clever, but too photographic to be classed among such works as "Le Bain" of M. Desch, who has charmingly rendered a young mother and child.

M. Baschet's portrait of M. Henri Rochefort is a striking likeness, well composed, and is, on the whole, the most satisfactory example of portraiture in the Salon. There is able work by Mr. Cope and by MM. Cayron, Umbricht, Humbert, and Mlle. Kretzinger. But what can be said of M. Bonnat's "Mme. J. M.," all "cross hatching" and vermilion velvet? All his mannerisms are accentuated this year, and it is a relief to turn to M. Hébert's "Princesse de P," a wonderful performance for a veteran.

In landscape M. Harpignies still maintains his high level, and both Mr. East and Mr. Eaton contribute works of real excellence; but, with the exception of M. Rémond, the landscapists are not up to the average. M. Gosselin, indeed, shows feeling, but cannot forget Cazin. The remaining artists are oblivious of the meaning of interpretation, and as the time must shortly come when the efforts of a Lumière will be crowned with success, their works will cease to have much meaning.

THE LARGEST OF OUR NATIONAL ESTATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—If there is a point—and surely there are many or the outlook is black indeed—upon which Conservatives and reformers can sympathise with each other, it is the desire that measures undertaken for the public benefit should destroy as little as possible the natural and historic beauty of our country. In some cases destruction is inevitable, which is all the more reason for keeping strict watch upon others where it could be avoided. General expediency may easily outweigh all romantic considerations; the water supply of Manchester may well be more important than the preservation of the winding shores of Thirlmere; but still the plea on behalf of natural beauty is never quite an empty one. It gathers force as town populations increase and as year by year a greater number of holiday-makers, whose habits make it easy to "forget the blue above the trees," go out to rest and to refresh themselves. Those, however, who have public control are apt to regard all who protest against their proceedings in the Press as sentimentalists, more anxious to air their own sensibility than to weigh the case. Yet the Press remains the one field where the cause of natural beauty and of advantages unspecifiable in blue-books can be championed; and some dust must first be knocked up over such a question before those with whom the decision lies can usually be got to even consider that it has two sides. Otherwise, if nobody protests it is supposed that nobody cares.

For this reason I wish to draw attention to the recent burning operations in the New Forest, to the numerous protests they have provoked, and to the principles of the forest's management which they raise. The facts are these. About sixty miles of gorse and heather have been burnt, by the order, and presumably through the initiative, of the Deputy-Commissioner, acting under the Office of Woods and Forests, with whom, of course, the ultimate responsibility rests. The devastated area stretches one hundred yards beside all the roads which cross the forest. Though the district surrounding Lyndhurst and the official residence has been treated with a discrimination showing a distinct respect for appearances, elsewhere the gorse on village commons and near cottages has been destroyed with reckless and pedantic rigour. Thus the visitor, travelling wherever he goes between two charred strips of desolation, varied occasionally by the black skeletons of shrivelled trees, may well ask what abstruse calculation for his ultimate advantage could have dictated such depressing measures. It is to be hoped that the ironic sense is sufficiently common to afford him in most cases a momentary gleam of amusement at the official reply: the object of this destruction is to prevent, if possible, the forest being at any time seriously damaged by fire.

As all acquainted with the New Forest know, damage of varying degrees of severity arises every year from incendiary or from accidental fires, deliberate incendiarism being probably the most frequent cause. The motive is either pure love of mischief or the desire on the part of those who possess grazing rights to get young tender feed for their cattle. Now it is obvious that the present disastrous precautions will have no tendency to diminish the fires of the mischievous, for they have only to walk a hundred yards from the road (a step which they would take in any case to avoid observation) in order to amuse themselves by "making a little hell of their own." Nor will it lessen the incendiary fires of the "commoners," for the grass by the side of the roads is too dusty to make good feed, and the last thing the owners want is that their cattle and ponies should be tempted on to the roads along which motors are continually passing. The fires will continue, and are continuing, to occur in the hollow "bottoms" filled with old wiry heather, which the commoners are always petitioning the Crown to burn. The only effect of this wholesale devastation, as far as they are concerned, will be to weaken the motive which withholds men in such cases, namely, a pride in the beauty of the forest. When the "Westminster Gazette" published an interview with principal officials of Woods and Forests, their statements that the burning of the road-ways was agreeable to the commoners was at once met by an indignant denial from four of the oldest and most respected of them, who added that it would "not in any way stop incendiary fires."

It is therefore only as a precautionary measure against accidental fires that the damage done can possibly be excused. But is the Deputy-Commissioner in that case prepared to assert that the greater proportion of accidental fires have started from the roadside, or that the match of the motorist or bicyclist is necessarily more dangerous than that of the strolling smoker in the heather? Before the public assents tamely to a precaution which has entailed proportionately as great a sacrifice as the demolishment of whole streets to stop a raging fire in a town, they have a right to inquire whether the wishes of the residents and commoners were first consulted, and whether so rigorous a measure was afterwards carried out under the eye of an authority whose interference could stop at once unnecessary destruction. If these steps were not taken, the public has been negligently served; if they were taken, the charge against the Woods and Forests that they have, in this matter, wrongly estimated the nature of the public trust committed to them, still remains. What is the nature of that trust? Are they right in regarding the preservation of the unique beauty of the New Forest as a subordinate part of their function? Is it not, after all, more important to the public that this beauty should be preserved than that the assets on the office balance sheet should be more satisfactory? Thanks to the efforts of Fawcett, the Act of 1876 does insist that the managers of the forest should keep in mind beauty as well as profit. But this injunction, unless it is continually insisted upon, tends to be neglected. Three separate and conflicting interests share the New Forest. First there is the Crown, whose interest it is to make the forestry pay if possible; secondly, there are the commoners, who want the forest to be made as good grazing ground as possible; and lastly, the nation, who want this tract of the most beautiful wild-wooded country in England to be kept as a public park. It is the nation's interest which, in the struggle between Crown and commoners, goes to the wall. The official burnings of the last month, entailing more disfigurement than all the incendiary and accidental fires of the last ten years put together, show that the Act of 1876 is an insufficient protection. What is needed is an Act which recognises the fact that it is worth the country's while to face, if necessary, a larger deficit in the accounts, in order to secure for all the full benefits of the most beautiful of the national estates.—Yours, &c., Resident.

Poetry.

A BOY'S HEART.

A boy's heart knows the words
Of singing winds and singing birds;
Strange stories greet him in the roar
Of waters on a rocky shore;
And realms of old romance he sees
Amid the gloom of forest trees.

I know that over Cullen Hill
Brave Michael Dwyer is hidden still;

They say he perished long ago,
But let them talk, for well I know
That for such men no death can be Until the land they love is free.
But somewhere in Drumrosna glen
I know he lies with all his men,
Or else, unseen, those comrades lurk
'Twixt Ochilly and Glendahurk,
Or maybe by Rosvannagh lake;
And when you see the bushes shake,
And herons wheeling in the air,
And none to fright them anywhere,
It well may be that out of sight
Someone is hidden, and the flight
Of birds and whispering of leaves
Mark where his breast too boldly heaves,
And where his hands too roughly pass
And rustle through the wither'd grass.

Or if you went some windless night,
When neither moon nor stars were bright,
And walked on Inishturlan strand,
You'd see a glow upon the sand
Out of a hollow in the rocks;
And, if you gave three ringing knocks,
Someone would come and lead you in,
And, where you saw the cliffs begin,
You'd see a cavern open wide,
And flaming wood and turf inside,
And, lying round about the fire,
A band of men; and Michael Dwyer
Himself would rise out of his place,
With firelight on his eager face,
And quickly take you by the hand
And ask the fortunes of our land;
And when his vigil will be past,
When he may rise and strike at last.

Or, if you chanc'd to lie alone
Upon the mountain-side, some stone
Might swiftly slip aside, and show
A passage winding deep below,
And at its end an earth-wall'd room,
And in the flickering rushlight's gloom
A band of men who laugh away
The dragging hours of the long day,
With one bright hope to give them light,
One vision in their dreams by night,
—The hour a crownless harp shall shine
Over our Irish fighting line.

And maybe some day, as I go
By Rossdouane or Glennacno,
Suddenly one of Michael's band
Before me in my path will stand,
And ask me if my heart is true
To the great deed that they must do:
And when I answer, as I will,
That Ireland's lot, through good and ill,
Shall be my lot, her fight my fight,
Till God gives victory to the right,
Then they will take me without fear
Where for so many a vanish'd year
They have heard gull and curlew call,
And seen the leaves of autumn fall
Under so many a western wind,
And then at last my heart will find
Hearts like its own, that cannot meet
The cheerless world beneath our feet,
But look ahead a little way
To seek the dawning of the day.
Unheeded there the months shall pass,
Awaiting 'mid the quiet grass
The wind that blows from sea to sea
The watchword of our liberty.

Weary the night and slow the noon;
O blessed wind, come soon, come soon!

Letters to the Editor.

EXPERIMENTS ON ANIMALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—You have given me leave to reply to some statements in a letter published in The Nation, on May 9th, in "The Times," of May 4th, and elsewhere, concerning experiments on animals. These statements, made by a member of the medical profession, were for the most part vague, and were not supported by references, or by definite facts. But there are six points in his letter which require very careful consideration.

1. His letter rather tends to make it appear that physiological experiments form a large proportion of all experiments on animals. But, of course, 94 per cent. of all experiments on animals in this country are inoculations, or of the nature of inoculations, involving no sort or kind of surgical operation or "vivisection."

2. He uses the phrase "the physiologists' privileges and unassailable secresies"; but, as a matter of fact, he has only to present his visiting card at one of the chief physiological laboratories in London, and he would at once be admitted to an advanced course of physiological lectures, at which he might witness one or more experiments in physiology.

3. He says that it is cant to say that a physiologist or a pathologist making experiments on animals is devoting himself to humanity. And we shall all of us agree with him that "devotion to humanity" is a phrase which should be kept for very great occasions. A man engaged in the study of a disease is neither more nor less devoted to humanity than a man engaged in the prevention or the treatment of that disease. Take, for example, diphtheria antitoxin. The men who discovered the antitoxin, and the men who administer the antitoxin, are all engaged over one bit of work. It is all the same disease; it is all the same thing. Of course, as a matter of fact, the discoverer may be a thousand times more valuable to humanity than the doctor. Or if, as often happens, discoverer and doctor are one, it is the discovery, not the doctoring, that wins him the gratitude of humanity.

4. He says that a free hand, practically, is afforded to the physiologist in this country. He would hardly have made this sweeping statement if he had carefully studied, not only the text of the Act, but the very lengthy evidence before the Royal Commission as to the additional restrictions and special conditions, which are not in the text of the Act, but are imposed by the Home Office on licences or certificates.

5. He alludes to curare as if it were often used. Of course, curare is never used in this country, except in the case of an animal already under an anæsthetic. Indeed, it is very seldom used in any sort or kind of experiments on animals. I wrote, a few years ago, to the professors of physiology at Edinburgh, Cambridge, and Oxford, and asked them what use they had made of curare during the whole of the preceding year. The Edinburgh professor wrote back: "We did no experiments with curare during the past year"; the Cambridge professor wrote back that curare had been used four times in the whole year, twice on an animal under chloroform and ether, and twice on an animal under ether; at Oxford, during the whole year, curare had been used on seven frogs, whose brains had previously been destroyed, and on one rabbit under ether.

6. He suggests that anæsthetics are not "conscientiously" administered in our laboratories. That kind of charge is often made; and was the occasion of an action for libel some years ago, which is not yet forgotten by the public. Nothing, in all the evidence before the Royal Commission, is more striking than the failure—and, in one or two cases, the humiliation—of those witnesses, representing the opposition to all experiments on animals, who denied that anæsthetics are carefully and completely administered to animals in laboratories.

The opponents of all experiments on animals must bear it in mind that the bare text of the Act has been adapted, by many additions and extra provisions, to cover a system of experiments which is very different from the work that was being done when the Act was passed, more than thirty years ago. In 1875, when the first Royal Commission was appointed to enquire into experiments on animals, there was practically no bacteriology. It is for inoculation alone that the Home Office allows Certificate A, which dispenses with the use of anæsthetics. In no case has Certificate A been allowed for any experiment involving any operation more severe than the withdrawal of a little blood from a vein under the skin. Even inoculations, if they involve, as a very few of them do, a preliminary incision must be made under an anæsthetic.

Of all inoculations, only 1 per cent. are made on dogs or cats; and only 0·1 per cent. are made on a horse, ass, or mule. The vast majority are made on guinea-pigs or on mice. The great increase of late years in the total number of experiments in this country is due to the inoculations made on mice for the Imperial Cancer Research Fund.

It must be borne in mind that many inoculations are made by Government in the interests of the nation. The Board of Agriculture has two laboratories: the Local Government Board makes experiments on animals: the Home Office has required "a good many experiments in connection with dangerous trades." Also, there are many municipal laboratories: Aberdeen, Cardiff, Colchester, Glasgow, Hamilton, Manchester, Wakefield, Worcester; all have such laboratories. In Liverpool, experiments for the municipality are made by the University. The Metropolitan Asylums Board also has its own laboratories. Again, the War Office and the Board of Agriculture have made use of experiments on animals. In brief, the inoculation of animals is part of the regular work of the State.

Those experiments in which an operation is performed under anæsthesia, and the animal is allowed to recover from the anæsthetic, form only 2·6 per cent. of all experiments. During 1906 about one in four of these experiments was made on a dog or a cat; and none were made on a horse, ass, or mule. These experiments, for which Certificate B is necessary, are of the very highest importance. It was by the help of such experiments that the facts of cerebral localisation were worked out. Again, it was by the help of such experiments that the use of thyroid extract was discovered. And, of course, Certificate B is not granted without careful enquiry; and it is strictly guarded by conditions. The operations are required to be performed antiseptically. If the antiseptic precautions fail, and suppuration occurs, the animal is required to be killed. In the event of a subsequent operation being necessary, a condition is attached, requiring all operative procedures to be made under anæsthesia; and no observations or stimulations of a character to cause pain are allowed to be made without the animals being anæsthetised.

In all the rest of the experiments made in this country, 3·45 per cent., the animal is anæsthetised, and is killed under the anæsthetic. In a very small minority of these cases, about one in ten, the experiment was made before a class.

Thus the percentages for the year 1906, which will be found in the Government Report published in 1907, are as follows:—

Inoculations, or similar proceedings, not involving a cutting operation	93·96
Animal anæsthetised, and killed under the anæsthetic	3·10
Animal anæsthetised, used for demonstration, and killed under the anæsthetic	0·34
Animal allowed to recover from anæsthetic, and kept for observation. No stimulation of a character to cause pain, and no further operation, allowed without anæsthetic	2·60
	100·00

Let us now take the case of a man who wants to obtain leave to make certain experiments on animals. What steps must he take? One of the doctors of the "National Anti-Vivisection Hospital"—I have read that he told a huge audience, not long ago, that diptheria-antitoxin is "animal filth"—is reported to have spoken as follows: "A vivisector has a theory whereby he hopes to discover a cure for, say, neuralgia of the little finger, and the Home Secretary promptly arms him with a licence to torture as diabolically as he pleases and as many animals as he thinks fit." But what are the facts? Each applicant, having filled up the necessary form or forms of application, must get them signed by two of that very select body of Presidents and Professors who alone are permitted to sign applications. The Home Office receives the application, and sends it to the Association for the Advancement of Medicine by Research. They report on it to the Home Office; then it goes to the Inspector, and he advises on it, "frequently having to make, and making, further enquiries with regard to the proposal made, before he finally advises. It very frequently happens that if the wording of the licence, or the certificate, is somewhat indefinite, and would allow of experiments being carried out which were not really necessary for the purpose of the investigation, the wording will be so altered as to confine it strictly to the inquiry. That often happens. Every licence which is applied for has to pass not only through three sets of eyes, but four sets of authorities, before it is granted." (Evidence before the Royal Commission.) The applicant must state, on his papers, the character and purpose of the proposed experiments, must record and report them, and must send to the Home Office any published account of them.

There is no room here to reckon what has been gained in the prevention and the treatment of disease by the help of experiments on animals. I only want to say that the Research Defence Society has been formed to make known the facts as to experiments on animals in this country. It has received a splendid welcome; it has already 1,150 members, representing every class of educated Englishmen and Englishwomen, and it has set to work founding branch societies and issuing pamphlets and leaflets. As Honorary Secretary of the Society, I shall be happy to receive applications for membership, to send literature to all who wish for it, and to answer all enquiries.—Yours, &c.,

THE JUSTICE OF THE LICENSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Country Brewer" has done the Licensing Bill excellent service by giving us all the figures relating to "The Black Horse" at Hitchin. I accept his figures without reserve. They appear to be typical figures. But they show the absolute fairness of the Licensing Bill.

The trade is 200 barrels a year, and before the introduction of the Licensing Bill could be sold at a capitalised sum of £1,200. This sum is, of course, arrived at by "Country Brewer" by taking a profit of 10s. a barrel, that is £100, and capitalising at twelve years' purchase. (This is fair if the house is very favourably situated in all respects, as I dare say it is.) The annual value of the licence is therefore £100.

It is also to be noticed that, as "Country Brewer" frankly informs us, the tenant is unable to pay the brewer any rent at all. (That is to say, any rent beyond what is really a rent involved in the tied-house price which he pays for his beer.) Therefore, both the annual value and the capitalised value of the licence are in this case the annual value and the capitalised value respectively of the licensed premises, that is, of the licence and premises combined.

Now the annual value of the licensed premises being in fact £100, the Schedule A assessment ought to be £100. "Country Brewer" says a fair assessment as a free house to a free tenant is £48. But the "Black Horse" is not a free house, and the tenant, however the fact is concealed, is really paying £100 by reason of the "tie." What "Country Brewer" is seeking to do is to exclude brewers from the class of possible tenants, thus reducing the annual value, although he includes them in the class of possible purchasers, so as to increase the capital value to £1,200. Of course, a brewer is the person who will be ready to give the highest annual rental, just as he is the person who will be ready to give the highest purchase price.

Having thus arrived at the true figures, let us see how they work out. The correct Schedule A assessment is £100. The assessment without licence (given by "Country Brewer") is £40. The difference is £60. If the "Black Horse" licence is lost during the first year after the passing of the Bill, the compensation will be £60 × 10 = £600. The brewer will also have the premises, "worth £40 a year, for another trade, which, at sixteen years' purchase, are worth £640." (In the Cobham Brewery cases the rent was capitalised at eighteen years' purchase.) So that the brewer will have, if he chooses to put his Schedule A assessment at the true figure, assets that are worth £1,240 if he loses his licence at once, instead of an asset worth £1,200 before the introduction of the Bill.

I have taken the figures on the assumption that the licence is lost during the first year, because in that case the calculation is simpler, but the total assets are of exactly the same value at whatever period the licence ceases to be granted. Each year during which the licence continues the brewer gets his annual income of £100, that is £60 beyond the value of the premises without the licence; and the compensation will each year decrease by such an amount that the total sum realised by the brewer from the licence during the time-limit will always work out at £600 present value.

As to the compensation levy of £10 a year, this will cease the moment the licence ceases; and the brewer will be singularly unfortunate if the result of shutting up other houses, for which compensation is paid, is not to bring back a considerable portion of this £10 a year in the extra trade which may be expected to come to the "Black Horse" if its licence continues.—Yours, &c.,

THE EDUCATIONAL RAPPROCHEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Suggestions are being made and welcomed that the education problem may be solved by a conference of Anglican and Nonconformist divines. Now, while this is no doubt a hopeful sign, it is also a curious instance of the fact that either the problem is not regarded as an educational one at all or else that an educational problem can, in the judgment of the public, be solved without calling in the advice of those who know most about it.

If this is in any way a matter of education, why, in the name of common sense, leave out the teachers? It is they that are the real experts; the militant ecclesiastics, whose resultant wisdom is looked forward to, are, as a rule, ignorant of the elements of the case. Yet the bishop is called in, and the priest and the parson, the theologian and the biblical critic; but the one who really knows the inside of a school is quietly ignored. This strange omission is the counterpart of another equally strange. In all this discussion the question of what moral or spiritual food is suited to the capacity and needs of the child has scarcely even been asked. What need of further proof that the combatants have not the faintest claim to consideration as educational advisers?

I am very far from denying that the awkward politico-sectarian difficulty has got to be met, and that on this side these divines may speak with weight, and that some have fought a great battle for liberty and justice. But surely, when the spiritual welfare of the future nation is at stake, we should do well to call in the best educational counsel that we can find, and not merely seek a political rapprochement of warring sects. Many serious school problems are at issue.

Is the method of the Catechism an obsolete one?

Can the Bible be used by a method consistent with intellectual integrity and the spirit of search?

Is the sub-division of the school, according to the creeds or customs of the parents, conducive to educational efficiency?

Is the teaching of dogma to young children capable of being made intelligent and profitable?

If the desired end is the spiritual uplifting, stimulating, and purifying of character, is the average Cowper-Temple course of Scripture history (and the like) the best weapon that can be forged for attaining it?

The great need of the day is the linking of the educational system to the social and civic duties of men. If the class teacher is excluded, and an ecclesiastical and possibly incompetent visiting master introduced, will this linking be achieved at all?

These are root questions involved in the present controversy, and to most of them men and women of educational wisdom and experience can give more valuable answers than anyone else. Are they to be consulted? And are these problems given their due weight in the minds of our statesmen and in the minds of the political public?

In my opinion, we can never satisfy the demands of intelligence, educational principle, and justice, except by the laying down of a plain moral purpose as the State's aim in education, and the giving of wide liberty to the teacher as to the mode of attaining it.

But to hand over the hardest subject to the inefficient amateur, to admit the sacerdotal notion that no mere layman must meddle with it, to mark off religion as a most disconnected and sectional part of life's training, to order the teacher off at the very point where his work may become deepest and most human—and to suppose all this a solution—well, to parody Lord Goschen, this would be to gamble with the needs of a nation.

It may be pointed out, again, that one great matter that needs to be decided is whether goodness can be inculcated as good and admirable for its own sake, or must it of necessity be based (not ultimately, but educationally) on theologic sanctions. But is it sensible to leave such a decision to men hopelessly committed to the theological view?

Once more, the end is the spiritual enlightenment and discipline of the citizens to be, and this can only be reached if the advice of educational experience and common sense is sought and followed.—Yours, &c.,

THE SUGAR CONVENTION AND ITALY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A paper was sent out by the Foreign Office on the date of your last issue giving the form of certificate referred to in my letter, which may be required to accompany sugar refined in this country on export after the 1st September next It, however, throws no light on the question raised by me and "Spectator" in your paper.

The greater part of the document is devoted to a statement in regard to the treatment of an application made by Italy for permission to become an exporter of sugar to the modest amount of 15,000 tons per annum. Notwithstanding the support given to this demand by His Majesty's Government, "it was found impossible to obtain the unanimous consent of the Commission to permit Italy to become a recognised exporting country." So the application of Italy was refused; and then we read "The Italian delegates, however, reserved entirely the right of their Government in these circumstances to take the course they judged best, and it remains to be seen whether within the further space of three months Italy will decide to retire from the Union or not." In view of the statement made by Sir Edward Grey in the House of Commons on August 1st, 1907, as a condition of our remaining a party to the Convention "that we shall be free from any risk of having our markets restricted by the majority of Powers whose interests at a given moment in the future may not coincide economically with our own," this decision, together with that arrived at in the previous sitting, with regard to limiting the Russian exports, seems to be of great importance.—Yours, &c.,

PENSIONS AND THE SINKING FUND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Raiding the Sinking Fund in order to provide Old Age Pensions may be open to criticism, but Mr. L. G. Chiozza Money's statement, in your issue of the 16th inst., that the reduction of the fixed charge for the service of the National Debt in the financial year 1909-10 to £25,000,000 would annihilate the New Sinking Fund, does not seem to be correct.

The account of the public income and expenditure in the year ended March 31st, 1908, issued by the Treasury on April 30th, 1908, shows that the fixed charge for the service of the National Debt during the year was £29,500,000, and that the balance [after payment of interest on the Funded and Unfunded Debt, Terminable Annuities, and Management of Debt], commonly called "The New Sinking Fund," amounted to £8,365,293 16s. 5d.

If in the financial year 1907-8, the fixed charge had been £25,000,000 instead of £29,500,000, the balance, or New Sinking Fund, would have been £8,365,293 16s. 5d. —£4,500,000 = £3,865,293 16s. 5d. It is estimated that £14,000,000 will be paid off the debt during the current financial year. The interest on this sum would amount to about £400,000. It follows, therefore, that if the fixed charge for the debt in the year 1909-10 is £25,000,000, the balance (after payment of interest on the Funded and Unfunded Debt, Terminable Annuities, and Management of Debt), or New Sinking Fund, would amount to more than £4,200,000. The reduction of the fixed charge to £25,000,000 in the financial year 1909-10 would not, therefore, annihilate the New Sinking Fund.—Yours, &c.,

THE RIDDLE OF THE BACCHAE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Though I have to thank Dr. Gilbert Murray for his most kind (though adverse) and most interesting review of my book, I hope that you will allow me to point out one or two passages which seem to me serious, though unintentional, misstatements.

Dr. Murray mentions my opinion that Euripides intends us to regard the alleged overthrowing of Pentheus' palace as an imposture, and then discusses my reasons for thinking so. One of these reasons he entirely omits to mention—that Pentheus and Dionysus soon after the "miracle" go into the house to prepare for their visit to the hills, and find no difficulty in doing so. Of the other two reasons, one—that based on the inadequacy of the resources of the Greek stage—is stated by Dr. Murray thus:—"We do not know how earthquake effects were produced on the Greek stage." I have not said this. What I have said (pp. 39—41), rightly or wrongly, is that the proper representation of the downfall of the palace was utterly beyond the powers of the stage machinists of the day. Dr. Murray, it is likely enough, thinks so definite a statement rash; indeed, he says, "It is admitted that they [earthquake effects] were produced." (Admitted by whom?) But whether my assertion is justifiable or not, I think he could have found a better statement of my objection.

My other argument (that several characters who come on the scene afterwards make no remark on the ruins which ought to be lying at their feet) Dr. Murray states with perfect fairness. His answer to it is that "the Greek habit was to let each scene stand very much by itself, producing its own effect uninterrupted by references to other parts of the play." This assertion (made in this connection) is astounding. Is Dr. Murray really ready to believe that on the Greek stage a house could fall down and that twenty minutes were enough not only to repair the damage, but also to eradicate from the owner's mind all memory of the mishap? If I may borrow an instance which I have used elsewhere, does he really believe that in a Greek play a person could be killed and appear later none the worse, stalking about like a hero, as Plato says? If he is unwilling to believe such things, surely his theory cannot apply to this case.

The last matter I have to mention is one which I touch on with great diffidence, and only because it appears to me much more important than any theories of my own. It is that of Dr. Murray's translation of iv. 509, sq. He is mistaken in supposing that I have the slightest objection to his translating the Greek word by the English "manger." What I do deprecate is his translating the whole sentence, "let him lie in the manger," instead of "imprison him beside [or near] the manger"—surely the only possible version. Dionysus is to be tied up in front of the rails, like a horse or a bull. To say "let him lie in the manger" looks so extremely like the fabrication of a fictitious parallelism between this passage and another that I cannot help wishing that Dr. Murray had avoided doing so; and it is impossible not to notice that he first of all offers an unexceptionable translation ("tie him where the steeds are tied"), and then inserts the words which I feel are so open to a false construction.

As I have said in the Note (p. 104) to which Dr. Murray takes exception, my regret in connection with this passage is combined with a very great admiration for the brilliant scholarship and poetic genius which is everywhere apparent in his celebrated translations; but it is precisely because his work is so well known that I feel bound to protest against elements in this part of it which I think are to be deplored.—Yours, &c.,

WHAT DOES "VOTES FOR WOMEN" MEAN?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Can you inform me, a Parliamentary voter, exactly what kind of vote it is that is meant when women attend meetings and cry out for "votes for women," and work day and night to try and keep out a Liberal candidate and replace him by a man pledged to support the brewer and the Protectionist?

If it is merely the right to vote at Parliamentary elections, as women already vote municipally and for County Councils, why is this not made as clear as their hostility to all Liberal candidates, and their approval of those of the Opposition? If they claim a right for all women to vote at Parliamentary elections, why is this not made clear? It would be absurd to suppose that they make the claim for only two classes of women—those qualified as men under the Acts of 1878, 1888 and 1894, and married women. At present they claim that all women of age are wrongfully deprived of the right to vote, by which they mean that these persons should justly possess the right to vote for Parliamentary candidates. Consequently they claim what is, in effect, manhood suffrage for women, but leaves men qualified only to vote under a property qualification! I have failed to detect that they propose to join forces with those men at present not entitled to vote, to press for manhood suffrage, not the principle of the qualification to vote being a property qualification, they appear willing, in order to remedy a grievance that some women labour under, by asking Parliament to introduce an anomalous state of things not paralleled in any country, even though all adult women vote in New Zealand.

Had they their way—those who appear to speak as leaders—in a household contributing by taxation to the State exchequer, when a Parliamentary election is taking place, the wife, the mother, the sister, the governess, the housekeeper, cook, waitress, "tweenie," housemaid, and scullerymaid go to the poll, accompanied by the man who makes the income, but the butler, footmen, and general man are left behind, voteless. To put the matter in this bald way exposes its manifest injustice and impracticability, but it is fully justified by the stupid tactics pursued by these self-styled leaders who bring contempt on a cause which deserves and will command attention even by the present Government, because it is a matter of pure and simple justice—qualifying women when their responsibilities are those of men to vote at Parliamentary elections.

The question at issue is not manhood suffrage, but household suffrage, and when a man votes it is, in effect, the vote of the household, himself, his wife, family, servants, and all dwelling with him. The Suffragette, in effect, asks that the vote of the household shall be nullified at an election as the desire to give a wife an independent vote distinct from her husband infers that as a body the wives will cancel the votes of the husbands, leaving elections to be determined not by the cause, but by the accident of favourable or hostile wives, a state of things which will bring more unhappiness and deception into households than any device that can be invented. I ask you, Sir, whether these considerations do not call for clear and explicit statements of what is meant by "Votes for Women"?—Yours, &c.,

A. Grimshaw Haywood.

THE BOMBS IN INDIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Perhaps there is no more urgent duty for all of us at this moment than to realise the present situation in India and how it has come about.

When the Indian National Congress was started it raised hope, and secret societies dwindled away, so I have been told. During the last few years, when hope has failed, confidence in British Government and officials has largely diminished, if not disappeared, and Indians and Anglo-Indians have been becoming more and more estranged, secret societies seem to have been springing up again, and now we have bombs.

Obviously more repression will not mend matters. The wise thing surely is to consider the causes and deal with them. Hope must be revived, confidence restored, and estrangement stopped.

It is just possible that this can yet be done, though it will want more faith, courage, and good sense than would appear to be easily found amongst our rulers and officials. The Indians who have the confidence of the Indians must be consulted, and Europeans and Indians must be joined together in a whole-hearted and sustained effort for the good of India, with the sincere aim of gradually enabling Indians to manage their own affairs.

But if we meet outrage with mere repression, as the blind leaders of the blind are now urging us to do, without recognising our own responsibility for the present most deplorable state of affairs, then we shall be courting further disaster, and things will go from bad to worse.

Let me repeat: India is suffering from loss of hope, want of confidence in, and estrangement from, her rulers. Her rulers are suffering from lack of faith, of courage, and of good sense, and perhaps of accurate information.

Truly a great task is before us calling for the co-operation of all Indian and British men and women who can recognise it.—Yours, &c.,

THE BRITISH SUNDAY AND THE EXHIBITION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Many of your readers will share with me sincere regret that The Nation should express itself in favour of the opening of the Franco-British Exhibition on Sundays, even though we are supporters of museums and picture galleries being available on that day. If the art collections of the Exhibition could be penned off and the public admitted free of charge, no one could reasonably object. But we know that would be impossible. The Exhibition would only be opened if a charge for admission were made. Hence money-making would enter into the question. Visitors would demand that all the sections should be open to them. The attendance of exhibitors and their helpers, of the great army engaged by the caterers, would be essential, and probably we should see the side-shows and the games in full swing on Sundays. If, as you state, the Committee have decided not to open the Exhibition, I unfeignedly rejoice, and in doing so they have expressed the general sense of the British community. Had it been otherwise I, for one, would have abstained from visiting the Exhibition at any time, and believe that hundreds of thousands of others who are concerned in the maintenance of our English Sabbath as far as possible would have taken the same stand. As a consequence, the Committee of Management will gain more than they lose by this desirable action.

Your correspondent, M. Yves Guyot, expresses French ideas, but having spent many Sundays in foreign countries, I hope we may never find the same state of things here. Much as we desire to support the entente cordiale and please our French friends, they cannot expect us to surrender what is a matter of principle. They know what our custom is, and I can hardly think that the bulk of French people would respect us much if we gave up what we look upon as one of our greatest blessings, however far we fall short of its fuller realisation.—Yours, &c., Edward Brown.

THE PROBLEM OF MEDICAL RELIEF.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In my letter the other week (April 18th) I was more anxious to direct attention to what is substantially medical pauperism than to discuss in detail the machinery for its relief.

It is surely extraordinary that something like a million persons in London in one year come and practically say that they are unable to pay for the smallest amount of ordinary medical attendance. This we can hardly believe, and we understand that charity has gone wrong somehow, and that a blind faith in the efficacy of subscriptions to hospitals is out of place. The "Daily Telegraph" sobs over the girl coming to the London Hospital without a chemise, and in a borrowed blouse.

What, in many instances, happens is this. A young woman gives up her work for a whole afternoon, losing 2s. or 3s., pays 4d. or 6d. for tram fares, and 3d. for the medicine, with 1d. for the bottle. She does this once or twice a week, and must go, an invalid, in all weathers, on the fixed day. Surely in every way it would be better for this person to be attended to by a doctor of more experience close to the girl's home. The fees, elsewhere than in Harley Street, are very small; or, better still, if there were available a provident dispensary, by which, for 6d. or 8d. a month, she would be insured and adequately treated for all illnesses.

Voluntary effort is of small avail, as it cannot but be local, and limited in its operation. Of course, the work of the Guardians is actually voluntary, but it is systematised and uniform and authoritative. No other agency is in possession of this field. The scheme of uniting the Boards of Guardians under one authority, as well as associating them with the Borough Council in each borough, has been accepted by the London County Council. It is absolutely necessary for efficiency and economy that all matters relating to public health should be under one administration. Hospitals, being public institutions, will need to be under some supervision. It does not follow that they should be rate-supported.

The analogy of education was perhaps unfortunate, as it is still possible that a separate Education Council may be found for the Metropolis. A better one would be the Public Library Committee, whose members are elected partly from within the Council and partly from outsiders. Many of the defects of our Borough Councils are due to the too frequent exclusion of excellent men and women, owing to the very defective mode of election. For example, if in a ward there are five councillors to be elected, it cannot be said that more than three are really and truly the chosen of the ratepayers. If six hundred votes be cast, three hundred and ten votes may elect all; whereas, when Lord Courtney's Bill becomes law, the other two hundred and ninety, not being carried away by bombast, will get in two capable men. At present the error amounts to between 20 and 40 per cent. But this wanders from my original subject.—Yours, &c.,

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

WE understand that Mr. William Watson is engaged on a poem of some length dealing with an English historical subject. The work is the most important on which Mr. Watson has been engaged for some time. It will be published by Mr. John Lane. Lovers of Mr. Watson's work will be glad to see him back again, after a rather long interval, in the sphere of epical, or semi-epical, poetry.

AN authoritative English life of Tolstoy is much wanted, and Mr. Aylmer Maude, who is writing it, has adequate equipment for a very difficult and very interesting task. He knows Russia and the Russian language well, for he has long resided in the country, and Tolstoy has always treated him as a friend and confidant. His translations of the essays and novels of Tolstoy are well known.

MAXIM GORKY'S new book is said to be by far the most uncompromising indictment of Russian society that he has yet written. It is called "Ispowjed" ("The Confession"), and is practically the author's autobiography. The hero is a foundling abandoned on the steps of a little Russian church in the depths of the country. A gardener adopts him, and, at the age of eighteen, he marries the daughter of a land steward. His wife dies in child-birth, and a few years later the child poisons himself by swallowing arsenic in mistake for sugar. The father thinks of suicide, but enters a monastery. Gorky's picture of conventual life, and his portraits of the cruelty, cynicism, and excesses of the monks lack nothing in vigour. The condition of the people is also treated with great frankness, and, in tone, "The Confession" is more revolutionary than any of Gorky's previous works.

IF the project for a National Theatre proceeds, as it seems likely to do, and if the Prime Minister dignifies his term of office by forwarding so great a project, we may in the next year or so be considering the appointment of a Director. Happily the country possesses a man whose special character, knowledge, and services to the English and to modern European drama furnish an ideal qualification for such a position. We need not say that we refer to Mr. William Archer.

MR. EDWIN PUGH is diverging from the novelist's path, and will publish in the autumn a study of Charles Dickens as a social reformer. He has surveyed the whole of Dickens's novels, and concludes that had he lived to-day Dickens would have been a Socialist. The book will be called "Dickens as a Socialist." It will be interesting to read Mr. Pugh's argument, but Dickens was a strong anti-bureaucrat, and the ways of the State (in his days) were rather distasteful to him. We should have called him purely humanitarian, without any conscious tendencies to theory about the State.

MRS. BEARNE has already given us a number of readable books dealing with the inner history of those European sovereigns the facts of whose lives were unfamiliar to most English readers. Another book from her active pen, which is announced by Mr. Fisher Unwin, seems to have been written on similar lines. Its title is "A Royal Quartette," and the four heroines of the book are Charlotte Elizabeth of Bavaria, Marie Adelaide, Duchess of Burgundy, Marie Amélie of Naples, the exiled Queen of the French, and Maria Luisa, Infanta of Spain. All four were women who lived in stirring times, and associated with persons of world-wide reputation, so that the story of their lives should give rise to a volume of lively and entertaining gossip, if not of great historical value.

AT one time it was usual for Eton boys of distinction to present their portraits to the Headmaster when they left the school. This practice originated in the latter part of the eighteenth century, and continued for nearly a hundred years. As during this period English portrait-painting reached a very high level, the Provost's Lodge at Eton contains a fine series of portraits, including examples by Reynolds, Gainsborough, Romney, West, Hoppner, Lawrence, and others. Mr. Lionel Cust, Director of the National Portrait Gallery, has prepared a book dealing with these Leaving Portraits, which will be shortly published by subscription by Messrs. Spottiswoode & Co. It will contain a large number of reproductions, and is certain to prove of great interest to old Etonians, as well as to students of English portrait painting.

A HISTORY of the Jews in one volume, very much on the lines of Green's "Short History of the English People," is being prepared by Dr. M. Epstein, who has been gathering material for such a book for the last six years. Dr. Epstein is a graduate of the History School of the University of Manchester, and has also worked at history and economics at Breslau and Berlin. The book will deal with the vicissitudes of the Jewish people, from the time of the destruction of the first temple to the present day, and it is expected that it will have a large number of maps, plans, and tables.

MESSRS. MAUNSEL, of Dublin, announce a book that has long been looked for by readers of Irish verse—Miss Alice Milligan's collected poems. So far the only poems of Miss Milligan accessible were the few given in "New Songs," A.E.'s anthology of the younger Irish poets. Miss Milligan is a keen worker in the Irish movement, and has written much stirring and spontaneous verse in the patriotic national journals. The coming collection will bear the title "Hero Lays."

A POPULAR "History of Engraving," from its inception to the time of Bewick, is to be published in a few weeks by Mr. Werner Laurie. The author, Mr. Stanley E. Austin, deals fully with the block books and the work of the early masters. Attention is also given to the progress of the art in England, the early British mezzotinters being treated in detail. There is besides a full account of Bartolozzi, and the book ends with a description of the revival of wood-engraving by Thomas Bewick. Another contribution to the subject promised by Messrs. Constable is Mr. A. M. Hind's "A Short History of Engraving and Etching." It will contain a classified bibliography and an index of engravers, with concise notes to each entry, and should thus prove a useful book of reference for collectors and students.

THE next addition to Messrs. Williams & Norgate's "Crown Theological Library"—a series which has provided English theologians with many of the best products of foreign scholarship—will be "Fundamental Truths of the Christian Religion," by Professor R. Seeberg, of Berlin. It consists of sixteen lectures given to the students of all faculties in Berlin University during the winter of 1901-2. Among the topics treated are "The Origin and Nature of Religion," "Religions of Humanity and Absolute Religions," "Ecclesiastical Dogma," "The Nature of Human Sin," and "The Person of Jesus Christ." The Berlin lectures have already produced works of the greatest value, including Professor Harnack's famous "What is Christianity?" Professor Seeberg's volume is sure to be a worthy contribution to the series.

HERBERT SPENCER.*

Upon the death of Herbert Spencer, in December, 1903, the task devolved upon Dr. David Duncan of carrying out Spencer's instruction to write his biography "in one volume of moderate size." The work now before us is the fulfilment of that instruction. It seems at first somewhat strange that Spencer, who scarcely ever read a biography himself, and who rarely lost an opportunity of condemning those who did read them, should yet have displayed so much anxiety about his own history, as to write two large volumes of autobiography, besides collecting material from which a biography might be compiled. But the explanation is not far to seek. At all times anxious—almost morbidly so—lest he or his views should be in any way misrepresented, he knew that his life was certain to be written whether he wished it or not, and, recognising that necessity, he was determined that it should be done with complete fidelity.

Dr. Duncan has carried out his task with a large measure of success. When we affirm that, in our opinion, his delineation of Spencer's character is less accurate and detailed than that set forth in the autobiography, we are merely naming a fact, the inevitableness of which was obvious. For not only would it be out of the question to produce a portrait of Spencer that should rival the unique effort of self-analysis which the autobiography affords, but it is also the case that a great part of the material from which the life could be compiled, having been already used in the autobiography, was not available for Dr. Duncan. But regarding the biography in its true light, namely, as a supplement to the autobiography, it is deserving of all praise. It brings out strongly the extreme simplicity of Spencer's mind, his entire unworldliness and sincerity, his distaste for honors and ceremonial. Having been in earlier life undistinguished by any university degree or other hallmark, and having experienced the difficulties of a thinker who lacks the impress of any learned body, the tardy honors showered upon him in later life had little attraction for him. He could not be induced to become a Fellow of the Royal Society, nor would he accept the honorary degrees pressed upon him by the universities. His dislike of ceremonial was well exemplified by his reply to an invitation to an "At Home" at the Foreign Office, to meet the Emperor of Russia. He regretted that he could not avail himself of the invitation. "The necessity of wearing a levee dress, to which Mr. Spencer has an insuperable objection, compels him to decline the offered pleasure."

Spencer's life was peculiarly uneventful. His difficulties were all due to financial embarrassments, and to ill-health. Breaking down when writing "The Principles of Psychology," he never afterwards fully recovered. His hours of work were limited to three a day; and, outside this time, he did not dare to read even a novel, still less a book on serious subjects. It seems, indeed, strange that so confirmed an invalid should have succeeded in producing over twenty volumes, most of them large, and all of them abstruse. The devotion of the whole of his working time to writing the "Philosophy," which at the beginning was quite unremunerative, rendered it impossible for him to turn his energies towards earning a livelihood, and sheer want of pence at one time very nearly stopped the publication of the "Philosophy." Spencer's persistent refusal to accept financial aid was based on stern independence of character. Brought up in Nonconformist surroundings, he was by nature, as well as by education, radical-minded—wholly indifferent to authority and custom, and relying in all matters upon reason and his own judgment. He was by turns a teacher, an engineer, a journalist, and a philosopher, and in this variety of occupation gained an experience of widely different sides of life.

The permanent value of the Synthetic Philosophy is hard to estimate. Doubtless the advance of science will disclose much in it that is erroneous, while confirming many other of its multitudinous doctrines. Spencer himself has observed that the ultimate state of opinion regarding an author may be more or less gauged by noting the extreme points between which his reputation oscillates at different periods, and taking the mean between them. Acting upon this principle, there is some reason to think that the extreme depression under which his philosophy now rests will be mitigated in the future. But there can be no doubt that the influence which it has exercised is far larger than is commonly imagined. Spencer's thoughts and doctrines have in many cases already become part of the settled body of scientific truth, and have sunk deeply into the minds and modes of thought of many who have never read a line of his works. So large a portion of the doctrines which were originally propounded by Spencer has become a part of universal knowledge, that the dissent from many of his views brings into sharper relief the general acceptance of his other opinions.

What conclusions from the Synthetic Philosophy stand out as of fundamental importance to the human race? With regard to the earlier volumes, it is difficult to estimate with any certainty the value which the future will set upon them. But we may fitly make a few observations on the conclusions arrived at in the five later volumes, dealing with the principles underlying the evolution of society, and the rules to be observed in the regulation of social affairs. Spencer's bold individualism, his vehement insistence on the necessity for reducing the functions of the State, his law of equal freedom, which he used as a touchstone for every form of new legislative action, are all well known. Few now follow these doctrines to the extreme point to which he carried them, and the subject remains one of active discussion among social reformers, and of very wide divergence of opinion. But we may well recur to the main conclusion forced upon us with irresistible superfluity of proof in the course of these social treatises, which Spencer himself held to be the most important—the conclusion that war is the main cause of social retrogression. If all the other results of Spencer's writings were ultimately to be overthrown, his hatred of militarism and his antagonism to war would be remembered as the fundamental basis of his social philosophy. Throughout the "Principles of Sociology" there is established, by a series of the most stringent inductions, the fact that war and a military state of society are accompanied by every form of social degradation; while long-continued peace and the spread of industrialism are unvarying conditions of social progress. The status of women, the degree of social liberty, the average honesty, sense of justice, chastity, and other virtues prevailing among citizens are all shown to be directly proportionate to the exemption from war and from "militancy." To Spencer belongs the credit of showing that the dislike of war which has in all ages prevailed among humanitarians rested not merely upon sentiment, but on a firm foundation of reason.

The "Life and Letters" show us how strongly Spencer felt this, and how much the last years of his life were embittered by the rise of Imperialism, and the aggressive policy adopted by England towards weaker nations. In a letter to Dr. Cazelles, who translated his works into French, he writes:—

> "Of all the feelings I entertain concerning social affairs, my detestation of the barbarous conduct of strong peoples to weak peoples is the most intense. . . . To my thinking the nations which call themselves civilised are no better than white savages, who, with their cannons and rifles, conquer tribes of dark savages, armed with javelins and arrows, as easily as a giant thrashes a child, and who, having glorified themselves in their victories, take possession of the conquered lands, and tyrannise over the subject peoples. . . . All further advance depends on the decline of militancy and rise of industrialism. . . . But what the great mass of the civilised peoples in their dealings with the uncivilised regard as glory, I regard as shame."

The South African War, as may well be imagined, was the occasion of bitter sorrow to him. Many will remember the passionate letter of protest which he wrote to "The Speaker" of January 13th, 1900, and the essay on "Imperialism and Slavery" which appeared in his last book, "Facts and Comments." The aged philosopher, who had all his life been the unceasing advocate of peace and justice among nations, died at the moment when the reaction against his views had reached its farthest. The South African War had, indeed, been concluded; but the proposal to revert to Protection had been sprung upon the people, and the course of bye-elections served to give some justification to the belief that the period of aggression would be indefinitely extended. However we may admire Spencer's amazing intellectual force, whatever value we attach to the philosophical system which he propounded, the strongest claim to our respect and to the gratitude of posterity is grounded upon the vast and fertile labours which he bestowed on the cause of humanity.

THE POETS' IRISH QUESTION.*

The fortunes of legend among the civilised European literatures would make a most interesting investigation. Greek, Indian, German, Norse, and Welsh legends are all treasurable possessions for the poets of Europe; how comes it that similar currency has not befallen the ancient Irish legends, which assuredly do not fall below those others in grandeur and tragic human appeal? It is true that interpretation of the Irish tongue is a quite modern discovery; but those who have understood Welsh outside Wales and Brittany would not come to a large reckoning. And yet Welsh legends, the stories of Arthur and the Grail, and offspring from both, have gone through almost the whole of modern European poetry. And Irish legend all the time has been a fountain sealed, a garden enclosed. Ireland's peculiar political situation has no doubt had a deal to do with it. Trinity College, Dublin, must also be held to account for our long deprivation of its country's richest product; like a kind of Cerberus, it has stood at the doors of Ireland, always on the watch to prevent any manifestation of Irish literature from escaping into the world.

There is Macpherson's Ossian, certainly; to which, says Matthew Arnold, "we owe a debt of gratitude, and when we are unjust enough to forget it, may the Muse forget us!" To the eighteenth century it was "an apparition of newness and power," exercising an incalculable effect on poetic opinion, wholly for good. But, whatever Ossianic influence has done, the matter which Macpherson revealed has not become current among poets, as, say, Greek and Norse tales have been and are. What is the matter with Irish legend?

The truth seems to be that legend must be digested again and again by generation after generation of unimportant poets before the important poets will take it in hand and fashion it into immortal art. It must be divested, by long process of trituration, of all the obscure notions with which the folk to whom the legend chiefly belongs impregnated it—the dark shadows of forgotten religions, the totemisms and animisms, cosmologies and eschatologies, and singular customs; it must be reduced completely to the common terms of humanity, nothing left but the tale and the passions. Then it is ready for immortal handling. Now Welsh legend passed through such treatments as the Mabinogion—that amazing piece of literary art—and the Welsh odes; out of Armorica went traversing such brains as Chrestien de Troyes and Wolfram von Eschebach; and so came to the immortal handling of a Malory, a Swinburne, or a Wagner. Although a hideous iron public-house forbids "Yr Awen," the spirit of Welsh poesy, to haunt Y Wyddfa any more, her eagle wings have been felt by singers of every European nation. But those portions of Irish legend which have no analogue in the Welsh, have not so entered into the texture of European thought, for they have gone through no such continued levigation; they are still raw material.

The old Irish poets seem to have been mainly lyrists; anyone who has read Mr. Kuno Meyer's translations of Irish lyrics—translations which are themselves exquisite English poems—will be convinced that there are very few literatures to compare in this respect with the Irish. But, apparently, they made no epics which the world can accept. The legend, the ore of epic, is there, and modern Irish poets—who are said to be in Dublin numberless as the sands that lack number—have an opportunity just now the like of which does not often come to mortals—an opportunity of presenting Europe with a legendary cycle completely new to most minds, and of a vast grandeur. The tale of Fergus, Conor, and Cucullin, of Devidre and Maer, is essentially one of the most tragically noble tales that ever worked in man's brain; the fatal madness of Cucullin makes the death of Ajax seem almost trivial in comparison. There is every reason to suppose, moreover, that these events did actually occur, in much the same way as they have been handed down—that is Mr. Kuno Meyer's opinion, which will not lightly be disputed.

We fear the process which we have been requiring is not furthered in the first serious attempt to give the whole Cucullin legend epical form in a modern tongue. Mrs. Hutton's "The Táin" has many virtues, but it has not the great virtue of presenting the Cucullin cycle freed from the encumbrances of notions which are unintelligible now—singular taboos and prohibitions, and the like. Moreover, her writing is gratuitously overlaid with Gaelicisms, half anglicised Irish words that have in English no poetical value, and hinder, instead of helping, our comprehension of those heroic times. Not thus cheaply is an "Irish atmosphere" achieved. But, indeed, Mrs. Hutton seems to have deliberately aimed away from making a great English poem, for she writes as if archaeological exactitude were of the same importance as poetry. However, as a continuous and fairly interesting presentation of the cycle, "The Táin" deserves praise; though poetry is little the richer for its appearance, and though it leaves the huge mass of Irish story practically where it was before, still awaiting the formative grasp that will surely one day handle it. Putting aside that the verse is weak and tedious, and that poetry is a rare visitant to the book, it yet can be recommended as a straightforward account of the great cattle-spoil, the Tain-Bo-Cuailgne, to those who are unacquainted with that noble story, and wish to enrich their imaginations with it. And, then, if they wish to see how portions of it can be given genuine poetical treatment, let them discover the neglected work of that excellent poet, Samuel Fergusson.

THE ANTI-INDIAN ENGLISHMAN.*

Misrepresentation is the outstanding characteristic of Mr. Rees's book. He knows a good deal about some parts of India, especially the South. He has passed through various stages of official life. In many ways he stands as the type of the Anglo-Indian bureaucrat in retirement. To some sides of Hindoo life he shows a certain kindliness, and there are passages in his chapter on "Social Reform" that could not have been written without the penetration that comes of sympathy. But whenever he encounters any serious criticism of the bureaucracy to which he belonged, whenever he hears of any serious proposal for reform, or approaches within speaking distance of an educated Indian, a sudden frenzy seizes him, and he loses, not only his judgment, but his power of seeing or saying things straight. In chapter after chapter he pours out abuse and contumely upon all persons, ideas, and principles that do not succeed in pleasing him. That is all very well; it is the sort of thing we are accustomed to from peppery old colonels and pensioned civil servants who miss their "boy" when they dress for dinner. But far worse than rage is subtle and pervasive misrepresentation.

Take one instance of the simplest kind. Everyone now knows the cry "Bande Mataram," the watchword of the reform party in India, and the beginning of the Sanscrit national song. It is an invocation to India, expressing deep devotion to her service. Probably no one in the world, certainly no Indian, had ever given it any other interpretation. Yet this is what Mr. Rees says:—

> "The words, however, mean not: 'Hail, motherland!' but 'Hail, Mother!' 'I reverence the mother'—that is to say, Mother Kali, the goddess of death and destruction. The word mataram is never used in the sense of the mother country. . . . The expression, in fact, is on all fours with the cry: 'Victory to Mother Kali!' which is associated with many scenes of riot and bloodshed. It is an appeal to the lower instincts and ideals of Hinduism in its most demoralising aspects."

We believe Mr. Rees is a good linguist; indeed, he is rather fond of telling us so himself. Yet he can hardly know more about the language of "Bande Mataram" than a highly educated Bengali who has thus translated the opening lines:—

* "The Real India." By J. D. Rees, C.I.E., M.P. Methuen & Co. 10s. 6d. net.
"The Causes of Present Discontents in India." By C. J. O'Donnell, M.P. Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d. net.

"Hail to thee, Mother! To her I bow,
Who with sweetest water overflows,
With dainty fruits is rich endowed,
And cooling whom the south wind blows,
Who is green with crops that on her grow;
To such a mother down I bow!

With silver moonbeams smile her nights,
And trees that in their bloom abound Adorn her."

And so on. The English is bad, as verse in a foreign language usually is; but we suppose no sane man ever before doubted that in those words the land of India was described. Lest, however, some reader should suspect the translation of being the deep-laid plot of a wily Bengalee, let us take the well-known version by Mr. Lee, late of the Indian Civil Service. It is rather more beautiful, though not so close:—

"My Motherland I sing,
Her splendid streams, her glorious trees,
The zephyr from the far-off Vindyan heights,
Her fields of waving corn,
The rapturous radiance of her moonlit nights,
The trees in flower that flame afar,
The smiling days that sweetly vocal are,
The happy, blessed Motherland."

If there is still anyone who believes that the word "Mataram" is addressed to the goddess Kali or to anything but the land of India, let us next go to the origin of the song. It was written by Bankim Chandra Chatterji, the Bengali novelist and poet, and appeared in his historic novel called "Anandamath." In a scene two of the characters are walking at night across an Indian plain. One of them "felt his heart fill with joy at the sight of the land lulled in peace under the silver moon," and he began to sing the lines now so famous. The other asked, "Who is the mother?" but the poet only sang on. "It is our country, and no mortal mother!" cried his friend, and then the poet answered:—

"We have no other mother but our country. There is a saying, 'One's mother and the land of birth are high as heaven.' We regard the land of our birth as nothing else than our mother herself. We have no mother, no father, no brother, no wife, no child, no hearth or home; we have only the mother,

Who with sweetest water overflows,
With dainty fruits is rich endowed."

So it goes on, the relation between the motherland and the children being elaborated in a long discussion.

Now, Mr. Rees is perfectly aware of the song's origin. He tells his readers, quite rightly, that it comes in the "Anandamath." To a good linguist, as he justly and rather frequently says he is, it would have been little trouble to have consulted this original passage. As we cannot believe his misrepresentation was deliberate, we can only suppose that, rather than take that little trouble, he has jumped at the conclusion that the "Mataram" of the poem is "Mother Kali, the goddess of death and destruction," and he uses this careless perversion of the truth to lash the religious feelings of English readers into hatred of the song and of the peoples of India who regard it as their national poem.

Such misrepresentation works like a venom on both the races concerned, poisoning English and Indian natures alike. Speaking at Arbroath, Mr. Morley rightly said that "India is the only country where bad and overbearing manners—disagreeable in all countries—are a political crime." Of that political crime only too much may be seen in the behaviour of many Anglo-Indians towards the people of the country. But what description can be too strong for misrepresentations that can only have the effect of increasing suspicion and scorn among our own people and of rousing Indians, educated and uneducated alike, against the injustice of calumnies which they are powerless to contradict?

We have been at the pains to track down one of these misrepresentations, simply as an instance; but they are scattered through the chapters. Indeed, the whole book misrepresents the educated classes in India and the reforms at which they have been aiming during the last quarter of a century. When Mr. Rees does not openly attack a man of Mr. Gokhale's unimpeachable character, he lurks behind a "suggestion of the false." He writes, "Certainly in England his utterances have been such, &c.," implying that Mr. Gokhale keeps one voice for England and another for India. He further remarks that it would do Mr. Gokhale good to come under Russian methods.

Indeed, Mr. Rees's belief in Russian methods is very remarkable in a mind so confident of the justice and perfection of the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy. Quoting a characteristic phrase of Gortchakoff's that "Asiatics respect only visible and palpable force," he maintains that "this is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." In praise of the Russian massacres of Tekke Turcomans, he airily remarks, "Nothing is so humane as severity leading to fear and peace." He sees no method of dealing with the present reform movement in India but by suppression and continually more suppression. We think his only proposal of actual reform is to increase the number of Indians on the judiciary side of the Service—the side that is least popular and least respected. For the rest, his advice, in brief, is to suppress English education, to suppress Western literature, to suppress freedom of speech and newspapers, and to "control the Congress," which he regards as a pernicious assembly of "Babu agitators and their dupes."

It is with profound regret and apprehension that we see the appearance of such a volume at the present crisis. The danger to India and to our rule arises, not from the demands of the educated classes who are developing a fitness for political responsibility, not from the wild utterances or deeds of a few men. The danger arises from the blindness of such as Mr. Rees, who cannot read the signs of change, and will admit no adequate reforms into the system in which they have become petrified. We are glad to believe that Mr. Rees is an exaggerated specimen of his class, and that few even among the most hardened Anglo-Indians would support his position without reserve. If we wish for a complete contradiction to that position, we have, in fact, only to study the brief and clear statement of Indian discontents set forth by Mr. O'Donnell, a Civil Servant of equal service with Mr. Rees, and one who spent his life in the Bengal provinces themselves. But whilst we deplore and marvel at many things in Mr. Rees's book, we more than all deplore and marvel at the reasons which induced the author to describe himself, even temporarily, as a Liberal.

The literature of Scotland is full of ecclesiastical biographies. Indeed, so much has been written in this department that perhaps the best idea of Scottish ecclesiastical history is to be had from the biographies of the leading men of the various periods. But official biographies valuable as dealing with public activities rarely reveal the deeper elements of personality. In this sphere Scottish nature is peculiarly reticent. The more devout a Scotsman is, the more jealously he guards his utterances, as if in process of expression the religious emotions lose their sacredness. Now and again, by the publication of diaries and exceptionally well written memoirs, the reader is taken behind the veil of ecclesiastical life and brought face to face with the Scottish character, with its strange combination of deep tenderness and intense stoicism, its genuine humility and undoubted self-reliance, its capacity for enthusiasm and its equally marked self-control.

It is well that we should get behind the public estimates of men to the innermost chambers of their personalities. Few biographers are competent to reveal the inner working of the soul. Frequently the task is best done by the man himself. How vividly, for instance, we get to know the famous Scottish divine, Thomas Boston, from the soul-piercing passages of his diary. In the absence of diaries we have to fall back upon the tribute paid by members of the family. In such a case the task is as difficult as it is delicate, and to discharge it successfully demands a kind of talent which is akin to genius. We can give no higher praise to Dr. Robertson Nicoll's portraiture of his father than to place it in the same rank with Dr. John Brown's famous sketch of his father in the biography written by Dr. Cairns; both studies are unique in Scottish ecclesiastical biography. Dr. Nicoll, like Dr. John Brown, possesses the true literary art of seizing the essentials of a personality, freeing it, so to speak, from irrelevances, and making it stand out in clear outline with a background of reverential sentiment which is never allowed to degenerate into sentimentality. As a piece of literary art Dr. Nicoll's work is perfect.

* "My Father: An Aberdeenshire Minister. 1812-1891." By W. Robertson Nicoll. Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. net.

At first sight, what could seem more commonplace than the outward circumstances of the life of Dr. Nicoll's father? Consumed by no popular ambitions, haunted by no desire for fame, content faithfully to discharge his duties as a rural minister, the elder Nicoll lived his life undisturbed by the din and confusion of the great world. What, then, gives Dr. Nicoll's portrait of his father its indescribable charm? Is it not the fact that in the book we have the revelations of a type, the existence of which is known to those who know Scottish character intimately. How true, for instance, to Scottish character is the description given by Dr. Nicoll of the effect of his mother's death upon his father. There was no outpouring of grief, no outburst of distracted passion; a simple bending of the head in calm resignation, and a reticence more eloquent than words. In reading the description we were reminded of the description by Dr. John Brown of his mother's death. With great strength of will and mastery of his emotions, the bereaved father, turning to his motherless children, simply said, "Let us give thanks." And how tremendously Scottish, too, the fact noted by Dr. John Brown that his father preached the funeral sermon—everyone in church in tears, himself outwardly unmoved. It was, remarks Dr. John Brown, "part of the old Scottish character—calm to coldness outside, burning to fierceness, tender to agony, within." It was this stoical side of the Scottish clergy, this almost superhuman self-command, this ability to submit with sublime resignation to the decrees of Providence in the domestic sphere which in days of great upheaval like the Covenanting and Disruption periods transformed stoicism into heroism.

Much has been written about the fanaticism of the Scottish clergy; it is time attention was drawn to the heroic element in their nature. We do not refer to the heroism of the Covenanting type, but rather to the heroism displayed amid the humdrum commonplaces of life, the heroism that shows itself not in dramatic display with the whole world as audience, but the native heroism of soul which faces and conquers in silence difficulties which would baffle ordinary mortals. Dr. Nicoll's father made no pretensions to the heroic, but no one but a youth of heroic fibre could have passed through triumphantly the ordeal so vividly described as follows:—

> "My father never complained of his hardships at college, and, indeed, never referred to them. But from these letters I find that he had a bursary of about £12 a year, of which £8 had to be paid in fees. This left £4 for a session of twenty weeks. The young student rented a garret for a shilling a week, furnished it somehow, and for the rest subsisted mainly upon provisions sent in from the country by his brothers. As he had to pay for books and for clothes, he was reduced to almost desperate poverty, and was unable for long periods in the cold winters to have any fire at all. He writes to his brothers: 'The coals I got last have lasted well, as it is nearly six weeks since I got them, and they are not yet done. I have been more in proportion for coals than for peats, especially at the beginning, as I was so ignorant how to use coals. I then required about two pennyworth weekly, but a pennyworth is now sufficient, and if the weather continues as it has been for some days past, I intend to use very little fire. I will kindle my fire but once or twice in the week for boiling my eggs.' In another letter, evidently in response to affectionate inquiries, he says: 'With regard to my being without fire sometimes, it is a matter of no importance, as when the weather is warm I can do well enough without it, and when it is cold I always kindle it. I have not bought either milk or ale since I came in. I take treacle and water instead of them. I did not like it well for some time, but I like it well now, and take it once or twice daily. I could not do without something of that kind, bread and cheese making me so thirsty.' In another letter he explains that his stock of money was reduced to twopence. It would appear, then, that he contrived to exist for five months of the Aberdeen winter for about £4."

In his love of knowledge for its own sake Dr. Nicoll's father was a typical Scot. Certainly in the matter of book collecting he broke the record, and his passion for knowledge, undiluted by purely personal motives, in its intensity could not be surpassed. But in earlier times, when knowledge was difficult to acquire, the passion for it was keen in Scotland among all classes of the community. The present writer has known working men with a knowledge of history and literature which would put to the blush Oxford and Cambridge dons. He recalls to mind one man, a quarryman, who spent his leisure hours in grappling with the deepest problems in metaphysics, and another, a laboring man whose eldest son taught him writing, and who, unaided, pursued arithmetic as a hobby to the extent of mastering the cube root. In these cases knowledge was not pursued with a desire for advancement in life; it was valued and studied purely for its own sake.

In his religious attitude the elder Nicoll was a typical Scot. With him, says his son, religion was all in all, first and last, but to his children he never spoke directly about religion. Here, too, the element of reticence bulks largely. Even to his nearest and dearest the religious Scotsman cannot unbosom himself. To what is this reticence due? Largely a matter of temperament, it is also in great measure due to the Calvinistic form of Scottish religion. In Calvinism the dominating conception is the sovereignty of God—a conception which, when it sinks into an earnest mind, tends to produce a peculiar feeling of awe, a solemnity too sacred for utterance. It was not in conversation but in his private devotions that the religious Scot found expression for his intense interest in the everlasting welfare of his household. The diaries of saintly Scotsmen of olden times indicate that it needed contact with the eternal to dispel the frigidity which prevented the heart from expanding in the ordinary circumstances of daily life. Even the presence of death could not dispel the temperamental reticence. When he knew that he was dying the old man, says Dr. Nicoll, merely remarked, "It is a solemn thing." With calm, steady outlook he had long since taken the measure of life. He had kept the faith, he had ended his pilgrimage, and was ready to depart into the Unseen. How typically Scottish it all is!

Perhaps the chief merit of Dr. Nicoll's book is to call attention to an aspect of life which in these days of hustle and bustle is apt to be overlooked. The world in a deeper sense than in Wordsworth's time is too much with us. Everything is pressed into the service of publicity. Life has so many demands that the pursuit of ideals for their own sakes is well nigh impossible. What we learn from Dr. Nicoll's book is the vast amount of calm happiness that goes along with diligent discharge of daily duties and energetic pursuit of the intellectual ideal, unmixed with feverish craving for popularity or any form of personal ambition. Reading the record which Dr. Nicoll has given of his father, after perusing much of modern biographical literature, is like a saunter through a cool sequestered rural scene after a day's heated turmoil in the City.

A VETERAN REVIEWER.*

THE interest of Mr. Church's book is contained in the fact that its author claims to have written some forty thousand reviews. One's curiosity is excited as to the kind of literary deity who has thus sat in judgment on multitudes of books and bookmen—some, at least, with a heart and a pulse behind them. Writers who have devoted years to saying something to the world in prose or in poetry have been brought to the bar of this critic's judgment. Mr. Church is a clergyman of the Church of England. He has himself written some seventy books, three, at least, of which are known to a considerable audience. His "Tacitus," which he translated in conjunction with his cousin, Mr. Brodribb, is a standard work; his "Stories from Homer" make very pleasant reading for children, although they are hardly to be compared with Lamb's "Adventures of Ulysses," which Mr. Church calls "Tales from the Odyssey"; his little book on "Ovid" again, for "Blackwood's Ancient Classics," is quite competent. Neither in these, however, nor in any of Mr. Church's works that we have seen, do we find any special qualification for the reviewing of all kinds of literature; nor does this book, with its small inaccuracies of name and title, incline one to accept him as thus qualified.

EPITOME OF THE SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY OF HERBERT SPENCER.

By F. HOWARD COLLINS. With a Preface by HERBERT SPENCER.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

Mr. Church seems to have been for many years an active preacher. For a time he was curate to Frederick Denison Maurice at St. Peter's, Vere Street. We fail to find any clear vision of that interesting man, but it is some token of merit in Mr. Church that he can make a joke at his own expense:—

> "Have you been to St. Peter's lately?" his cousin asked of a friend who admired Maurice.
> "No," was the reply; "the last time I heard the curate, and that was very discouraging."

The fate of the forty thousand writers of books who have had to wait upon the verdicts of Mr. Church happened in this wise. Mr. Church met Mr. Hutton, the great editor of "The Spectator." Mr. Hutton, caught by the name, assumed that he was meeting Richard William Church, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's, the brilliant biographer of St. Anselm who declined the Archbishopric of Canterbury. The subject of this volume was actually no relation to Dean Church, and did not, of course, approach him in literary knowledge, in general learning, in grace of style. But Mr. Hutton took him to his bosom, and the appraisements of contemporary authors went on apace Mr. Church devotes a chapter to the art of reviewing. We cannot honestly describe his survey as witty or wise. He is not even accurate, for Louisa Alcott did not write "Four Little Women," nor was her name "Louise"; Lewis Carroll's name was not "Henry"; and E. A. Freeman's "Life and Letters" by Dean Stephens is certainly not "one of the most admirable biographies extant." Mr. Church writes of reviewing novels by the process of "skipping." That method is surely inexcusable in a critic. What Sir Walter Scott called "the laudable practice of skipping" is less permissible to the reviewer than to the reader. The reviewer should read thoroughly. If he bring a well-furnished mind and a sympathetic spirit, his work will be the better done. Even a novelist has a right to demand this degree of care. Of course, nine-tenths of the novels of the day are not worth reading or reviewing, but these should not be reviewed.

We do not feel any happier in estimating the personal aspect of the book. Mr. Church met many interesting men. We have noted his connection with F. D. Maurice. He went on a fishing tour with Mark Pattison; he knew Calverley and Jowett. Yet we have no illumination with regard to any one of these men. Contrast, for example, Lionel Tollemache's "Reminiscences of Mark Pattison" with these trivial notes. Mr. Church has his association with scholarship, but for the reviewer of thousands of books his equipment of insight and of inspiration seems to have been slight.

A NOVEL OF PROPAGANDA.*

"Mr. Crewe's Career," though somewhat elementary as a work of art, will no doubt have a marked effect as a piece of social propaganda for purer politics in America. The subject is the struggle of the people of a State against the political tyranny of the railroads. In the words of the hero, Austin Vane, "the North-Eastern Railroads have seized the Government of this State for three reasons: to throttle competition, to control the railroad commission, and so increase dividends, and to make laws which enable them to bribe, to pay less taxes, and to manipulate political machinery. It is a natural evolution: the railroads, before being consolidated, had to square the political "bosses"; and when they gained the seat of power they naturally "substituted their own political army to avoid being blackmailed." Being the most powerful corporation, with an enormous revenue, the railroads soon manufactured a political machine which destroyed the people's government. Such is the indictment brought in "Mr. Crewe's Career" against the tyranny of the great corporations, which, by the author's simile, are a feudal system, mobilising a well-trained army of vassal office-holders, and sending round word to the holders of fiefs whenever the people threaten to rise in rebellion. It is a picturesque subject, and Mr. Winston Churchill has treated it broadly and attractively, so that the English reader readily grasps the plan of battle and the disposition of forces without getting doubtful or confused.

"The preacher of righteousness," says an American writer, with unconscious irony, "is a not unfamiliar or negligible figure in America's political activity. He thrills a people whose deepest instinct is an ineradicable sense of moral values." We are relieved to hear it, and now that the Railroads seem to be losing their grip on the Legislatures, it is natural to find that in certain States "the politicians are beginning to believe that they must sympathise with every act of hostility to the Railroads as a condition of success." But the particular State in which Mr. Winston Churchill has pitched the conflict in his novel is not a Western State, such as Minnesota, the Governor of which, we hear, has lately ratified a revolutionary freight rates and passenger rates Act. It is, we gather, one of those eastern States in which the populist movement has scarcely got under weigh.

The naïveté of the author's artistic method is shown in the idyllic contrast he draws between the two men who control the fortunes of the North-Eastern Railroad, Mr. Flint, the President, and his legal adviser, the Hon. Hilary Vane, and their pure and upright children, Victoria Flint and Austen Vane, who, of course, fall in love and run counter to their parents' crooked policy. We do not believe in the candid innocence of the fascinating Victoria. She is a stock tradition of the Anglo-Saxon theatre, this pure and trusting heroine who, lapped in luxury, never dreams of questioning her hard father's methods and business code of ethics, till the moment comes when, enlightened by her lover, she is "satisfied with nothing less than the truth," and her "life-long faith" in him is broken thereby. We fear that in real life Victoria would have been quite prepared to speculate for the fall in North-Eastern securities. Nor can we accept the high-souled Austen Vane as a figure representative in any sense. He has the moral tone of an Emerson, the brains of a Lincoln, and the purity of a Sir Galahad. He is is obviously constructed to flatter the idealism always strong in the great community of hard-headed business citizens of the United States. His career is improbable: after a wild youth, he has gone West and shot his man, and then returned to the home of his fathers, where by turns he patronises, and is filled with a dumb sorrow and compassion for the erring ways of the Hon. Hilary. He takes up and wins a suit for a suffering farmer against the tyrannical North-Eastern Railroads, but he is too magnanimous in his filial affection to accept a nomination for the Governorship of the State, when all the honest citizens come thronging round, entreating him to be the "people's man."

It is a very touching conception, but we may say candidly that we distrust the bona fides of these idealised figures. There is an unpleasant flavour of moral bunkum, moreover, in some of the situations, as in the scene where the Hon. Hilary, bowed and broken by his uneasy sense of a life mis-spent, defies his old friend the President of the North-Eastern Railroads, and says, "I'm glad to have found out what my life has been worth before I die." The radiant and unselfish Victoria, who, by the by, is wearing "a simple but exquisite gown, the creation of which aroused the artist in a celebrated Parisian dressmaker," with an "illuminating smile" pierces "the hard layers of the Hon. Hilary's outer shell, and hears the imprisoned spirit crying with a small, persistent voice—a spirit stifled for many years and starved." Then the Hon. Hilary has a stroke. It is a little simple, this "triumph of the right," as is also the ethical flavouring of the love-making between the spotless Austen and his bride, who has a "fierce faith that it was his destiny to make the world better and hers to help him."

When, however, we leave the sentimental trimmings on one side, and get to the real "business politics," we may congratulate Mr. Winston Churchill on having got his knife well into the Corporations. The picture of the wire-pulling "Chiefs," the Hon. Brush Bascom and the Hon. Jacob Botcher, and the bribed Speaker, General Doby, and the bribed Governor, the Hon. Asa P. Gray, whose suite of rooms in the State House communicates through sliding doors with the Railroad Room, the famous Number Seven, where all the prominent politicians, who have the Legislature in their pockets, foregather, is admirable. American politics may change on the surface, but the atmosphere in which the Botchers and Bascans have their being is seem ingly the same as in the 'Sixties, when Dickens roused the resentment of a continent with his "American Notes." The nominal hero of the tale, the millionaire, Mr. Crewe, whose ambition is to make his mark in the State Legislature, and who in pursuance of this ambition leads the rising rebellion against the North-Eastern Railroads, is a mere deus ex machina, evolved by the author for the purpose of exposing the innumerable corrupt little games of the enemy. Perhaps the best figure in the story is Mr. Hamilton Tooting, the young man who is retained by the Corporation to write the "noble parts" of the Governor's inaugural addresses, but is so badly recompensed that he carries his services, and many copies of confidential reports, over to the other side. The meanness and trickery of the political atmosphere would depress the reader's spirits if it were not for a strong sense of humour infused between the lines of the exposure of this "monumental farce" of "The People's Government, made for the People, and answerable to the People." The social propaganda for "purer politics" is sound enough, but our only doubt, after reading the novel, is where the reformers are to come from. And as it is as well to hear both sides of the case, we will quote the defence for the Corporation put into the mouth of the hard-headed president, Mr. Flint:—

> "'I don't say the service is what it should be,' he went on, 'but give me time—give me time. With all this prosperity in the country we can't handle the freight. We haven't got cars enough, tracks enough, engines enough. I won't go into that with you. But I do expect you to understand this: that politicians are politicians; they have always been corrupt as long as I have known them, and in my opinion they always will be. The North-Eastern is the largest property holder in the State, pays the biggest tax, and has the most at stake. The politicians could ruin us in a single session of the Legislature—and what's more, they would do it. We'd have to be paying blackmail all the time, to prevent measures that would compel us to go out of business. This is a fact, and not a theory. What little influence I exert politically I have to maintain in order to protect the property of my stockholders from annihilation. It isn't to be supposed,' he concluded, 'that I'm going to see the State turned over to a man like Humphrey Crewe. I wish to Heaven that this and every other State had a George Washington for governor, and a majority of Robert Morrises in the Legislature. If they exist, in these days, the people won't elect 'em—that's all. The kind of man the people will elect, if you let 'em alone, is a man who brings in a bill, and comes to you privately and wants you to buy him off.'
> "'Oh, father,' Victoria cried, 'I can't believe that of the people I see about here! They seem so kind, and honest, and high-principled.'
> "Mr. Flint gave a short laugh.
> "'They're dupes, I tell you. They're at the mercy of any political schemer who thinks it worth his while to fool 'em. Take Leith, for instance. There's a man over there who has controlled every office in that town for twenty-five years or more. He buys and sells votes and credentials like cattle. His name is Job Braden.'
> "'Why,' said Victoria, 'I saw him at Humphrey Crewe's garden-party.'
> "'I guess you did,' said Mr. Flint, 'and I guess Humphrey Crewe saw him before he went.'"

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

In "The Search for the Western Sea," published by Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd., at 16s., Mr. Lawrence J. Burpee has made a bulky anthology of North-Western exploration. His book may be divided into two parts, for the seekers of the Western Sea were of two schools, impelled by different motives. The early explorers were seekers after a North-West passage to China and the East Indies; they sought by sea, and sailed from Europe prepared for the East Indian trade. Those who came later sought by land from the stations of the two great rival fur companies, in whose interests they generally travelled. The sailors, besides being, as a rule, more ancient than the land travellers, are the more entertaining of the two kinds. The accounts of their voyages are full of a dreamy, pleasant leisure; the very style of them tells us that they are comfortably over long ago. Written so prettily, even the tragedy of Hudson sounds charming. In the land-travellers we miss this leisurely and peaceful manner. The deeds they did are restlessly told; they cannot pause, as the Elizabethan paused, to say what the carpenter said when the tragedy of Hudson was in hand. We do not get from them (or, at any rate, Mr. Burpee does not extract from them) the significant, intimate personal details which give interest to so many humble early travellers, who passed the world footsore and with their eyes open, and left evidence of it. We do not come very near to these later travellers. These captains courageous, whom death could not daunt, are without much charm. They are not so interesting as Lewis and Clark, probably because they travelled quicker. Henry, who lingered, like a wise man, among the extraordinary Mandan Indians, with whom the delightful Catlin lived long afterwards, is about the best of them. MacKenzie, who looks a little like Blake, is also interesting; he is a modest man, who takes an affliction in the Elizabethan style. Fraser, who did more than any of them, is treated of less modestly. His adventures as told here "do something smack; they have a kind of taste." Yet more moving than the account of his adventures is the fact that he failed. Like all failures, he belongs to the world of the heroes. The book is beautifully illustrated with maps and photographs, and there are several good reproductions from old, rare prints.

There is plenty of evidence in Mr. F. A. McKenzie's "The Tragedy of Korea" (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.) that Japan's recent military successes have not been an unmixed gain. She now feels bound to maintain the military supremacy with which Western nations credit her, and as a consequence "she is struggling and staggering under a load that even yet may be too much for her. . . . Dear labor and high taxation threaten Japan more nearly and more seriously than any armada from foreign lands." One result of this economic pressure is the exploitation of Korea in a manner that Mr. McKenzie describes in the darkest colours. The old Court party, with its system of intrigue and equivocation, has done much to irritate Japanese feeling, but Mr. McKenzie's account of the brutalities of the Japanese soldiery and officials, of the burning of villages and the wholesale murders committed in the work of "pacifying" Korea, is a full explanation of the change of feeling towards Japan which European residents in Korea have expressed. Mr. McKenzie's book puts the Korean case with great force and his strictures on Japan are severe, but he has been an eyewitness of what he writes about, and, considering the evidence he brings forward, he cannot be charged with overstating his case. The main fact that emerges from a perusal of the volume is that Japan, despite the admirable way in which she conducted the war with Russia, is quite unfitted to deal with a weaker Power in a lower stage of civilisation, and that she has completely failed when confronted by the Korean problem. The book is a most valuable contribution to our knowledge of the present state of affairs in the Far East.

Colonel Hugh Pearse, who has already written several volumes on Anglo-Indian subjects, is the author of a "Memoir of the Life and Military Services of Viscount Lake, 1744-1808" (Blackwood, 15s. net). Lake has already been written upon by soldiers who recognised his straightforward character and his skill and bravery in the field. Colonel Pearse points out that the oblivion into which Lake's career has fallen is due in part to the fact that at the time of his death the slow transmission of news made it difficult for those at home to keep in touch with the achievements of their countrymen in India. This, together with the greater fame of Wellington, who dwarfed all his contemporaries, is the cause of the neglect. It is certainly undeserved, for Lake rendered great services to his country. He first showed his soldier-like qualities in the battle of Wihelmsthal, when, by waving the colours which he carried, he stayed a panic, and rallied his men around him. Later, he served in the Duke of York's expedition to Flanders, the Irish Rebellion of 1798, and in India under Lord Wellesley in 1801 He showed the same reckless bravery and skill in generalship in the Maratha War of 1803-6, when he captured the cities of Aligarh, Agra, and Delhi, and later pursued Holkar and compelled him to come to terms. Colonel Pearse's account of these campaigns is full of interest, and his criticisms and explanations of Lake's strategy and tactics make the book a useful one for students of military history.

We fear that to most English readers the long series of wars between chieftains and kings that make up most early Irish history are of little more interest than conflicts between kites and crows. The store of legend and romance enshrined in Irish traditions has, however, engaged many

AN AUSTRALIAN VIEW OF "PUBLIC OPINION."

Here is an Australian estimate of PUBLIC OPINION, from the Sydney Stock and Station Journal, published in Sydney, N.S. Wales:—

"This week there came to hand the very sort of paper that a busy man wants, and that is PUBLIC OPINION. I remember having seen it years ago in England, but somehow amid the multitude of things I saw at home, it failed to grasp my imagination. But it's an all right paper. You would think it was the idea on which Stead modelled his Review of Reviews.

"It is simply what it professes to be, public opinion. It gives you the opinions of leading men and leading papers in regard to the current events of the day. No man out here has either the time or the inclination to read all that is going on in the great British world, and this paper boils it all down, and gives it as purely as possible. What I like about it is the fact that the editor does not appear to have an axe to grind or fad to illuminate. That is what we need. We all have fads of our own here, because I think we are more intelligent than the stay-at-home people. If we're not, we probably think we are, so it's all the same. 'Cogito ergo sum.'" scholars of eminence such as Keating, Whitley Stokes, Todd, Bury, Zimmer, and Windisch, while Mr. W. B. Yeats and Lady Gregory have done much to introduce English as well as Irish readers to Celtic legend and poetry. The latest worker in the field of early Irish history is Mr. Arthur Ua Clerigh (better known, perhaps, as Mr. O'Clery) whose "History of Ireland to the Coming of Henry II." has just been published by Mr. Fisher Unwin (10s. 6d. net). It is an historical work of great value. Mr. O'Clery has a thorough knowledge of the abundant materials that are a cause of satisfaction and despair to the student of early Irish history. Unfortunately, he does not make clear to the reader the critical principles on which he has gone in weighing evidence. Episodes are occasionally rejected as unhistorical and others admitted without any solid reason being given. Another fault from the English reader's point of view is that Celtic spellings are used for proper names throughout. Thus it is difficult to recognise Rury in Ruidhraigh, or Malachy of "collar of gold" fame in Maeloeachlaim. Mr. O'Clery is to be congratulated on a clear, scholarly, and impartial contribution to an intricate and highly controversial subject.

A USEFUL introduction to the study of Leonardo da Vinci is the brief volume on that famous artist and all-round genius which Mr. H. H. Cust contributes to the "Miniature Series of Painters" (George Bell. 1s. net). Mr. Cust contents himself with a succinct "life," and dwells mainly on the never completed, and long since vanished, equestrian statue of Francesca Sforza, and on the two versions of "The Virgin of the Rocks." The better authenticated of the latter is, of course, in the Louvre, and the other in the National Gallery. He also gives a general indication of Leonardo's many-sided activity; while the value of the work is augmented by indices which, if necessarily curtailed, should be of great value to the student who is beginning. This gracefully written essay is gracefully dedicated to Mr. Edward McCurdy, whose researches in the field of Leonardo literature have recently done so much to increase our knowledge of a wonderful personality.

The Week in the City.

DURING the past week there has been a remarkable development on the Stock Exchange. What might almost be called a boom had been taking place in Wall Street, London, and Paris. American stocks had been lifted in many instances to about the point at which they stood when the panic occurred. On Monday and Tuesday the movement culminated, or seemed to culminate for a time, and profit-taking began. The curious thing is that, during the whole of the long and irregular rise which had been going on since February, railway traffics in the States had been getting worse and worse. Far more cars are laid up now than at any time in the railway history of America. A friend who has just returned tells me that he saw three or four miles of empty and disused trucks at a single railway centre. This is a sufficient indication of the downward tendency of manufactures and trade. During the last week or two I hear of some slight revival, especially in the textile industries. A number of woollen mills in Connecticut which had been closed are restarting. But, generally speaking, the depression is at its lowest ebb since the crisis, and no one pretends to expect much betterment until the crops begin to move. Both in the United States and Canada, however, there has been a sharp outburst of speculation, and those who have returned speak with wonder of the contrast between the abounding optimism of the financiers, and the low condition of all kinds of genuine business. All the available money and credit is being used by the incurable speculators of North America to forestall what they believe will be the effects of the bumper harvest which they confidently predict. At present, certainly, everything points to fine crops; but suppose Nature were to change her mind? Suppose, after all, the crops failed? There would be a terrible downfall, and prices would tumble disastrously. The situation therefore is very perplexing, and the genuine investor, who could hardly go wrong a couple of months ago, may well pause now and look on for a while. Other markets have moved up in sympathy, and, of course, there are still two elements that make for a rise; first, the continued and increasing cheapness of money; secondly, the continued and possibly increasing depression in trade.

THE TRADE DEPRESSION.

As to this last, the statistics of pauperism and unemployment show that Great Britain has followed the United States and Germany, though fortunately our working classes still have great advantages in respect both of employment and of the cheapness of the necessaries of life. The new tariff is bearing harder and harder upon the German workman, and in the last few weeks his favourite meat—pork—has again risen in price. The German financiers are still cudgelling their brains for new taxes, the balance of opinion among the more enlightened being that higher duties should be imposed upon tobacco and spirits. From South-Eastern Europe the harvest reports are not encouraging. The economic situation is still very bad in Russia, and even worse in Turkey. It is surprising that the Turkish investor does not take alarm and give some backing to the British Foreign Office, whose Macedonian policy would lift a heavy financial load from the back of the Turkish Empire. The report of our Consul at Adrianople makes melancholy reading, and should be put side by side with the Macedonian Blue-books. Another notable report issued during the last week is that on Poland, which draws a truly extraordinary picture of commercial and industrial conditions in Warsaw, Lodz, and the other great towns of Russian Poland.

Liver troubles are speedily and effectually cured by LIVERETS. The great disadvantage of most liver medicines is that they have a distinctly debilitating effect on the health.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

Are especially compounded to overcome this evil. Prepared, as prescribed by an eminent physician, from purely vegetable ingredients, they thoroughly cleanse the liver of all impurities and leave it perfectly healthy. And the valuable tonic properties they possess, stimulate the liver while they relieve it, and, finally, make it sound and strong enough to enable it to perform its functions in a healthy, natural way. Of all Chemists and Stores, or Post Free, 1/1½, from

THE SHAKESPEARE PROBLEM RESTATED. By GEORGE GREENWOOD, M.P. Demy 8vo, price 21s. net.

 Scholars admit that a large portion of the dramas contained in the First Folio of 1623 did not emanate from the pen of Shakespeare. Was the author of these plays really William Shakespeare? In the present work the author restates the arguments for the negative case, viz., that the Stratford player was not the real Shakespeare. No attempt is made to uphold the Baconian, or any other theory of authorship, or to arrive at any positive solution of "The Shakespeare Problem." [Immediately.

THE CREED OF BUDDHA. By the Author of "The Creed of Christ." Crown 8vo, 5s. net

The Author of "The Creed of Christ" here makes an attempt to ascertain the inner faith of the Founder of Buddhism, and reaches conclusions diametrically opposed to the views about "Buddha" which have long been current in the West. He believes that Buddhism, as taught by its founder, was identical, in the last resort, with the teaching of Christ, and that the source of both these creeds was the Spiritual Idealism of Ancient India.

 It contains a singularly well-informed and illuminating dissertation on the Indian Invasion. Undoubtedly the emigration of Asiatics into the temperate zones of the Empire constitutes the most urgent Imperial problem of our time. The period of time covered by this narrative is from the middle of September, 1907, to the end of the first week in this year. The writer considers this book will not have been written in vain if it serves to emphasize in any degree the never-failing attractions from the tourist's point of view of an exceedingly interesting group of British dependencies. Diary of the Week.

The State visit of M. Fallières, President of the French Republic, to London, has been favored with brilliant weather, and the result has been a striking combination of gorgeous ceremony and popular demonstration. The crowds have been enormous, even London sight-seers, always a little apathetic, were very cordial, and the King's tact and suavity have given singular élan to the reception. The most significant of the speeches have been those delivered at the banquet at Buckingham Palace, the King expressing the hope that "this entente will also be a permanent entente," and the President responding with the suggestion that the future would render the combination closer (reserrer). Both speeches contained phrases emphasising the peaceful side of the understanding. To these declarations a point which is far beyond their legitimate meaning, has been given by a most unfortunate article in the "Temps," now rather more closely associated with the Quai d'Orsay, and less Liberal in tone than in the days when M. de Pressensé directed its foreign policy. The "Temps," in its Tuesday issue, takes the Buckingham Palace speeches to foreshadow the development of the entente into a "formal treaty," a necessary condition of which will be the enlargement of the British Army by conscription. This suggestion, which shows remarkable ignorance of British politics, is repudiated by the Liberal Press, and even by the "Times," and is supported only by a small section of the Jingo Press. More guarded suggestions in favor of an alliance, based on military Conventions, appear in other French papers.

The King's visit to the Tsar at Reval was challenged by Mr. O'Grady on behalf of the Labor Party in the House of Commons on Tuesday. Mr. Asquith's reply was directed to minimising the significance of the State visit. It was, he suggested, the return of the Tsar's official visit on his succession, and also a personal compliment to the King's nephew and niece, whom he had not seen for seven years. It was warranted by the external relations of the two countries, and it could have no effect on the internal affairs of either. The Labor members endeavored to raise the matter on a motion for the Adjournment of the House, but the Speaker, taking rather strong ground, declined the motion. As Sir Robert Cecil had placed a blocking resolution on the paper, the subject seemed barred; but the Government has removed this obstacle, and Sir Edward Grey will now make the explanatory speech which he desires. Probably the Liberal objections would have been removed had not the Tsar personally identified himself with the organisation of the Black Hundreds. This act makes him personally responsible for a state of cruel terrorism inconsistent with civilised rule. On the other hand, it is fair to record the fact that Russian Liberal journals are using the King's visit as a welcome to Parliamentary and liberal England, the "Slovo" and other papers recalling Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's phrase, "La Douma est morte, vive la Douma!" The "Retch" insists that friendship with constitutional England is one of the most "precious traditions" of Russian Liberalism. On Thursday Sir Edward Grey stated that the visit to Reval would be "official," but that no new Treaty or Convention was under discussion between the two Governments, or would be initiated during the visit.

The week in London has been one of international hospitality. The visit of the German burgomasters, in whose entertainment both the King and the Government wisely took a share, has been followed by that of the deputation of German ministers, Catholic and Protestant, and others associated with the life and work of the German churches. On Thursday this deputation was entertained at luncheon at the Mansion House. The Archbishop of Canterbury was present, and spoke generously, if a little narrowly, of the great services of German scholarship—the re-creative work, it might truly be called—to modern theology. Meanwhile, Mr. Lloyd George has well decided to adopt Mr. Stead's suggestion of Government aid to the rapidly growing movement for organising international hospitality. Mr. George stipulates that the object of such aid must be the promotion of international peace, and that the State grant should be controlled by the Government, so that it should not be spent either foolishly or as a "provocation." This represents a real advance in the cause of peace, on which the Chancellor also spoke firmly during Monday's debate on the Budget. In twenty years, he said, the expenditure on armaments had grown by thirty millions, in a "mad competition" for which we had our full share of responsibility.

The series of Scottish elections ended triumphantly on Friday week, with the return of Mr. Ponsonby by a Liberal majority larger than any which Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman received since 1886. The Liberal strength was not tested at the General Election, but it has grown by over 1,000 votes since 1900. Mr. Ponsonby proved an extremely able and very advanced candidate, and he had the advantage of a powerful Liberal paper at his back. The election was largely fought on the Land Bill and the House of Lords, which is now shown conclusively to have acted in the teeth of Scottish opinion.

The Indian Frontier expedition is practically over. By sending General Barrett from the base at Nahakki north to Mulla Killi, and himself marching west as far as Laharai and then bending east, General Willcocks has made a circuit through Mohmand country. On Sunday at Kargha, on the return journey, he came into contact with 3,000 tribesmen, and, refusing an offer of mediation, inflicted one of the most crushing defeats in the history of frontier fighting; the tribesmen lost 300 killed and wounded. All the Mohmand clans have made their submission, and the troops, who have suffered much from heat, dust, lack of water, and ceaseless sniping, are looking forward gladly to retirement. Mr. Buchanan on Tuesday gave the usual explanation of the trouble—theology; the "Times," however, refers it to the pushing forward of the Loi-Shilman railway, notes with thankfulness that work on the railway has been stopped, and deprecates "stirring up nests of hornets on the frontier, while so many grave internal troubles are awaiting settlement in India."

On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Gladstone introduced an important Bill, intended, as he said, to make better provision for the prevention of crime. In this department of social legislation Mr. Gladstone has in the past rendered admirable services to the community. He possesses a much more intimate knowledge of this subject than any other occupant of the Treasury Bench, and his substantial services in the cause of prison and penal law reform will be remembered when more showy legislation is perhaps forgotten. The first part of the Bill deals with the reformation of juvenile offenders. It is intended to extend and develop what is known as the Borstal system. This system proceeds upon the idea that the young offender has not contracted permanent criminal habits. If properly dealt with when under detention it is possible to transform him into a law-abiding member of society. This part of Mr. Gladstone's measure is wisely constructed, and will meet with no opposition.

The second part of his Bill is intended to meet the case of habitual criminals. He proposes, in cases where the jury is satisfied that a man is an habitual criminal, that such a man, in addition to a sentence of penal servitude, shall be kept in detention during his Majesty's pleasure. He will only be liberated when the Home Secretary for the time being considers that he is fit for liberty. In coming to a decision, the Home Secretary will be assisted by a Committee of Visitors, who must hold meetings for the purpose of reporting cases to him at least every six months. Prisoners under preventive detention, or in other words under an indeterminate sentence, will be transferred from ordinary penal servitude prisons at the expiration of their sentence, or in some cases before it expires, to a special preventive establishment. This establishment, Mr. Gladstone proposes to found in the Isle of Wight. Here the convict will enjoy many more privileges, and be subjected to fewer restraints than in an ordinary penal servitude prison. The Bill is undoubtedly humane in intention, and is attacking an admitted evil. But the question of principle which it involves is a far-reaching and fundamental one. Is the liberty of the subject to be taken out of the hands of the judge, and to some extent of the jury, and placed in the hands of the administration? The words of the Act are that these offenders are to be "detained during his Majesty's pleasure." These are the words which commit a criminal lunatic to what may be and often is lifelong imprisonment.

The Finland debate in the Duma has ended, bringing with it the downfall of the moderate Constitutionalist executive in the Grand Duchy. M. Stolypin was in a difficult position; he did not want to give way to the extreme reactionaries and reintroduce the Bobrikof repression, and on the other hand he did not want to grant the Finnish claim for almost complete autonomy. His theoretical solution was to declare Finland a province of the Empire, with special privileges, his practical solution to claim for the Duma the right to legislate on all questions of an Imperial character, and to promise to lay Bills before it to settle the outstanding Imperial differences with Finland, though he left it doubtful whether Finland also would have a voice in settling these matters. Whether or not this will mean introducing the Russian police system into Finland, only the Bills themselves will show; but it is an ominous prelude that the government of the Grand Duchy has been transferred to the party which supplied Bobrikof with his henchmen, and that the extreme Right are talking of impeaching M. Gerard, the former Liberal Governor.

The shrinkage in the numbers of the Territorial Army, as compared with the strength of the forces it is to replace, has been a matter of serious comment. Mr. Haldane fixed the non-commissioned officers and men at 300,000, though he talked vaguely of aiming ultimately at 900,000 men. Lord Lucas stated on Wednesday that up to May 1, only 106,000 had transferred. The quality of this reduced force is, of course, not yet ascertainable. The criticism of the old Volunteers was that they were too many and too inefficient. It remains to be seen whether the new levies represent the cream of the old bodies. If so, a smaller and better disciplined force is to be preferred. But there is some reason to suppose that in digging up the plant to see how it was growing, Mr. Haldane has injured its roots. The conditions of a voluntary service in the auxiliary forces have been stiffened in phrasing, and to some extent in purpose. The result has been a certain shyness of joining the newly named, newly fashioned, and over-advertised force.

The Spanish Government has done a very ill-advised thing. Senhor Franco laid before King Carlos the fatal decree of February 1st, with the words "this is practically identical with the Bill just introduced in the Spanish Senate." Since then this Bill has been forced through the Senate, and is now before the Chamber. It is nominally levelled against Terrorism. One clause makes any "threatening" of associations, classes, and corporations, and their property and privileges, an offence punishable with penal servitude; in other words, it puts anti-clerical, Republican or Socialist or any Liberal propaganda beyond the pale of the law. Another clause makes it penal to publish "maliciously false" news about any trial for offences under the first clause, or even to publish any news about them that is not official. A third clause authorises the Cabinet to suspend the Constitutional guarantees in any "terroristic" district, and to establish a military court with power to suppress newspapers, dissolve societies, proclaim meetings and exile suspects.

A PRIVATE meeting of Liberal members was held at the House of Commons on Tuesday, and it was decided to offer a vigorous resistance to the policy of maintaining the Sugar Convention. Mr. Villiers, who was in the chair, and who has much of the credit of winning Brighton to Liberalism and Free Trade, contributes to another column a vigorous article under the title "Free Trade Betrayed." The Government cannot, we think, be surprised at this movement. The maintenance of the Convention has had a considerable effect on the flow of cheap sugar to this country. It offers, indeed, what Mr. Churchill called "a working model of Protection," in that it raises prices, stops imports, and sacrifices the consumer to special groups of producers acting through Governments. It is open, no doubt, to argue that it counteracts a Protectionist device, but this was not the ground upon which the Liberal Party fought the Convention when the late Government initiated it.

WE direct attention to a notable letter by Mr. Austin Taylor in another column, in support of his amendment to the Education Bill, which proposes a prior solution of the problem of the single school districts. We imagine that this important proposal would dovetail with the Bishop of St. Asaph's Bill, by extending facilities for denominational teaching to the 1,700 Council schools, out of a total of 7,000 institutions in single school parishes. This would mean a mutual concession by the Churchmen and Nonconformists. If one would surrender control of the ex-voluntary schools, the others would open State schools to special teaching wherever it was asked for. The grand question is whether such an accommodation is possible, and whether both parties would consider it a fair compromise.

MR. MCKENNA'S secondary school policy, which was so violently attacked last year, is very clearly vindicated in the new volume of regulations lately issued. It may be remembered that Mr. McKenna revised the scale of grants, giving a maximum of £5 per year per pupil to those schools which accepted his conditions, and £2 10s. to those schools which were unable or unwilling to accept them. The conditions were that a majority of the governors should be representative, that there should be no religious tests for teachers, and no denominational teaching at the public expense. A great outcry was raised, and we were told that such fundamental changes ought not to be made by administration but by legislation, and that trustees could not break their trusts. Well, either the scruples of the trustees were mythical, or the new grants have proved large enough to overcome them, for we are informed, in the Prefatory Memorandum to this year's regulations, that the "great majority" of the schools either already complied with the new conditions or are preparing to comply with them. In some cases the conditions were waived at the request of the local authority, but now the whole problem has been reduced within such slight dimensions that a time limit is fixed for the outstanding cases, and no new "waivers" will be granted after July 31st, 1909. What will Lord Robert Cecil say to this?

THE Belgian elections took place on Sunday over half the country, and resulted in an unexpected blow to the Government. The Catholic majority dropped from twelve to eight, the Socialists won four seats, and the Liberals lost two—radical changes under a proportional system cleverly designed to avert electoral cataclysms. The Opposition fought against Clericalism, educational obscurantism, and a conscription and franchise which favor the rich at the expense of the poor, but the peculiar triumph of the Socialists is due to their fierce attack upon the whole policy of Congo annexation. The Catholic Government will find it hard to carry on with so slight a majority, for its ranks are divided, and its Congo schemes have long been condemned by the nation before they could be executed.

A SINGULAR instance of the way in which the crowd, illustrating M. Le Bon's theories, yields to trivial influences and displays unbounded excitement and violence in gratifying them, has been afforded by the riots at Winchester. The provocation was of the smallest. A gun taken from the Russians in the Crimea had for some years been fixed on a conspicuous site in the town, and fenced in with railings. The other day these railings were removed, and the Winchester folk were firmly convinced that the gun was going, too, as indeed its resting place has been changed a generation ago. An indignation meeting grew into furious rioting. The mob paraded the town, a thousand strong, broke the Mayor's windows and a hundred more, smashed the street lamps, and burned a Roman chariot to be used in a pageant. The soldiers were called out, and wisely called back by the Chief Constable of the county. The Council were terrorised, and decided to put back the railings. If revolution had broken out over half Europe, the people of Winchester would probably have read about it contentedly in the evening papers. Tampering with a local treasure was a serious matter.

AN interesting link with the past has been severed by the death of Mr. Chadwick, the veteran Chartist. In 1848, Mr. Chadwick, then a lad of eighteen, was sentenced by Baron Alderson, Lord Hugh Cecil's grandfather, to six months' imprisonment for seditious speech and for inciting assemblies to "arm themselves, to wit, with pikes, swords, firearms, and other weapons of offence," in order to resist the laws. The evidence against him was doubtful. He later settled down as a lecturer on politics and temperance, and he took a considerable part in the Free Trade campaign, where his florid, dramatic oratory helped the people to realise the conditions of life that prevailed in the "hungry forties."

ON Monday the New English Art Club opened its fortieth exhibition at the Dering Yard Gallery. The collection is chiefly notable for Mr. Wilson Steer's portrait study, "The Morning Room," triumphant in the beautiful quality of its paint; for Mr. Orpen's group at a breakfast table, "A Bloomsbury Family," subtly lighted, and, despite the figures, which are as stilted and rigid as those of a Zoffany, possessed of a kind of intellectual beauty; and for Mr. A. E. John's large "Infant Pyramus." The restful color and the general design of the last-named work compensate one for the disturbing element provided by strained attitudes and by no means beautiful expressions, and the whole suggests a serious aim. Serious, too, we must assume, is the frank, primitive German ugliness of "Olilai," with the bulging eyes. But the "Three Little Things" of a drawing contributed by the same artist cannot, surely, be reckoned among the little things that matter, even by the ladies and gentlemen pictured in the background of Max's caricature "Homage à John."

Politics and Affairs.

A NEW TRIPLE ALLIANCE?

It is barely a decade since Lord Salisbury's colleagues were boasting of our "splendid isolation" in Europe. To-day, on the morning of President Fallières' visit to London and the eve of the King's journey to Reval, the world is talking gravely of our possible entry into a new Triple Alliance. The suggestion is denied by Sir Edward Grey, in words which we hope are intended to cover any extension of the Anglo-Russian agreement. Still, the new reign has made us, as we have not been since Palmerston's day, a European Power. Of the three cardinal points of the Manchester doctrine—Free Trade, non-intervention in the affairs of Europe, and laisser faire in internal politics—only the first remains. It is an evolution which the modern Liberal welcomes in principle. Non-intervention was a sterile and an impracticable ideal. It broke down whenever some abomination, like a massacre in Turkey, reminded us that the sympathies of our common humanity went beyond our Channel. Under its influence we witnessed with little concern the ruin and spoliation of France in 1870; a generation of hard experience has taught us since that disaster that any change in Europe has its reflex in our own life. We could not escape the general competition in armaments; we had all the burden of separate nationality, and none of the gains of friendship and co-operation. At last we have learned that the progress towards peace must be a concerted movement. It is the development of the conception of European solidarity which alone can bring about the formation of a Concert. To exert an influence we must quit our insularity, and take our place loyally and unreservedly among the Liberal Powers. There were many reasons why Liberals welcomed the understanding with France, and join to-day in hailing it as a permanent factor in the making of a new Europe. It meant with our nearest neighbour a lasting peace, and with our closest kinsman in the world of thought a brisker interchange of ideas. We reckoned also on finding in the humane democracy of France our best and most natural ally in such causes as the reduction of armaments, the pacification of Macedonia, and the rescue of the Congo from King Leopold's exploitation.

Public opinion was satisfied that this new relationship should take the elastic form of an "entente cordiale." What we desired was not the old type of military and dynastic alliance, but rather a species of co-operation within the Concert, comparable to the harmonious partnerships of two like-minded groups within a Parliament. The development of this delicate relationship shows how difficult it is, in a world where half the Powers move in the moral atmosphere of Bismarckian conceptions, to avoid the drift towards a mere alliance of material forces. M. Delcassé was working deliberately to organise an anti-German league. The entente itself, based in form upon a bargain about Morocco and Egypt, encouraged the Imperialists on both sides of the Channel to emphasise their territorial ambitions. It added to our difficulties that both France and England had already an ally, and neither Russia nor Japan can be described as a Liberal Power. The idealists in both countries insist that the entente is a league between two Liberal democracies. The diplomatists are working steadily for the inclusion in it of the most reactionary form of despotism. When we look to the future that peril confronts us. When we look to the past we are forced to admit that France has done little, if anything, to aid our purposes in regard to armaments, Macedonia, and the Congo. The popular sympathy survives, as cordial and as liberal as ever, but in the concrete the relationship stands in some danger of the vulgarisation of its purpose. It is essential, we think, that a definite and positive, if courteous, answer should be given to the proposals which the "Temps" has made on the occasion of President Fallières' visit. It asks us to expand the entente into a naval and military Triple Alliance, in which Russia will have a place, and incidentally we are invited to provide a "modern" army capable of sending six army corps to represent us in a Continental war. To conclude an alliance with Russia would be to stultify our whole aim of grouping the Liberal Powers for common action. To accept conscription would be to step ourselves into the vortex of militarism at a moment when we had hoped to conclude "a league of peace." The "Temps" has, indeed, done an ill-service to the entente in proposing, with what precise measure of inspiration we do not know, such a depravation of its spirit and purpose. To such a proposal no Liberal Ministry could listen for a moment, for their acquiescence would be the hour of their downfall, and not even a Conservative successor would dare to take the first steps towards accomplishing it. Far different would be the Liberal attitude to a new Commercial Treaty with France, which would be cordially welcomed by all parties but the fanatics of Protection.

Stripped of all extravagances, the idea of a formal, defensive alliance with France alone would still be open to grave objections. It would aggravate the present division of Europe into two armed camps, and delay the formation of a genuine Concert. So far from facilitating disarmament, it would almost certainly give a fresh impetus to present rivalries. It would check the tendency which Italy has shown to act with the two other Liberal Powers. It would encourage the Imperialists of both countries to pursue in Egypt and Morocco purposes of permanent occupation which may endanger peace. A people which seeks no aggrandisement, and is conscious of the duty of "good Europeans," needs no formal alliance. It need never make an enemy; it will never lack a friend. The world will not be freed from the menace of neo-Bismarckianism if the Liberal Powers attempt to meet it by adopting its methods.

The comments of the French Press make it impossible to take an easy view of the King's approaching visit to Russia. Whatever Sir Edward Grey may mean by it, it will be interpreted in Paris, in St. Petersburg, and, of course, in Berlin, as a step towards the expansion of the entente into a firm triple understanding. If King Edward merely wished to meet his nephew and niece, "whom he has not seen for seven years," the family gathering need not wear the character of a visit of State, and might have taken place on neutral ground, in Copenhagen, for example. If it were necessary for Sir Charles Hardinge to meet M. Isvolsky in order to discuss Macedonian reforms, there is no reason why they should be attended by their sovereigns. No one imagines that the Tsar is intellectually capable of delicate diplomatic work; and it betrays a total ignorance of our Constitution to suggest that King Edward is his own Foreign Minister. The visit timed to take place between the journeys of M. Fallières to London and St. Petersburg invites the interpretation which the French Press has put upon it. Liberal opinion is puzzled and divided at present, but let it once be understood that a new entente cordiale is being forged, and this hesitation must vanish. There can be no mental honesty in politics if we throw up our hats to-day because we have made a Liberal Republic our friend, and rejoice to-morrow because we have included an unpitying despotism in our embrace. We must rob the entente of its character in order to gain this new adherent, now engaged, as the French Monarchy was once engaged, in the task of withdrawing every liberty which fear forced from it in the earlier days of the revolution.

On the ground of sentiment and principle the case against the visit is clear. We all joined in denouncing the Kaiser when he went to Constantinople after the Armenian massacres. We most of us applauded when Lord Lansdowne boycotted Servia, because regicide went unpunished. Unless we choose to say that it is only the spilling of royal blood which deserves our indignation, we certainly ought not to go out of our way to salute the Tsar. He is personally the embodiment of the reaction. He has publicly joined the "Union of Russian Men," and decorated his baby heir with the insignia of the Black Hundreds. The last coup d'état involved a breach of his plighted oath. The Baltic coast which King Edward will visit is a place of bloody memories. In these ports took place the prison tortures which recalled the Spanish Inquisition. Here in the dragonnades of 1906 some 1,200 peasants were slaughtered by the troops which will salute our flag. Nothing has changed since then, save for the worse. Over 100 members of the first Duma, over 50 members of the second, are under sentence of exile or imprisonment. In the prison of Moscow is the venerable Speaker of the first Duma, M. Mouromtseff, to whom our House of Commons sent its greetings. In the prison of St. Petersburg is M. Tchaykowsky, for whose trial his English friends are pleading in vain. All Russia is under martial law. The daily average of hangings under the courts martial is eight. The total of exiles to Siberia reached in the last year some 27,000. As for the packed and impotent Duma, it has to listen to the insults of a Minister who "thanks God" that "there is no Parliament in Russia." We cannot salute the Tsar who presides over this chaos without declaring that the spectacle of his despotism leaves us unmoved. If it be said that our duty is to "mind our own business," then the conclusion surely is that our flag ought not to go to Reval. This premature desire for a rapprochement with Russia is the perversion of a sound but insufficiently analysed instinct. It is well even now to make an end of the Imperial rivalries which ruined our relations with Russia during the latter half of the past century. But it is possible to do business in a spirit of mutual forbearance with the Russian Foreign Office; it is possible even to combine with it for common action in such a question as that of Macedonia, without committing ourselves to an emotional attitude of cordiality and approval which, in its turn, might well harden into material support.

THE MOOD OF EMPIRE.

Empire Day has come and gone. The Imperial Press has revelled in that peculiar mixture of large numbers with still larger words which exerts such a fascination over the modern reader. The "Daily Mail" "drops into poetry," and compresses its whole activities into the absorbing emotion expressed by the Flag which occupies its entire contents-bill. As an appropriate pendant, one of its pages is a picture of sun and earth with "Lipton's" written large across them. There has been a falling on the necks of Frenchmen, those falling most heavily who the other day were bidding them mend their manners. The virtues of a "self-contained Empire" have been expatiated on in terms that do not glow the less because niggardly figures, supplied by a Board of Trade that refuses to think Imperially, show that more than two-thirds of our trade is done with foreign countries. General Botha, we observe, joins the general celebrations by sending a personal message to the Jewish school children of Sheffield. This is a pleasant reminder of what Liberal policy has done for Imperial unity. But Botha knows well that much the same mood of Empire, assidiously cultivated by journalistic rhetoric and by commercial shrewdness, is the temper in which his home was burned to the ground, and women and children calmly consigned to the horrors of the Concentration Camps. It is all play now, because common sense and good feeling have for the time got the upper hand. But it is the play of sheathed claws, and the turn of events may easily bring to the top once more the passions that devastated a sub-continent.

It is impossible to discuss the "Empire movement" without bearing these passions in mind. On the surface it looks pretty and patriotic enough, and we have no doubt that schoolboys enjoy it. The movement has even produced a catechism for children in which the most blameless moral sentiments are quaintly intermingled with statistical information and the wearing of "ox-eyed daisies and bachelor's buttons." To obtain a full-sized flagstaff and Union Jack, a large "Navy-League" or "Howard-Vincent" wall map of the Empire, and systematic instruction in good citizenship is to be the ideal of every school. To know the King's full title, occupying four lines, and the area and population of the British Empire, to admit the lamentable truth that the Chinese Empire approximately equals it in population, but to insist firmly on its superiority in area, to know the names of the Continents and that the British flag flies in all of them, and to remember that the British Empire owns half the shipping of the world—these are the foundations of a civic education. The King is to be honored and obeyed because "the Powers that be are ordained of God"; but also, by a judicious after-thought, "because King Edward represents the Majesty and Honor of the Empire, and because, as a constitutional Sovereign, he has sworn to uphold the laws and to govern his subjects with justice and equity." The little fact that it is not his business to govern them at all is perhaps omitted as too advanced. The watchwords of the movement are "Responsibility, Duty, Sympathy, and Self-sacrifice," and the practical conclusion of the whole matter is that the Union Jack ought certainly to be flown on May 24th from all public buildings and church and chapel towers and steeples and from private houses.

It seems almost profane to summarise, we would not say to smile at, this blend of copy-book headings, primitive political philosophy, pretty button-holes, large statistics, and gay display of bunting. But the whole thing has two sides. To some of its promoters it is an innocent attempt to cultivate the wider patriotism in a somewhat childlike, but quite single-minded, spirit. For them the question of Empire presents no more problems than it does to the healthy schoolboy bred in the traditional patriotic history books. The British Empire is the biggest thing in the world, the greatest creation of man. Everything about it is in millions, most of it in hundreds of millions. It impresses by its size, and to know its figures is a lesson in arithmetic for good school-children. As it is the greatest of man's works, so it is by far the best. It is free, tolerant, and unaggressive. The wars by which it reached its present extent were all forced on it by the unreasonableness of its neighbours, or undertaken by special request on behalf of the inhabitants themselves. It never sought goldfields nor territory. It is the land of liberty, not for white men alone but equally for Hindu or for Zulu, and for more than a century it has rid itself of the bad traditions to which other Empires cling. It may be said that by putting this conception of the Empire before school children we are at least implanting in their minds a certain ideal, and training them to a sense of their own responsibility in relation to that ideal. But the question is whether we are not rather confirming the tendency, which is so natural as to require little artificial support, to believe their own country to be everything that it should be, especially in relation to foreigners and dependencies, and to close their minds resolutely to all criticism. Are they not, in point of fact, being unconsciously trained in that form of patriotism which is more closely allied to self-glorification than to self-sacrifice? Suppose that instead of speaking so much of Empire, the catechism said a little more of commonwealth, of liberty, and of mutual help. Suppose that, instead of sycophantic words about royalty, it began by explaining that the King owed his present position in the minds of the people to the fact that though nominally Ruler, he is really the Hereditary President of a free Commonwealth; and instead of laying so much stress on the size of Empire, it pointed out that the imperishable fame of England is to have led the way to personal liberty and free institutions, and that her titles to glory were only tarnished when she gave herself up to militarism and conquest. Suppose it concluded with the lesson that the great struggle of our time is against the materialism which uses cheap splendor to cover its nakedness, and that the main social duty of each nation within the Empire is to make the conditions of life lighter for the masses of its own people. The catechism would then, we think, have taught a deeper, though less exciting, lesson. If it had rounded off its teaching with the remark that the union of so large a portion of the world under one head made for peace, and, given due forbearance, facilitates the exchange of ideas, and even of services—that it is, in a word, desirable in so far as it marks a stage towards the union of humanity—it would have added the conception of a "sane Imperialism" to that of a living patriotism.

But in truth we have looked at one side only of the whole movement. The mood of Empire expressing itself in figures and copy-book headings and ox-eyed daisies is one thing, the awakened passions of Empire are quite another. All the interests, commercial, journalistic, and professional, all the factors of feeling and suggestion, all the ignorant and misinformed idealisations which combined to lead us into a dozen years of reaction and blunder and misery, are alive to-day and at work. The waving of the flag is their fair-weather shape. But they only wait the opportunity to raise the storm again. Meanwhile, as the opportunities of practical Imperialism are lessened, they will fall back on the school and train the young. It will be the easier ultimately to persuade the people to acquiesce in conscription, Protection, and all the burdens that the greatness of Empire will thrust upon them. We do not think that Lord Meath contemplates these consequences, nor that he fully realises the nature of the forces which he helps to set to work. But there are plenty of astute men who do understand them, and are not merely waving the flag as a pleasing exercise. As one also of their own prophets has said, the British flag is a great commercial asset.

THE WEALTH OF ENGLAND.

We need not discuss with much seriousness the merely partisan aspect of Monday night's debate on the Budget. Mr. Austen Chamberlain may, if he pleases, regard the process under which with one hand he made provision for the extinction of the National Debt, and with the other added largely to the total indebtedness of the country, as a contribution to the cause of economy. The fact remains that under the very moderate rule of thrift set up by the Government, the bulk of our liabilities is assuming manageable proportions, and that in three years, thanks in some degree to the accidents of trade, Mr. Asquith has done as much in the way of debt reduction as his predecessors achieved in ten. It is not necessary to swell our praise of these useful economies into a pæan of exultation. The Debt is still higher by 70 millions than the figure at which it stood before the South African War. And we may say at once that when Mr. Chamberlain, in estimating the Chancellor's engagements for 1909, calls for an addition of four millions to the Naval Estimates, he calls, so far as the Liberal Party is concerned, in vain. No such addition is necessary or possible. Mr. Chamberlain was good enough to fix next year's fresh liabilities at ten millions, nearly a third of which are to be devoted to countering the new German naval programme. This is a mere reversion to the excesses, now universally deplored, which provoked the new international start in shipbuilding. It would effectually destroy the general tendencies of Liberal finance. They have been directed both to checking the flow of mere extravagance, and to diverting the national expenditure to productive activities. If trade is to go on declining, both these methods must be rigorously maintained.

We cannot say, however, that we believe in the old long depressions. There is, it is true, some rebound from the last tremendous leap forward of the national wealth. But both productive and consuming power continually increases, and it is the business of a wise Government to minister to both, and to see that the latter is spread over a continually broadening surface of the general population. It is precisely at this point that we touch the true impediment to a widely spread prosperity. At one end of the scale the wealth of this country is enormous. We hardly need to measure its abundance by statistics. The eyes of the average Londoner furnish evidence enough. The existence of miles of streets of houses, every dweller in which must possess an income of at least £4,000 a year, the appearance of dozens of new restaurants and hotels, where few guests dine at a cost of less than a sovereign a head, the unheard-of extravagance in women's dress, the rapid substitution of costly motor cars for horses, the spread of the custom of dividing fashionable life between town and country, the increasing luxury of travel and of every kind of social pleasure and appurtenance, tell their own tale of the toll that England takes of the world's treasure. But there is more exact testimony than this. As Mr. George McCrae showed in detail in these columns, that part of the national income which is subject to income tax amounted in 1896 to 704 millions. Mr. Asquith stated the other day that the assessments amounted to 980 millions, and there is no reasonable doubt that, if the process of full disclosure were applied, as it ought to be applied, to possessors of incomes exceeding £2,000, the assessments would rise to over a thousand millions. As things stand, there has in five years been an increase of well over 100 millions. The same moral applies to expert calculations of the capital wealth of the country. The Fellow of the Royal Statistical Society, whose letter we publish elsewhere, points out that we have added an average of 225 millions to our capital every year for a third of a century. At this moment this represents a national capital of 16,000 millions, to be raised, in another ten years at the same ratio of increase, to 20,000 millions!

All this is consoling enough to a Free Trade Chancellor of resource and firmness of temper, confronted with the not overwhelming task of finding six millions a year to secure a tiny measure of comfort and peace for half a million citizens who must have given over 50 years of labor to this splendidly endowed community. For it shows the baselessness of the current Protectionist idea of our having reached the limits of just and safe direct taxation, an idea which is at once pessimistic and profoundly menacing to the mass of the people. Great as are the accumulations which these figures represent, they are not the real sum of the wealth of our well-to-do and our rich. That is still hidden, and the Government is bound, sooner or later, to discover it. At present, for example, there is no machinery for requiring companies to disclose the names and holdings of their shareholders, though there seems no reason why such information should be withheld when it is necessary to find out the taxable capacity of the whole people. But the point on which we would insist is that the wonderful advance in national wealth that we have specially described applies to less than an eighth of the population. Five millions of our people certainly enjoy a thousand millions of income. The remaining 38 millions of people receive less than 900 millions of money. Yet as between these two classes, which united to bear the burden of the South African War, the 38 millions have, even counting the remission of half the sugar duty, received a smaller relief from the special taxes imposed than the favored five millions, who have all along been paying on a far lower scale in proportion to their incomes.

Still more serious is this state of things when we remember that, as Mr. Snowden's impressive speech showed, the mass of the workmen have not shared conspicuously in the enormous increase of the national wealth which we have summarised. Workmen sell labor and buy commodities. The price of commodities rose during the boom in trade, while wages have fallen in some industries, and in others have done little more than cover the rise in prices. At the bottom of this great aggregate of human beings stands a mass whose family income does not usually reach £1 a week, and never receives any large benefits from a rise of the national wealth, even at its flood tides. In other words, we have, at one end of the scale, a body of taxpayers growing every year more wealthy, and at an increasing rate of progression, exhibiting this well-being in an unparalleled ease or even profusion of living, but still so lightly taxed that only a small proportion pays even a shilling in the £ of its income; and at the other end a greater body, whose income, or consuming power, is far less elastic, or shrinks in place of expanding, while its contribution to the joint revenue is as heavy as our Free Trade system will allow. Mr. Snowden's speech was in some points extreme and in others bitter. But it did accept the old Adam Smith canon of proportioning taxation to ability to pay. By this test the justice of our present taxing system is entirely shaken. Mr. Lloyd George spoke with sympathy of this situation. Next year, we are convinced, he will deal with it in the spirit of democratic statesmanship.

THE PROBLEM OF THE WEST.

TWENTY-EIGHT years ago a Parliament was returned at a General Election in which the name of Ireland was scarcely mentioned. For the five years of its stormy career

Ireland practically excluded the mention of any other topic. To-day we are preparing plans for an Autumn Session, in which English domestic affairs occupy the first place. It is quite possible that in this same Session English domestic affairs will be brushed aside, in the insistent demand from the West for immediate agrarian legislation. Such a demand never arises unless it has been long justified. A revolution never breaks out (it has been said) until a generation after a revolution has been overdue. And agrarian revolt in the congested districts of Ireland is always a revelation of a disease which has developed for so long in neglect that it is almost past the healing. Last winter there were gloomy suggestions of disturbance, and even of violence. By the exercise of influence which jeopardised their popularity, the wiser heads of the Church and the Parliamentary Party managed to keep that agitation within reasonable bounds. The verdict was accepted that Mr. Birrell was to be given his chance. The Dudley Commission was on the eve of reporting. Legislation was promised as a result of that report. Before the demand of the peasant people for the offering of means of frugal subsistence in its own land, all other demands were to surrender. Effort, money, special powers of adjustment, division, and migration, were to result in the raising of all the uneconomic holdings of the West to a minimum economic standard. Such was the hope of immediate reform which enabled the serious statesmen to arrest, for a time, the forces of discontent and violence. "Cattle-driving" remained sporadic, instead of becoming universal. Crimes against person and property were happily rare. Ireland has been accustomed in the past only to obtain redress at the cost of revolt and fury. Each solitary reform has only been bought at the price of blood, the blood of the innocent and the guilty. The accustomed dolorous method of procedure was to be reversed. The Chief Secretary announced that reform was only possible if tranquillity were assured. Cattle-driving must cease, the agitation must be preserved within legitimate channels, if a new Land Act was desired. The one half of an implied agreement was fulfilled. To-day the field is open for the Government to realise the other half of the agreement.

The Dudley Commission report has been issued this week. The report and main recommendations are unanimous. There are various reservations and dissenting minutes, of which the most important is that of Sir Antony MacDonnell. These refer, at their highest, to points of detail; such as the constitution of the Board which is to carry on the campaign against congestion, and the nature and amount of compensation which is to be paid to the landlords as the price of their land. These details, indeed, are of great importance in the framing of a Bill and its actual working. But beyond these, however decided, remain certain large and far-reaching recommendations. The Commission, as one body, demand the treatment of congestion as a large disease requiring large remedy: with an effort, immediate and drastic, brooking no delay, to raise practically all the small holdings in Ireland to an economic level. For such a purpose they all demand the creation of a Board with compulsory powers of purchase and readjustment. They face and accept the full consequences of the cutting up of large grazing farms among small holders. They all demand the raising of present holdings to an economic level before any land is given to make new holdings for the sons of present holders or for landless men outside. In area, the main difference between the Under Secretary and his colleagues is that the former is ill-content with the West alone. The Commission cannot see migration east of the Shannon as a practical remedy for congestion: Sir Antony MacDonnell can see no other.

"In the congested districts there are two classes mainly, the poor and the destitute." "The people are very helpful to one another. The poor mainly support the destitute." Once more there arises the oft-exhibited vision of the realities of a whole population sunk, through no fault of their own, into a condition below any tolerable standard of existence. "The outstanding feature" of the greater part of Ireland's nine western counties—a bitter legacy from political upheavals and invasions, the work of man, not of nature—is "not an excessive population, but first a fairly dense population in certain areas mostly along the sea coast, where the land is hardly capable of supporting any population at all; and secondly, excessive population in districts mainly consisting of poor land but adjacent to extremely thinly populated districts of better land." Since 1879 four millions have been spent on "measures of relief"—the amelioration of a poverty which is not fluctuating but permanent. "Even yet bad harvests render further relief measures inevitable every second or third year in certain districts, and although distress is not now as acute and widespread as it was twenty years ago, this seems to be more due to the decline in population and the change of diet to food other than the potato, than to permanent amelioration in the condition of life." How is this to be temporarily or finally assuaged? Ultimately there can be but one answer, the answer of the Commissioners. There is only one commodity which can be offered to the people if they are to be preserved in their own country—the land. The work of Government is to construct some machinery by which, as smoothly and rapidly as possible, as much of the untenanted and unresidential land as is possible may be divided and let to as many of the small holders as it will supply, for the raising of these holdings from a starvation to an economic unit.

For this work the main report proposes a Board which will have practically autocratic and absolute powers over one-third of the land of Ireland. The whole of Connaught, Donegal, Clare, Kerry, and half Cork are to be handed over to its jurisdiction. The county councils of each of these nine counties is to elect a member of this Board; the remainder of twenty members should be nominated by the Crown, ex-officio members, or paid members appointed by the Crown. Exclusive control over land purchase within this vast area should be handed over to the Board. It would deliberately set itself to acquire for re-division practically all the untenanted and non-residential lands within these areas, and divide them up amongst the holders below a £10 valuation. Every acre of this available land would not be sufficient to enable them to raise all the present holdings to the £10 standard. Compulsion is absolutely necessary to supplement agreement, and compulsion should extend, not only to "free" and to grazing lands, but also to the excess of any holding over £100 valuation. The price to be paid should be based on the "average net profit income" to the landlord, allowance being made for the effect of existing economic or natural causes on the probable receipts of the next four years. Parliament should vote money for the costs of this great transference of land from landlord to peasant. The Board should be equipped to buy and resell land to the value of a million pounds each year, reckoning that it will be necessary to hold an estate on the average for two years before reselling. For this an income of three hundred thousand a year will be necessary. With such an equipment and income, congestion might be removed from Western Ireland within a generation. Sir Antony MacDonnell sees in the whole operation an expenditure of forty or fifty millions of money, involving an irrecoverable loss of some seven millions. He does not believe that so gigantic a transaction can be performed by an independent, semi-elective board. "Wherever history records a peaceful transfer of land on a large scale from owner to occupier, financed by State funds, that transfer has been invariably effected by State agency." He demands, despite the recognised and glaring difficulties, that the area of possible migration shall be extended to the whole of Ireland. He desires to acquire, if necessary, all ranches and grazing farms which are not "fattening" land, but he is opposed to "fining down" the holdings of actual occupying tenants. In the purchase price he dissents from the "net income to the landlord" standard, demanding as a substitute the actual valuation of the holding. Both report and minute of dissent deal boldly with the most difficult problem of all—the growing divergence of interest between the landless men and the men with insufficient land, each desiring the same limited commodity. Both assert that the latter of these makes the primary demand. "If the grass lands of Connaught," says Sir Antony, "are not saved from passing to local landless men, and are not primarily used for the enlargement of local uneconomic holdings and the provision of new holdings for congests, all hope of permanently relieving congestion may be abandoned." "The total land available," is the report's conclusion, "is not quite adequate for the relief of small landholders, and consequently every holding given to the son of a tenant, or to any other person not at present a landholder, will, to that extent, perpetuate congestion in the West." They have faced fairly, and can answer, the objections of those who deplore interference, by such redistribution of land, with Ireland's great cattle trade. They believe that there is danger in having so many eggs in this one basket, and that the economic as well as the social outlook demands interior cultivation, small mixed farms, an increase of tillage at the expense of grass land. "We firmly believe," they declare, "that the substitution of mixed farming on the small holdings of the West, when they have been raised to an economic standard, will conduce in a very marked degree to the well-being of the people."

The report is an historical document, advocating a comprehensive, courageous, social reform. Legislation upon its main lines is imperative. If the difficulties are enormous, so are the needs. The main lines of action are assured. Development must take place upon these lines, or upon no lines. There are none of the perplexities of divergent cries, or the choice of divergent paths, as in the social reforms of our own cities. The enterprise is colossal, but the end is worth the winning—the saving and restoration of the "small landholders of the ultimate West"; a race of men who represent "the wrecks of famine, catastrophes, and of past racial, religious, agrarian, and social storms in Ireland."

PORTUGUESE SLAVERY.

In the second year of Queen Victoria's reign she was advised by Lord Melbourne to write a letter to the King of Portugal with regard to the suppression of the slave trade. The draft of the letter is published in the recent volumes of the Queen's correspondence, and it contains the following sentences:—

> "That there is every disposition to make allowance for the difficulties of Portugal, but allowance must also be made for the feelings of England. That those feelings are as strong as they are just. That England has made great sacrifices for the suppression of that crime; that she has made sacrifices to Portugal, and that she has been extremely indignant at finding that traffic so obstinately continued to be sheltered and protected under the flag of Portugal. That Portugal must not expect that England will much longer refrain from taking effectual measures for preventing these practices."

In "the sacrifices that England had made to Portugal," Lord Melbourne probably alluded to the treaty of 1815, when we remitted in favour of Portugal a debt of £480,000 on condition she undertook by a subsequent treaty to fix the period at which the Portuguese slave trade should cease universally.

That letter was drafted just seventy years ago last 17th of May. The subsequent treaty was concluded in 1858, and in 1878 slavery was declared to be universally abolished in Portuguese dominions. We cannot say what influence Queen Victoria's action had upon this result, but to all outward appearance both England and Portugal had a right to be satisfied with their efforts to terminate the atrocious system of selling men and women as laborers upon the West African coast. Something, indeed, had been done. By the co-operation of our navy with the United States and with Portugal herself, the appalling traffic between the West Coast and Brazil was made too risky to be lucrative. Our warships were kept continually watching off the Angola ports of Benguella and Loanda, from which the slaves were chiefly shipped, and against such odds the slavers ran a poor chance of profit.

Something was done, but the mainland of Angola still remains a land of slavery, and from those two ports the natives are still shipped as slaves to labor in distant plantations from which they never return. Certainly the names in the system have been changed. The laborers are still called slaves in the country itself, but their legal title is now "serviçaes," or "contracted laborers." The slavers are now mail-boats running to Lisbon, and calling at the plantation islands of San Thomé and Principe on their way. The supply of slaves is in the hands of authorised agents, and the whole thing is nominally conducted under Government regulations. But we need not deceive ourselves with words. By slavery we mean a system under which men and women are sold for money, and compelled to labor either without their consent or against their will. That both these conditions still pervade the labor supply upon the mainland of Angola and in the Portuguese islands above mentioned is, unhappily, established by incontestable evidence. We know the current prices for men and women: they are £10, £16, or £20 upon the mainland; £25, £30, or lately even £35 upon the islands, according to quality. We know the average number of slaves exported to the islands, where, in spite of all the care taken to keep them alive, they die very rapidly; it is about 4,000 a year, and is increasing. We know the methods by which the slaves are obtained; it is by raids in the far interior, by exchange for firearms, by payment for debt or litigation, by purchase with rum or cotton cloth, by breeding on farms, and by open bargaining with former masters.

The evidence, we say, is incontestable, and the Aborigines Protection Society has taken the opportunity of the present international Conference in Brussels to lay it before the public in a careful summary by their Secretary, Mr. Fox Bourne ("Slave Traffic in Portuguese Africa," 1s.). He there collects the history and present conditions of the whole system, quoting from the statements of various travellers who have visited Angola or the islands from the time of Livingstone and Commander Cameron up to the time of Mr. Arnot, the missionary explorer, still living in Angola, of Colonel Colin Harding, our present administrator in Barotseland, and Mr. Henry Nevinson, who published a book on the subject less than two years ago. He also refers to a report by Mr. Joseph Burtt and Dr. Claude Horton, who were sent out as special investigators by three of the great English cocoa firms and a German firm in their praiseworthy desire to discover the truth and to remedy, as far as was in their power, the evils of the labor system; because these islands produce about one-fifth of the world's cocoa supply. That report, which only confirms the evidence of other travellers, has been laid before our Foreign Office and the Portuguese Government; it has also been widely circulated privately in this country.

Strictly official evidence on the same subject has also been supplied by Mr. Roger Casement, formerly Consul in Angola and at Boma, where he was among the first to draw attention also to the abominations of the Congo; by Mr. Nightingale, who has occupied the same two positions as Consul; and by Mr. Beak, who, as Acting Vice-Consul in the Congo last year, visited the district of Katanga and the Upper Kasai, from which large quantities of the Angola slaves are still obtained, chiefly in exchange for firearms. It is on this account that, by the assistance of the Foreign Office, the question is now being brought before the International Conference in Brussels, convened to strengthen the clauses of the Brussels General Act of 1892 with regard to the supply of arms and ammunitions to natives. We may hope something from the Conference; we may hope much from the public spirit and sense of humanity displayed by our chief cocoa manufacturers. But, ultimately, the remedy lies in Portugal's own hands, and it is to her strenuous and immediate action that we must look.

Owing to the representations of the Foreign Office, supporting the cocoa manufacturers, who sent a deputation to Lisbon in the early part of last winter, the Portuguese Government then pledged itself to certain definite lines of reform. It undertook to establish a genuine repatriation fund, to return the natives to their homes at the end of their contracted time, and to carry out a thorough investigation of the whole subject in Angola with a view to replacing the present recruiting agents by a proper Government system. These promises were made before the recent changes and disasters in Lisbon, and the new Ministry does not now go further than promising to send a former Governor of Benguella and the islands to make prolonged investigations that may last a year or two. The Portuguese Government will then consider whether further regulations are required. But we must point out that all these promises have been repeated several times since they were first made in 1878, and, as far as regulations go, the Code of 1903 secured every point now proposed. Repatriation and a Government system and responsible recruiting agents have all along existed on paper. The laws have been repeated or amended by royal decree about six times in the last thirty years. Their fault is that they have had no effect. The slavery continues unchecked and almost unchanged. Those unhealthy but enormously rich islands upon the equator, and that great colony of Angola, stretching from the bare mountain tract of the coast far into the interior along the high forest watershed that divides the Congo and its tributaries from the Zambesi, are still tainted by the deadly atmosphere of slavery. To land on that coast is to feel the depression and horror of it, and unless it is checked now the evil will increase. An English passenger by one of the Angola mail-ships only eight weeks ago found nearly 500 natives on board being shipped to the plantations of San Thomé. This number is considerably above the average of former years, and the increase has been continual.

It is now for Portugal, as we said, to act. We have been waiting for a fair and reasonable time. We are willing, in the words suggested by Lord Melbourne to Queen Victoria, to make allowances for the difficulties of Portugal. But, to continue those words, "allowance must also be made for the feelings of England, and those feelings are as strong as they are just." England has made sacrifices to Portugal for the suppression of this crime, and she is "extremely indignant" at finding the traffic so obstinately continued. In urging the abolition of the slave system, neither our Foreign Office nor our cocoa manufacturers have the smallest territorial or commercial interest to serve. They are influenced only by the common motive of humanity and by the international agreements to which both Portugal and ourselves are parties.

Life and Letters.

LIFE AND THE POET.

At the end of most lives there is a sense of incompleteness. How many possibilities unrealised, how many capacities unused! Whether we believe that the duration of the soul is infinite or not, we then feel that its powers were beyond calculation—its powers of pleasure and pain, experience and action. And when the end comes, how little has been done or suffered, how few the opportunities for the use of all that incalculable force! These are the commonplaces of life and death, but it may seem strange that the thought should be suggested by the final volume of Bielschowsky's "Life of Goethe" (Putnam).

For the attribute commonly given to Goethe's life is completeness. If ever there was a man who developed all his powers, received a full measure of opportunities and took them, experienced every human good and evil, and lived from first to last with a certain roundness of activity and thought, it was Goethe. He lived as a poet, an artist, a statesman, an administrator, and a man of science. He knew war and danger and travel. He was intimate with every grade of society, rich, poor, royal, and disreputable. He was on terms of friendship with most of the greatest men of his day, and in his maturity those who were afterwards to fill Europe with their fame turned their eyes to him as their greatest master. He suffered or enjoyed all the common fortunes of mankind—marriage, fatherhood, the loss of friends and wife and children, the hatred of enemies, the tempest and decline of emotions. To women he was singularly attractive, and there was hardly a week of his life in which he was not in love. He was endowed with a personal greatness and an indomitable vitality. The illness of which he died at eighty-three was only his fourth, and into the chinks and corners of a life so full and active he had contrived to stuff some fifty volumes of his works, all of them significant, many of new influence upon thought and science, and a few of that high and unquestioned rank which is called immortal—works that have passed into the common heritage of mankind, which not to know argues a man uneducated.

Yet even in Goethe's case, when the end comes and we hear the old man asking his servant to open the other shutter, we are conscious of incompleteness. We know that, like Solomon, "he spoke of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon to the hyssop that springs out of the wall; he spoke also of beast and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes; also he spoke three thousand proverbs, and his songs were a thousand and five." But what he accomplished seems trifling compared to the wonders due from such a mind. Here is the man who created Faust, Gretchen, and Mephisto, Werther, Mignon, Philine, and some lyrics that Heine declared to be the best ever sung by man. And yet how sketchy and uncertain most of his creations are! Those sixty years of tinkering over "Faust"—how obscure and confusing they have left the greater part of it in the end! In "Meister" there is no unity of intention, the treatment is frequently changed, anything that comes handy is thrown in, and the last part has no more connection than a cart-load of shot bricks. Even in "Werther," the most artistic of his longer works, the character of the heroine changes in the middle, because, though the book was only a few weeks in writing, Goethe had meantime fallen in love with a different kind of girl. We need not speak of all the other works—of "Egmont," "Iphigenie," "Tasso," "Hermann and Dorothea," "The Elective Affinities," and the many more, in which there is no live fire of imaginative inspiration, nothing of the flame that mortality cannot quench. It seems as though the great critic of his age could never criticise himself—as though this man who wrote and thought so much about art was rather unusually incapable as an artist.

Many interests and faculties were fighting in that one soul, as for the possession of a fair country. There was the will of the man of action, the delight in mixing with mankind, in guiding their counsels, undertaking their service, and getting something accomplished for the obvious good of the world or the village. During his first years in Weimar we see him directing the mines at Ilmenau, relieving the destitute weavers of Apolda, converting the University of Jena from a proverb of barbarity into the true home of German thought, prescribing for the cattle-plague, drilling a troop of hussars, repairing roads, riding out night after night to save the wooden huts of the peasants from fire. To confront this spirit of human action, of politics, and philanthropy, stood the cold and eager spirit of natural science, always urging him forward to peer more and more deeply into the secret of nature, to clasp her breasts, to unveil her infinitely varied unity. Here was a pursuit that for many years might well seem to him worth all the rest of his endeavours. We remember the 78th Venetian Epigram, and how he answers the common lamentation of his friends over the loss of the poet in him:—

"Always at botany? Always at optics? What does it bring you?
Touching some tender heart, is not that higher reward?"
Ah, yes, the tender hearts! Any bungler is able to touch them.
My one prayer is to touch, Nature, the hem of thy robe!

"People talk a lot about my poems," he used to say, "but the thing I am proud of, the thing I shall be remembered by, is my treatise on color." Even for him, it was a strangely false estimate of his true power; but it shows the devotion of his mind to the realities of external nature.

And between these great forces and attractions fluttered the shy poetic spirit, half angel and half bird, so frail and evanescent, so easily driven from the field where it was born to live. It is a talent, as he said, like virtue—of no avail unless it is practised unseen like a dangerous secret. At first sight it may seem as if he would have done better to sacrifice all his other thronging interests and pursuits to the practice of just that one mysterious and incalculable power. We might have had more immortal poems then. He was distracted, torn asunder, and diffused by all that variety of knowledge and performance. It is exactly his much-boasted many-sidedness which gives the sense of incompleteness to his life. We do not feel it in Darwin or Beethoven or in the wreck of Heine. It seems as though the true completeness of life had, after all, little to do with wealth of experience or variety of achievement, but rather with the passionate intensity of the soul's concentration. Is this, perhaps, what Paul Bourget meant when he spoke of Goethe as "the sublime Philistine"?

And, yet, torn between knowledge, action, and art, as Goethe was, it is impossible to think of failure in connection with a life so sincere and wakeful, so regardless of tradition and other people's advice. We must remember the contempt into which the name of poet had then fallen and is always likely to fall. In all the Newgate Calendar of letters there is no chapter more dreary and depressing than German literature for a hundred years before Goethe's appearance. If, by his wide activity and unrestrained interest in the world, he closed that page down for ever, all Europe owes him something. The dangers of a poet's or writer's life are well known, and there are some who would willingly go without a few excellent poems in order to enjoy the difference between Goethe's serene composure, his disregard of popularity, his frankness and sunny tolerance, contrasted with familiar literary moods—the ravenous vanity, the absorption in self, the diseased sensitiveness:—

"As peevish, cross, and splenetic,
As dog distract or monkey sick."

"Thrust your hands deep into the fulness of life," he used to say; and by his strong grip upon reality he did more than any writer of last century to restore a dignity and influence to the poet and man of letters. Even when his work is at its dullest, most diffuse, and ill-constructed, there is generally about it that note of sincerity which is one of the rarest qualities that compose genius, and it is a sincerity derived from contact with hard reality on many sides. The same sincere reality gives to his work, when it is at its very best, a "severe delight" spoken of by Wordsworth.

It is common to compare Goethe's life with the Faust to whose dubious and long-drawn story he kept returning for so many years, and the significance of the last scene cannot be mistaken. In search of the one moment to which he might cry, "O stay! thou art so fair," Faust has been led through scenes of every pleasure, both gross and beautiful; he has entered the great world and stood at the Emperor's side; he has followed the perfect beauty of Helena through classic lands; he has witnessed revolutions, wars, and the shock of armies. In extreme old age, and blinded by care, he sets to cultivating a patch of sand and wave. He calls for his labourers, and at the sound of their spades and picks his heart is full of joy. He pictures to himself the happy race that shall dwell upon these fields and daily conquer freedom. That would be a moment to which he could cry, "O stay! thou art so fair." In anticipation, he already enjoys the highest point of life, and suddenly falls back dead, not among labourers, as he had supposed, but among the Lemurs, who were digging his grave. They cram him into the trench, and Mephisto clutches him fast. But descending spirits bear him away, regardless of contracts with the Evil One. "Delivered from evil is the noble spirit," so they sing: "who without ceasing onward strives, him we have power to redeem." And if one wanted a summary of the whole of Goethe's life, we could not find a better.

THE CHURCHES AND THE SOCIAL SOUL.

Thousands of ministers of religion, realising how intimately spiritual life is dependent on material conditions, have come to cherish a profound sympathy with the endeavours of the common people, by means of co-operative action in politics and industry, to secure a larger share of wealth, leisure, and other essentials of civilisation. Many of them, holding that "Government and co-operation are the laws of life, anarchy and competition the laws of death," are anxious to do all that in them lies towards the furtherance of an industrial order which shall realise this great moral truth. No body of men understand so well the material and spiritual havoc wrought upon vast numbers of our working population who are the helpless prey of economic forces which they can neither gauge nor control, and whose dawning intelligence is confused and mutilated by the apparent unreason of the world in which they find themselves.

It is no wonder that men of light and leading in the Churches now devote themselves to causes, movements, and policies which aim at redressing these conditions, and that their enthusiasm often leads them to demand liberty for their Church to throw itself into this work of social redemption. But this attitude involves them in grave doubts and difficulties. What are the limits of pulpit propaganda in mundane matters? How far is it legitimate for "parsons" to "meddle with politics," or to take a hand in conflicts between capital and labor? In a very eloquent and interesting manner the well-known Congregationalist preacher, Dr. Forsyth, opens out this whole issue in a booklet entitled "Socialism, the Church, and the Poor" (Hodder & Stoughton), adopting what must, we think, be regarded as a conservative position. While granting the fullest liberty to ministers in their capacity of good citizens to take an active part in the detailed work of social and political reform, he claims that a right understanding of the functions of the Churches precludes them from contributing directly, and in concrete ways, to the solution of the social problem. "The Church has not to solve the social problem, but to provide the men, the principles, and the public that can." This doctrine is not bred of timidity, but proceeds from a definite, though, we venture to think, not entirely satisfactory, exposition of the social function of religion. To conceive Socialism, or, indeed, any other purely social ideal, as the spirit or the content of religion, demanding the supreme devotion of the energy of the Churches, is, we agree with Dr. Forsyth, to mistake profoundly the meaning of the religious life. It is, in fact, the great heresy, for which Positivism stands, in its insistence that humanity upon this earth, or, indeed, in any other supra-mundane sphere, is the sole and final object of the reverence and devotion of man. It is quite true that in one sense the reform spirit in all modern Churches has moved in the direction of a decline of other-worldliness as the absorbing object of spiritual solicitude, a stronger insistence upon the practical religion of daily life as expressed in the fulfilment of duties towards our neighbour, and a growing tendency to break down the barrier of sacred and secular in the pulpit and the week-day activities of Churches.

But though Social ethics thus come to play a large and an increasing part in the life of the Churches, they cannot claim, either now or in the future, to absorb, or even to dominate, religion. For the sphere of religion, like that of philosophy, must be primarily concerned with the relation of man to the unity and power of the universe, whether regarded as an object of contemplation for the philosopher, or of reverent emotion for the devotee. His relation to "society," his fellow-man, is secondary and derivative both for the understanding and the feelings. This fundamental position Dr. Forsyth lays down in his asseveration that the Fatherhood of God precedes the Brotherhood of Man as a principle of religion, the latter flowing from the former as a necessary implication. And it is certainly the case that he who can truthfully assert that his religion is Socialism or any other actual scheme of human relations, is spiritually defective. Such pure concentration on material human ends is no more religion than it is philosophy. The spirit of religion must transcend humanity, seeking a One which is higher and holier. But Dr. Forsyth would be the last to admit that the conception of the spirit transfusing the Churches should be allowed to settle into a barren mysticism, a quietism which should, in effect, ignore all duty of realising "the Kingdom of God on earth." Yet he would seem to desire to keep the Churches out of politics, and out of the concrete acts of struggle by which social betterment is achieved. The Churches should work out the principles, should prepare the souls of men, should equip them with sound social motives, but should hold aloof from the actions in which these souls express themselves, the motives actualise themselves. Is it possible to defend this abstinence? We doubt it. "It is a question," we are told, "not of the Kingdom of God as a social programme, but of the rule of God in our will, in our spiritual, personal allegiance." Religion is thus put back into the traditional Protestant groove of personal piety, with the proviso that such piety will no longer be entirely self-absorbed, or be confined to a purely charitable interpretation of neighbourly duty, but will yield principles of practical guidance for the worker and the citizen. "It is not a programme, but a spirit, a moral habit, that the Church has, above all things, to bring to pass. It has to bring to pass the faith and the rule of Christ. Its first object is not the social state, but the social soul, meaning by that the godly soul, with its social love and serviceable feeling. For the Church to identify itself wholly, as a Church, with a social programme which is the order of the day is contrary to its genius and commission."

But we do not feel sure that this sharp distinction between a spirit of personal service and a programme or policy of concrete conduct will serve to solve the dilemma of the modern minister. For it is this very demand of personal piety to realise itself through social service, that impels many a minister to attach himself to political and social movements which claim to "build Jerusalem in England's green and pleasant land," and to use all the spiritual forces of his Church to help in bringing about material and spiritual changes favorable to a finer type of personality. Can a Church assist in making principles and men capable of social service without taking a direct part in testing, determining, and moulding the very forms of that social service? If a minister of Christ's Church is living among rack-rented slum dwellings, sees all around the ruin wrought by drink, gambling, prostitution, and the organic connection between all these shapes of personal vice and misery and the abuses of property and of bargaining which his personal experience discloses, must he not, as a duty of his sacred office, denounce these evils in their political as well as their personal bearings, and ally himself and his Church with whatever organisation seems to him effective for their remedy? Yet such a course, if it be pursued, may carry him far into policies, and even programmes of political and social reform. How far? Must he endanger the quieter, deeper, more abiding influences of his office by partisanship in the heated struggles between rival interests and classes, breaking heads with his mace, even if he may not hew limbs with his sword?

We venture to think that Dr. Forsyth's solution fails because of its inadequate realisation of the meaning of his term, "the social soul." The tradition of the Protestant Churches has ever disposed us overmuch to spiritual individualism, so that we fail adequately to grasp the sort of spiritual personality which ought to be conveyed in such a term. In other words, it is not the only social duty of a Church to form individual personalities of such sort that they respond freely to the material and spiritual needs of one another, each acting from some separate centre of enlightened piety. The social soul implies a closer, a more real, organic unity than that. Is it not rather the supreme moral task of a Church to aid in creating for society, for a city, a nation, a conscious social personality, that rationalisation of the "general will" which is something different from the mere aggregation of the goodwill of its individual members? Call it what you like, enlightened public spirit, national conscience, social personality, it is surely the clear-sighted devotion to this object that will rightly serve to differentiate the propagandism of a Church or its minister from the coarser and more opportunist methods of the politician or the labor leader, and will be an antiseptic to the poisonous vapours of party controversy. For those who recognise this, the greatest spiritual need of our time, perhaps of every time, it will become increasingly difficult to refuse the active cooperation of Churches in the reconstruction of social institutions, so as to furnish a worthy tenement for the social soul. Faithful ministers will have more and more to concern themselves with, though not to absorb themselves in, the details of policy, and even of programme, which belong to this portion of their gospel. Their answer to the charge of meddling with politics must lie, not in a craven withdrawal, but in a persistent endeavour to purge the controversies which they enter from mere heat and violence, from the bitterness of sectarian or class passions, by infusing into them that calm spirit of the whole which comes with healing on its wings.

THE TYRANNY OF LONDON.

London is never so overpowering as when the opening of the "season" turns the provinces into a mere suburb of the sprawling Metropolis. She is not only too big for herself—so big, indeed, that she has no civic consciousness—but she is too big for England. She drains, impoverishes, debauches it. "Sick of prey yet howling on for more," she fastens upon the national life like a vampire. She is more than the capital of the country; she is its incubus, its tyrant, its leech. Her lure is the more deadly for being irresistible, and her sway at once more despotic and more devitalising for its very benignity. To one great department of thought and activity, indeed, her absolutism does not extend. She is no politician. The Stuarts who dreaded and tried to limit her physical growth, seeing in the Lord Mayor a not impossible rival of the future, would be amazed to learn that a London, swollen a hundredfold beyond the village of their days, was so far from being a political peril as to be indifferent to and incapable of the first qualities of political leadership. She is too vast and diffuse, too languid, accommodating, and callous, to be an English Paris. London takes most things for granted, discounts the rest, and originates nothing. A city like Birmingham partially atones for its unembellished existence by being compact, manageable, uniform, capable of gathering itself into a single thunderbolt. But to London politics are a social diversion, and "movements" a bore. She is the last city to set the Thames on fire. Local self-government is perhaps too highly developed to admit of her reaching and holding a real political ascendency. But even if that were not so, her size and easy-goingness, her equable tolerance, her concentration upon society, would be a fatal handicap; as well as the subtle influences of differentiation that tend to make her less a condensation of England than an amorphous by-product. She becomes, if anything, less representative of the political thought of the nation with every year that passes. It is perhaps only in times of war or of some great emergency that London is even partially synonymous with England, and epitomises and focusses its militant, mafficking spirit. But in normal times she gossips of politics but does not influence them. It is on quite other foundations that her overshadowing, absorbent, and permanent supremacy rests. She virtually monopolises the social, literary, artistic, dramatic, and musical life of the country. As the centre of finance, the home of Royalty, the seat of the Legislature, and the headquarters of Government, all the distinction of the country is drawn towards her, and nearly all its creative and critical faculty.

Is a capital of such magnetic and exhausting authority an advantage or otherwise? Is it better for a nation that it should possess one dominating centre like London, or a collection of more or less equal cities such as exist in the United States? If England supplies the supreme instance of the one type of capital, America furnishes its precise opposite. Washington is the law-making and administrative centre of the United States, but except officially, one hardly thinks of it as a capital. It did not grow; it was made. It must always to some extent lie, as it were, in a backwater, apart from the central stream of national life and beyond the possibilities of such leadership as one associates with Paris and London. It radiates next to nothing. It has no commerce and no manufactures, and no influence over the arts and letters of the American people. Neither in politics nor in finance nor in social prestige can it ever become to America what Rome is to Italy or Berlin to Germany. The day is infinitely distant, and in all probability will never come at all, when every American artist, author, dramatist, and musician will turn instinctively towards Washington. So far as one can see, its fate is to remain for ever what it is now, the chief administrative and legislative foundry of the country, with a small but attractive social fringe.

Do the Americans gain or lose more by the possession of a Washington instead of a London? Is a nation better or worse off for escaping the toll which such huge agglomerations exact upon the social health, the intellectual alertness, and the political virility of the people? The Australians seem to think that whatever the advantages of a real capital they are not worth a political struggle. The jealousies of the States, and particularly of the big cities like Melbourne and Sydney, have accordingly cast the Australian capital of the future into the outer solitudes, where it can never be anything but the technical capital, a mere factitious collection of Government buildings, of less moment to Australia than is even Berne to Switzerland or Madrid to Spain. Mr. Bryce has declared that one of the most interesting experiments in the United States is the unconscious effort that is being made to offset the absence of a single predominant capital by the multiplication all over the country of small centres of light and leading. Which dispensation will produce the best intellectual results he think it too early to determine. In politics, he argues, America has lost something in having no city of undisputed primacy to look to, even while she has gained much in escaping thereby the pernicious influence of society on the national legislature. But he hesitates to prophesy whether the "dispersed geniuses" of the United States will be able to accomplish more or less than the concentrated geniuses of cities like London and Paris.

It is probable that the ideal relations between a capital and its hinterland can only be evolved under the Federal system. Such a system generates a healthy local rivalry and pride; it lessens the chances of any one city coming to be regarded as the final authority on every point of politics, art, literature, and social customs; and it encourages each town and State to equip itself with all the accessories that might fit it for the vacant leadership. The competition of the small German States, and the opportunities they opened to composers, have probably been very real influences in the development of German music; and nobody can doubt that much of the mental alertness and curiosity that one encounters all over America has some at least of its roots in local patriotism—a patriotism that fructifies in universities, art galleries, museums, technical schools, and in a pervasive determination on the part of the citizens to make their own town and their own State better than their neighbours'. Patriotism of this kind has little chance of flourishing in the shade and propinquity of umbrageous London. There are, indeed, not more than two or three cities in the provinces that take the trouble to be proud of themselves. England pays for the delights and the exaggeration of London by the comparative barrenness and stagnation of life outside the County Council's radius. It pays in the dearth of cities that are self-sufficing, that have stately public institutions and a dignified and ardent public life, and that labor to become in all things complete in themselves. Goethe, on the other hand, preferred a single first-rate city to half a dozen inferior ones. He wrote envyingly of Paris, "where the highest talents of a great kingdom are all assembled in a single spot, and by daily intercourse, strife, and emulation mutually instruct and advance each other." Something of the same idea was at the bottom of Pericles' tribute to Athens, and as much might truthfully be said of London. The intimate clash of mind with mind, and the sympathetic environment produced by such a concentration of intellect and interests as obtains in London, cannot but do something towards stimulating productivity and bringing it to a higher finish. But the Italian cities of the Middle Ages generated at least as much artistic and intellectual power with a much smaller expenditure of energy. No capital ought to be so big as to beggar the rest of the country and make metropolitan life compulsory.

Short Story.

MAELSHAUGHLINN AT THE FAIR.

It was about horses, women, and music, and, in the mouth of Maelshaughlinn, the narrative had the exuberance of the fair and the colour of a unique exploit. I found Maelshaughlinn alone in his house in the grey dawn succeeding his adventure. "This morning," he said, "I'm the lonesome poor fellow without father or mother, a girl's promise, nor my own little horse." He closed the door against a reproachful sunrise, and, sitting on a little three-legged stool, he told me the story.

Penitentially he began it, but he expanded with the swelling narrative. "This time last week," said Maelshaughlinn, "I had no thought of parting with my own little horse. The English wanted beasts for a war, and the farmers about here were coining money out of horseflesh. It seemed that the buyers were under a pledge not to refuse anything in the shape of a horse, and so the farmers made horses out of the sweepings of the knackers' yards, and took horses out of ha'penny lucky-bags and sold them to the English. Yesterday morning I took out my own little beast and faced for Arvach fair. I met the dealer on the road. He was an Englishman, and, above all nations on the face of the earth, the English are the easiest to deal with in regard of horses. I tendered him the price—it was an honest price, but none of our own people would have taken the offer in any reasonable way. An Irishman would have cursed into his hat, so that he might shake the curses out over my head. The Englishman took on to consider it, and my heart went threshing my ribs. Then he gave me my price, paid me in hard, weighty, golden sovereigns, and went away taking the little horse with him.

"I sat down on the side of a ditch to take a breath. Now you'll say that I ought to have gone back to the work, and I'll say that I agree with you. But no man can be wise at all times. Anyway, I was sitting on a ditch, with a lark singing over every foot of ground, and nothing before me but the glory of the day. A girl came along the road, and, on my soul, I never saw a girl walking so finely. 'She'll be a head above every girl in the fair,' said I, 'and may God keep the brightness on her head.' 'God save you, Maelshaughlinn,' said the girl. 'God save you, my jewel,' said I. I stood up to look after her, for a fine woman walking finely is above all the sights that man ever saw. Then a few lads passed, whistling and swinging their sticks. 'God give you a good day,' said the lads. 'God give you luck, boys,' said I. And there was I, swinging my stick after the lads, and heading for the fair.

"'Never go into a fair where you've no business.' That's an oul' saying and a wise saying, but never forget that neither man nor immortal can be wise at all times. Satan fell from Heaven, Adam was cast out of Paradise, and even your uncle broke his pledge.

"When I came into the fair there was a fiddler playing behind a tinker's cart. I had a shilling to spend in the town, and so I went into Flynn's and asked for a cordial. A few most respectable men came in then, and I asked them to take a treat from me. Well, one drank and another drank, and then Rose Heffernan came into the shop with her brother. Young Heffernan sent the glasses round, and then I asked Rose to take a glass of wine, and I put down a sovereign on the counter. The fiddler was coming down the street, and I sent a young lad out to him with silver. I stood for a while talking with Rose, and I heard the word go round the shop concerning myself. It was soon settled that I had got a legacy. The people there never heard of any legacies except American legacies, and so they put my fortune down to an uncle who had died, they thought, in the States. Now I didn't want Rose to think that my money was a common legacy out of the States, so by half-words I gave them to understand that I had got my fortune out of Mexico. Mind you, I wasn't far out when I spoke of Mexico, for I had a grand-uncle who went out there, and his picture is in the house this present minute.

"Well, after the talk of a Mexican legacy went round, I couldn't take any treats from the people, and I asked everyone to drink again. I think the crowds of the world stood before Flynn's counter. A big Connachtman held up a Mexican dollar, and I took it out of his hand and gave it to Rose Heffernan. I paid him for it, too, and it comes into my mind now that I paid him for it twice.

"There's not, on the track of the sun, a place to come near Arvach on the day of a fair. A man came along leading a black horse, and the size of the horse and the eyes of the horse would terrify you. There was a drift of sheep going by, and the fleece of each was worth gold. There were tinkers with their carts of shining tins, as ugly and quarrelsome fellows as ever beat each other to death in a ditch, and there were the powerful men, with the tight mouths, and the eyes that could judge a beast, and the dark handsome women from the mountains. To crown all, a piper came into the town by the other end, and his music was enough to put the blood like a mill-race through your heart. The music of the piper, I think, would have made the beasts walk out of the fair on their hind legs, if the music of the fiddler didn't charm them to be still. Grace Kennedy and Sheela Molloy were on the road, and Rose Heffernan was talking to them. Grace Kennedy has the best wit and the best discourse of any woman within the four seas, and she said to the other girls as I came up, 'Faith, girls, the good of the mission will be gone from us since Maelshaughlinn came into the fair, for the young women must be talking about him coming home from the sermon.' Sheela Molloy has the softest hair and the softest eyes of anything you ever saw. She's a growing girl with a spice of the devil in her. 'It's not the best manners,' said I, 'to treat girls to a glass across the counter, but come into a shop,' said I, 'and let me pay for your fancy.' Well, I persuaded them to come into a shop, and I got the girls to make Sheela ask for a net for her hair. They don't sell these nets less than by the dozen, so I bought a dozen nets for Sheela's hair. I bought ear-rings and brooches, dream-books and fortune-books, buckles and combs, and I thought I had spent no more money than I'd thank you for picking up off the floor. A tinker woman came in and offered to tell the girls their fortunes, and I had to cross her hand with silver.

"I came out on the street after that, and took a few turns through the fair. The noise and the crowd were getting on my mind, and I couldn't think with any satisfaction, so I went into Mrs. Molloy's, and sat for a while in the snug. I had peace and quiet there, and I began to plan out what I would do with my money. I had a notion of going into Clooney on Tuesday, and buying a few sheep to put on my little fields, and of taking a good craftsman home from the fair, a man who could put the fine thatch on my little house. I made up my mind to have the doors and windows shining with paint, to plant a few trees before the door, and to have a growing calf going before the house. In a while, I thought, I could have another little horse to be my comfort and my consolation. I wasn't drinking anything heavier than ginger ale, so I thought the whole thing out quietly. After a while I got up, bid good-bye to Mrs. Molloy, and stood at the door to watch the fair.

"There was a man just before me with the pea and thimble, and I never saw a trick-of-the-loop with less sense of the game. He was winning money right and left, but that was because the young fellows were before him like motherless calves. Just to expose the man I put down a few pence on the board. In a short time I had fleeced my show-man. He took up his board and went away, leaving me shillings the winner.

"I stood on the edge of the pavement wondering what I could do that would be the beating of the things I had done already. By this time the fiddler and the piper were drawing nigh to each other, and there was a musician to the right of me, and a musician to the left of me. I sent silver to each, and told them to cease playing as I had something to say. I got up on a cart and shook my hat to get silence. I said, 'I'm going to bid the musicians play in the market square, and the man who gets the best worth out of his instrument will get a prize from me.' The words were no sooner out of my mouth than men, women, and children made for the market square like two-year-olds let loose.

"You'd like the looks of the fiddler, but the piper was a dark fellow that kept a troop of tinkers about him. It was the piper who said, 'Master, what's the prize to be?' Before I had time to think the fiddler was up and talking. 'He's of the old race,' said the fiddler, 'and he'll give the prize that the Irish nobility gave to the musicians—a calf, the finest calf in the fair, a white calf, with skin as soft as the fine mist on the ground, a calf that gentle that the smoothest field under him would look as rough as a bog.' And the fiddler was that lifted out of himself that he nearly leapt over a cart. Somebody pushed in a young calf, and then I sat down on a stone, for there was no use in saying anything or trying to hear anything after that. The fiddler played first, and I was nearly taken out of my trouble when I heard him, for he was a real man of art, and he played as if he were playing before a king, with the light of Heaven on his face. The piper was spending his silver on the tinkers, and they were all deep in drink when he began to play. At the first sound of the pipes an old tinker-woman fell into a trance. It was powerful, but the men had to tie him up with a straw rope, else the horses would have kicked the slates off the market-house roof. Nobody was quiet after that. There was a thousand men before me offering to sell me ten thousand calves, each calf whiter than the one before. There was one party round the fiddler and another party round the piper. I think it was the fiddler that won; anyway, he had the strongest backing, for they hoisted the calf on to a cart, and they put the fiddler beside it, and the two of them would have got out of the crowd, only the tinkers cut the traces of the yoke. I was saved by a few hardy men, who carried me through the market-house and into Flynn's by a back way, and there I paid for the calf.

"When I came out of Flynn's the people were going home quiet enough. I got a lift on Fardorrougha's yoke, and everybody, I think, wanted me to come to Clooney on Tuesday next. I think I'd have got out of Arvach with safety, only a dead-drunk tinker wakened up and knew me, and he gave a yell that brought the piper hot-foot after me. First of all the piper cursed me. He had a bad tongue, and he put on me the blackest, bitterest curses you ever heard in your life. Then he lifted up the pipes, and he gave a blast that went through me like a spear of ice.

"The man that sold me the calf gave me a luck-penny back, and that's all the money I brought out of Arvach fair.

"Never go into the fair where you have no business."

PADRAIC COLUM.

Open Questions.

FREE TRADE BETRAYED.

By ERNEST VILLIERS, M.P.

IT is with much reluctance and great regret that I feel constrained to use the medium of the public Press to draw attention to the above subject; but nowadays a private Member has little, or no liberty of expressing his views in the House of Commons, especially if it is on a subject which the Cabinet of the day do not wish discussed. He may ask a question and receive an "official" answer; this, however, if the question be inconvenient, is given in the spirit of the French cynic, who said, "La conversation c'est l'art de cacher la pensée." The science of obfuscation is brought, in departmental offices, to a fine art. He may ask a second and a third question, but then the Speaker naturally and rightly intervenes on the ground that the whole of Question Time cannot be devoted to one subject.

The action of Ministers can, of course, be impugned on a motion to adjourn the House, but that must be on a matter of urgent public importance, and with reference to impending or future action, and not by way of criticism of past events.

It may be said that any subject can be discussed on the adjournment for the holidays, or on the Appropriation Bill at the end of the Session; but on these occasions it is hardly ever open to a private Member to choose the subject for debate, the course of which is generally determined by the Opposition Front Bench. Attempts might be made to raise this question on the Budget or Finance Bill, but there again, in both instances, the chance of escaping the guillotine is very remote.

With this explanation as to why I draw attention to the action of the Cabinet through the Press, and gratefully acknowledging the kindness of the Editor in allowing me to do so, I will state briefly some facts which, when known, will, I believe, deeply concern all who really care for Free Trade.

It will be remembered that the Conservative Government, in 1903, passed an Act of Parliament assenting to the Sugar Convention of 1902. The Bill, in the House of Commons, both on its second reading and in Committee, was strenuously opposed by the present Government, who were then in opposition, on the ground that by it we, a nation of consumers, were asked to enter into an agreement with several sugar-producing States which would have the effect of limiting the supply of sugar to Great Britain, and thereby raising the price of sugar in this country. I cannot do better than give their objections in the words of Liberal leaders themselves.

Mr. Emmott said, "If the House of Commons was going to pass a Bill like this it was unworthy of the confidence of the nation."

Sir William Robson said, "This Convention is expressly founded upon Protection. The Convention is a Protective document."

Lord Loreburn said, "I am sorry to say that I think this Convention is humiliating because it subjects the legislation of this country to the dictation of foreign delegates."

Mr. Winston Churchill said, "The object of the Bill is, in fact, to increase the price of sugar, and therefore the measure would be much more accurately described as 'The Dear Sugar Convention Bill.'" And, again, "I have heard it said that this Convention will confer great benefit on the foreigner and injury to our own people. I believe that is perfectly true."

These forebodings and prophecies have been most fully justified in the five years which have elapsed since the Convention was signed. The price of sugar in Great Britain has risen nearly 50 per cent., while, by the way, I may mention sugar is cheaper in the other contracting States than it was in those States before the Convention.

The supervision of sugar factories has cost the country a large annual sum, besides entailing expenses and restrictions on the trade itself, which are so vexatious as to have discouraged all small manufacturers, and tended to give a monopoly to the larger firms.

Owing to the prohibition of Russian sugar imposed upon us by the Convention, 500,000 tons of sugar have in those five years accumulated in Russia, showing the extent to which we have been robbed of our natural supply. All this was the result of Tory rule.

In January, 1906, a Liberal Free Trade Government came into power.

On 28th August, 1907, this same Liberal Free Trade Government renewed the Sugar Convention for five years, promising to ratify the renewal by 1st February, 1908. They practically agreed to the old conditions, with this modification, that whereas the importation of Russian sugar was prohibited in 1902, it was now to be only limited. True, we are not bound to limit the importation of Russian sugar, but the Convention to which we have subscribed, by imposing on Russia a limit to her export to Great Britain, ipso facto, as the simplest intelligence can see, limits the amount of Russian sugar which we can receive. John is allowed to take as much as he likes from Nicholas, but Nicholas is forbidden to give more than a certain amount to John. When we think of the accumulated store of sugar in Russia, and when we know that the Russian peasant is growing more sugar every year, is not the loss to the community brought home to us? And this with a Liberal Free Trade Party!

But the Party was not informed of this action; the renewal was signed when the House was not sitting, and when it met, four months ago, it was not asked to ratify the Renewal, as the former House had been asked to ratify the original Convention, and as the Parliaments of the other contracting Powers have been asked to agree to the Renewal. The Liberal Cabinet acted independently of Parliament. Perhaps, however, that is not to be wondered at. The Conservative Government, on the question of the Sugar Convention Act, had its party at its back. Would the present Liberal Government, if it came to the House to ratify the renewal of the Convention, have its Party at its back? Would it get more than the support of the Front Bench?

What can be their object in renewing the Sugar Convention? What were the objects of the Contracting Parties to the first Sugar Convention? Was it not to obtain and keep control of the British market? Was it not to encourage producers even at the expense of consumers? Was it not to benefit capitalists and monopolists?

But surely the Liberal Government should rise superior to such considerations? Their boast has been principle not privilege, measures not men, character not circumstance. Can it be that office doth make cowards of us all? The Party, however, must remain true to its colors. Liberals in 1902 prophesied untold evils; like Prometheus, they called down fire from heaven, but also Prometheus-like, when the Convention was once law they never looked back and traced results as they showed themselves; they never watched how the price of the second staple food of the people grew and rose till it has attained its present figure; they never noted how a Free Trade country, by a Free Trade Government, was being stealthily and surely filched of the advantages it should enjoy. They slept in peaceful ignorance of facts as soundly as any fairy prince under the spell of a magician. Now they make no protest while the Government renews the contract with States who will not permit sugar to be dumped into Great Britain because they are afraid that it would interfere with their market. Free Traders have always said "Let them dump; better for us if the foreigner gave his goods away to us, but by all means let him dump. It will, in the long run, be to our advantage." But since the renewal of the Sugar Convention our position as Free Traders has changed. The foreigner may dump steel rails which we make at home, and thus undersell us in our home market, but the foreigner must not dump sugar, which we do not grow, and which is one of the principal foods of the people, and the raw material of some of our largest manufactures. How can we defend Free Trade on such lines? Free Trade, as we all know, does not give us a Utopia, and sometimes it acts harshly on individuals. But if we are to sacrifice in altruistic fashion, the advantages due to untramelled trade which would drop naturally into our lap, how can we hope to defend that system?

Mr. Lloyd George, on August 5th, 1903, said with regard to the first Sugar Convention: "The position of the Government is that they have accepted the Convention and can therefore do nothing. I suggest that they should allow the House of Commons to impose its will upon them; they would then be relieved of responsibility, and no blame could be placed upon them by the other contracting parties." Is that not good and high advice for us to follow now? And shall we not by so doing save to our people thousands of tons of cheap sugar, and restore to her lost position in the Liberal Party that goddess of Free Trade whom it once so highly honored?

Present-Day Problems.

THE REFORM OF LIBERAL ORGANISATION.

THE time has come when the Liberal Party must pay more attention to its organisation as a party. There are whispers that the Chief Whip has been convinced of this for some time and is anxious that some scheme should be considered. In order that this question, which is really one of supreme importance, should be discussed and considered, the following scheme is outlined, in the hope that the chief organisers of the party may have the advantage of the views of the rank and file. In this scheme it must be remembered that only England is thought of, and London must be looked upon as a county.

1. County Federations:—

Each County to have a County Federation with President, Secretary, and Treasurer. This Federation to be composed of elected representatives from each Constituency in the County. The Federation to meet for business purposes at least twice in a year, in the spring and autumn. Verbal or written reports to be presented from each Constituency of the work being done, and any local and registration difficulties discussed. These meetings should be arranged, as far as possible, in conjunction with headquarters so that some responsible representative of the Central office could attend.

A County Demonstration might be held annually to be attended by all the Liberal members of the Constituencies, and one leading Liberal Member of the House of Commons, or as local circumstances determined.

The object of this suggestion is to bring surrounding Constituencies into closer touch for mutual help and encouragement, and must not depend on a mere financial affiliation.

These Federations would, of course, as at present, where they exist, with the local Associations send representatives to the Meetings of the National Liberal Federation. No suggestion is made about this, at present, somewhat useless gathering, as, apart from passing a series of carefully prepared formal resolutions, it does little or nothing actively to help the actual work of the party. It might, and probably will, if the constituent elements are converted into live co-operating forces become a powerful factor in the organisation of the party.

2. Headquarters:—

The Central office should be in much more vital touch with the constituencies than at present. A quarterly report might be obtained from each constituency if a printed Schedule of questions were sent every three months to the Secretary of each Liberal Association in the country. Some such form as the following might be adopted:—

1. Name of Association.
2. Number of Members.
3. Minimum Subscription.
4. Balance at the end of last Financial year. When does year end? Cr. £ s. d. Dr. £ s. d.
5. Number of Executive Council?

	Association.	Executive.
6. How many times during the Quarter have Meetings been held of
7. How many public meetings have been held during the Quarter in the Constituency?
8. Approximate total attendances at these Meetings.
9. Has any literature been systematically distributed during the Quarter?
10. Do you circulate the "Liberal Monthly?"
11. How many times during the Quarter has the Member addressed political meetings in the Constituency?
12. Have you an appointed Registration Agent?
13. Is there a Women's Liberal Association in the Constituency? If so, what is the membership?
14. Is there a branch of the League of Young Liberals in the Constituency? If so, what is the membership?
15. Have the Conservatives held any, and, if so, how many public meetings during the Quarter in the Constituency?
16. Is the Conservative Organisation in the Constituency active, and, if so, in what direction?
17. What proposed Legislation arouses most interest in the Constituency?
18. Remarks.

Signature of Secretary,
Address,
Date,

These enquiries could easily be added to.

These Schedules should be sent out regularly and every means taken to get them returned promptly, properly filled in. The information should then be carefully transferred to a book or filed for reference.

The country might be divided into some six divisions by the Central office, and one division given to a responsible and intelligent clerk whose business it would be to keep in touch in this way with the various constituencies in his division, tabulate the information obtained for the use of Sir Robert Hudson, and deal with any matters arising in any of the constituencies under his charge.

As previously suggested, at least one of the business meetings of each of the County Federations, each year, should be attended by Sir Robert Hudson or some influential official of the Central office, and further, the governing body in each constituency, such for instance as the three hundred in most places, should be visited from time to time by Sir Robert Hudson or some other qualified and responsible official of the Central office who might take counsel with the local workers and offer advice on methods of organisation and then keep them up to the mark by showing interest in their work.

The Central office ought, also, to see that there is an efficient Registration Agent in every constituency, and if the local organisation is lax should use every means to get them to attend to this supremely important matter, and if it is shown that there are sufficient reasons for their inability to maintain one, should supply one for the necessary period.

The Central office might also maintain one or two expert organisers, whose sole work it should be to visit constituencies from time to time, meet the local organisations, and offer advice and guidance, look round to see what is being done, and assist in keeping the local organisations in good working condition. They should report to Headquarters the result of these visits.

Co-ordination, co-operation, and stimulus are what are required, and these can only be secured by Headquarters coming into more intimate touch with local conditions all over the country.

It may be desirable to anticipate one or two objections that may be raised. The first is the financial one, but as the extra outlay involved in these suggestions would be at Headquarters there ought not to be any difficulty about that. The second is the suggested interference with local organisations. It is not anticipated that any objection would, in fact, be raised, as the vast majority of Liberals all over the country would only too readily welcome and assist any genuine effort to put the party on a surer and more efficient fighting basis.

JOHN GRIFFITHS.

The Drama.

A REVIVAL OF POETIC TRAGEDY.

IF the student of the English drama desires to know what is wrong with it, he has only to compare the kind of play which is produced for the whole theatre-going public with that proceeding from the co-operative work of private societies, whose members consist of intellectual or serious people, driven, in sheer weariness, from resort to the conventional stage. From these societies proceed most of the renewing, reforming forces of the theatre. They find the new playwrights, the new managers, and the new artists; the new ideas and the new methods. They have grown so strong as to give irresistible force to the demand for the setting up of a central standard of dramatic literature. Most of their dramas exhibit the richness and variety of the fresh material of which the Director of a National Theatre might dispose. Take, for example, the work of Mr. John Masefield, who has only just begun to write for the theatre, but already shows two great qualities—a sense of beauty and a sense of the true power and aim of tragedy. Such a gift would at once be seized on by the manager of a repertory theatre; he would see that these special adornments of the art of writing were grievously wanting to our stage, and that the author who possessed them should be drawn into the centre, and should by no means feel the stamp of eccentricity or perverseness upon his genius. I should imagine that Mr. Masefield's faculty would be the better for such treatment. He has, as I have said, the sense of beauty. But it is rather wild beauty: full of a certain fierceness, as of a man who has sailed perilous seas, and watched the ungoverned forces of man and of nature at their play.

"Nan," which has just been produced, under Mr. Granville Barker's sure direction, by the Pioneers at the New Royalty Theatre, has a touch of this primitive quality which took fashionable playgoers by storm when they descried it in the simple, impulsive naturalism of the Sicilian players. It is curiously exciting and disturbing both to the conscience and to the dramatic instinct. But it represents a higher form of art than "Malia," more thoughtful and more moral. Mr. Masefield takes a significant theme, which is both tragic in the highest degree, and woven, with more or less closeness, into the common fabric of human experience. Most of us know something, either as tyrants or as victims, of the oppressive side of family life, the suffering of the gentle at the hands of the petty, the exacting, and the mean, the jealousy or hatred felt for some unpopular or unwelcome member of the household—above all, the strain on the noble, unworldly character exposed to the tender mercies of the calculating and the hard. This kind of cruelty is most piteous to read or to think of when it is aimed at a child like David Copperfield or Cosette, in "Les Misérables." But it is most poignant when it involves the entire fate of a man or a woman, and it is this tragedy of common life, heightened and colored as the dramatic poet heightens and colors the working of human passions, which is the subject of Mr. Masefield's play. Let me briefly describe it.

The scene is in Gloucestershire, on the Severn, the period 1810, the time of the reign of the old savage penal law. The characters are mostly small farmers or peasants. They talk dialect, a burden which only Miss Lillah McCarthy could sustain consistently or powerfully enough to satisfy the ear. The action takes place in the living room of the Pargetter family, father, mother, and daughter, all in their way mean, hard-fisted, cunning, and cruel when the path of their interests is crossed. The unwelcome newcomer is Pargetter's niece, Nan Hardwick, whose father was hanged, a few months earlier, for stealing a sheep. On her shoulders descends the whole weight of the unfriendly world and its law, interpreted and enforced through the malign Mrs. Pargetter, a type of the bad stepmother of the fairy story, and a set of smaller persecutors. The girl, whose character and charm are painted with touches of singular beauty, has the qualities that in such a society tend to her destruction. She has candour, affectionateness, honesty, a passion for man's love and woman's sympathy, and withal the fatal force of despair, the uncalculating power that wrecks all when life no longer offers any work, or happiness, or hope. Everybody and everything conspires to drive her to this pass. The aunt, in pursuit of the rôle of bad woman and "good" wife and mother, sets husband, daughter, and lover against her. Each fine feeling in the girl's nature is in turn flouted and betrayed. The daughter's fault is laid to her account; her lover, weak and unreal, incited to a base betrayal; her love of her father made the instrument of her loss of personal happiness, and at each issue of her life turned against her gentle bosom. In such a world, Mr. Masefield concludes, such a creature cannot live. She is fated. She must die, and drag down with her some one of her tormentors.

It is the author's power of illustrating and developing this tragedy that constitutes the interest of his drama. How will "Nan" perish—for live she cannot, any more than "Tess" or Beatrice Cenci can live? All the characters and incidents in the play, the circumstances of the time and their bearing on the girl's character, co-operate to this end; Dick Gurvil, who tears her heart from her breast; her cousin Jenny, who betrays her sisterly affection; the man of the law, who, when her father's innocence is proved, counts out to her fifty pounds in compensation for the blood his masters have shed; the mad old fiddler, to whom, since his young bride's death, fifty years ago, the world has become a grave, to which he must lure this beautiful, much-deceived creature. I am not able to say that Mr. Masefield blends all these elements of tragedy at all times with success. Now and then the play seemed to tremble a little, as if on the edge of a catastrophe. But what he is able to do is to preserve its poetic feeling and intention.

This he achieves chiefly through the picture of pure and passionate womanhood, touched deeply with the life of the soil and its rude and simple verities, which he presents in "Nan." If it errs, it errs on the side of violence, to which Mr. Masefield's genius inclines him. But the speech and spiritual vesture of the girl, the love scene, broadly but not coarsely painted, the power, conciseness, and sensuous charm of the dialogue, the mystical element suggested by such devices as Ibsen employs in half-human characters like the Ice-girl or the Rat-Wife, but fitting less easily into the main stuff of this special drama, and, above all, the human feeling, the power to excite pity and fear in the audience, reveal, not indeed a master of the theatre, but a bold, vivid, and enterprising talent for it. Mr. Masefield's powers are not yet fully disciplined; here and there they seem to reflect Elizabethan rather than modern models and tastes; but it is remarkable to see how well he controls the human elements of his play, and avoids obvious and morally inferior devices, as, for example, would have been the killing of Mrs. Pargetter by her niece. He writes freshly when others write wearily or pedantically, or merely imitatively, and he has the living spirit which is needed to revive the long-lost associations between the English stage and literature. And as he writes, so he is served. "Nan" is a very beautiful figure, and she was very finely played by Miss Lillah McCarthy. Nature has given this artist the attractions of face and voice and bearing through which poetry finds expression on the stage. These qualities fix the eye, but they did not alone sustain the interest in her "Nan Hardwick." That depended on clear conception of what the character meant, and, as in the "mesmeric" scene, on sustained and deeply impressive dramatic power.

THE SUM OF BRITISH WEALTH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One of the Budget statements is worth more than a passing notice. It was that the income of the part of the British nation assessed for income tax had reached nearly one thousand millions sterling per annum—980 millions, to be exact. The most extraordinary aspect of it is that, in one single decade, during which it has been alleged by statesmen that we were going to pieces in a financial sense, the income of a section only of the people had increased one-third more. That is to say, from 734 millions in 1898, to 980 in 1908. At the same rate of progression (including the increment) the relative amount will be over 1,300 millions in 1918.

In considering this matter we must not mix up the rate of the tax with the amount of the assessment of the income. The former is a variable quantity—the latter is fixed so far as its basis or principle of rating is concerned. That is to say, the tax may be a shilling per £, or ninepence, as at present. In other years it has been rated differently. But the amount of the income is not altered by the Chancellor as he may do with the tax. It remains at the same level irrespective of the tax, excepting when it advances or recedes according to the success or non-success of the possessor of it. Another point to hold in view is this: The tax is levied only upon those who have an income of £160 per annum or upwards. Certain deductions are made up to £700, but that has nothing to do with the total assessment. The Budget quotation is the total sum, without deductions, declared to in some cases by the owners or assessed by the officials. The number of people who are concerned directly by this form of taxation is about five millions out of a total population of forty-four millions. Mr. Asquith stated that 750,000 persons had declared their incomes were earned incomes between the minimum of £160 and the maximum of £2,000 per annum. That leaves about 250,000 who have fixed salaries, dividends, &c., below, or the same and earned incomes above the line of £2,000. It means a total of about a million of income tax payers, and, taking the average family at five, we get five millions out of the total population.

Now, it has been the practice with statisticians like Dudley Baxter, Leone Levi, and Sir Robert Giffen, in assessing the total National Capital, to found their calculations upon the income tax returns. In doing so, practically, they usually arrive at a little over double that total for the income of the whole population. It is a rough way for us now to get at the result, but it will serve as a fairly close approximation. Taking this view, it is obvious that our total national income is now somewhere about 2,000 millions per annum.

Proceeding to consider the amount of capital involved, let me point out that, in 1875, Giffen assessed the matter thus:—

Capital sum	8,548 millions sterling
Total Income (based on Income Tax returns)	1,164 millions sterling

In the capital sum he went into details—giving each amount separately—for lands, stocks, personal property, trades, railways, iron-works, fisheries, mines, &c.

It will be seen that the total income comes out to about one-eighth of the capital sum. Hence, if we multiply our 2,000 per annum at the same rate, we get 16,000 millions, as the capital of the British nation, as a commercial asset, at the present day. It is probably more than that, for, in 1903, at the meeting of the British Association at Southport, Sir Robert Giffen read a paper on the subject, and he then placed the capital at 15,000 millions and the income at 1,750 millions. In the discussion that followed, one of his learned critics considered the amount was too low. In another decade and at the same ratio of increase the capital would be over 20,000 millions. Be that as it may, the sum we have already attained to is unprecedented for a small country like ours to absorb. In thirty-three years we have gone far on the road to double our income and capital. There seems no slackening in our industries, trades, or commerce. This globe consists of about forty-eight million square miles of cultivable lands, and we possess, in one form or another, about a quarter of it. Our ships carry half the whole maritime trade of the commercial world. And yet we are not progressing, in the opinion of some of us, simply because we are importing more than we export, and must, thereby, be impoverished. If so, how does it happen that we have added an average of 225 millions sterling to our capital per annum for the past thirty-three years? Or, is it all empty talk? like that of Gratiano who "speaks an infinite deal of nothing, more than any man in all Venice. His reasons are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all day ere you find them, and when you have them, they are not worth the search."

But let us go a little further back still so as to see the steady, continued working of two fiscal systems, as revealed from this point of view. It is obvious that the income tax returns, without a thoroughly inquisitorial system, must be only an approximation. But they are the best and nearest basis we can get for a period of over fifty years. If we take earlier estimates with a greater margin of doubt still, the following statement of the capital value of the United Kingdom takes us back for over a century:—

Year.	Authority.	Capital Value.
1800	Beck and Pultney.	1,800 millions sterling.
1840	Porter.	4,000 ,, ,,
1860	Leone Levi.	6,000 ,, ,,
1875	Giffen.	8,548 ,, ,,
1903	Giffen.	15,000 ,, ,,

Reducing this statement to so much per head of the population it comes to this:—

In 1800, £114; 1840, £150; 1860, £207; 1875, £267; 1903, £357.

It will be seen that in the first forty years we only gained £36 per head. The policy of Protection was then nearly coming to an end. In seven years it was partially slain, and in ten was practically out of the possibility of doing any more mischief. In the next stage of twenty years, when Free Trade was fairly under way, the gain was £57 per head, although little more than half the period had been under the influence of freedom. In the next fifteen years we increased £60 per head; and, in the latest period of twenty-eight years we advanced no less than £90 per head. Or, curiously enough, in the final forty-three years we gain £150 under Free Trade, and that increase is exactly the same amount as the total capital per head in 1840, when Protection prevailed with us. Not only so, but the purchasing power of money is much more now than seventy years ago, because the price of the "staff of life" was greater in those days than at the present time. Moreover, unemployment was more rife. Pauperism was about ten per cent. in England as against one-quarter of it this year. Carlyle makes that point clear in his "Past and Present," by quoting the official returns of the day. He, also, shows that the pauperism of the "hungry forties" was mainly an able-bodied and unwilling one.

Surely these are convincing proofs of our steady advancement in material wealth—if that merely is to be the criterion upon which we are to be judged. It is an open question, but Tariff Reform advocates have chosen that ground; therefore they must abide by it.

A singular coincidence is this: In the year 1903, when the Prophet of the New Cult started his "tearing and raging propaganda," as his brother called it, Sir Robert Giffen prepared his striking statistics for the British Association without reference to the fiscal question at all, or having a thought of the arguments involved. Now, in face of the statement that we were retrograding, it is curious to observe, in that very year of 1903, the income tax was assessed upon 879 millions sterling. According to this year's Budget the figure is 980 millions—a round 100 millions increase in five years; and that only for the benfit of one-ninth of the total population. By our rough formula it means, however, an increase of 1,600 millions, added to the capital estate of the United Kingdom; and still "We are not happy!"

If we compare with other countries—how do we stand? Prussia—the Major-domo of Germany—has a population very nearly equal to ours. The income tax there begins at £45 per annum. If we, however, strike a line at our minimum of £160, we get a total in that country, above that limit, of 200 millions a year, whereas ours is practically five times that sum.

In the past ten years we have gained more on this basis than Prussia has accumulated altogether. No wonder the Germans are borrowing money whilst we are paying off debt; which latter course makes more for defence than battleships, even of the "Dreadnought" class.

If we turn to France what do we find? A few months ago Dr. Bertillon—the well-known statistician—was wringing his hands over the decadence of "La Belle." He had been calculating the total assets of his beloved land. The result was 9,000 millions. Considering that Monsieur Fournier de Flaix—another eminent economist—had, in the year 1882, brought the amount out at 9,070 millions, the present result is not encouraging. The basis of the calculations of each was that of the Succession Duties. They have been levied since 1790 upon every description of wealth in France, and have usually formed the basis of all calculations having this object in view—the value of the nation as a going concern. The population of France in number, like that of Prussia, is close upon the heels of ours. Each of these great nations is hopelessly behind this country as a wealth producer, and both have "scientific tariffs" after the Tariff Reformer's own heart. Is it still with him a case of an invisible grain per bushel? Or, shall we describe it in the rough but forcible words of the Scotch proverb—"Muckle gab, little gumption"?—Yours, &c.,

Letters to the Editor.

THE JUSTICE OF THE LICENSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of the 16th inst., "Country Brewer" complains of the statement that the Licensing Bill will leave two out of three houses, because, as he tells us, it will close a much larger proportion of houses in many villages. Of course, the statement that the Bill will close one-third of the houses refers to the country as a whole, and not to its effect in every locality. What would have been the scoffs and jeers in which "Country Brewer" and others would have indulged if the proposal had been to close one house out of every three in each locality no matter how many there were there to begin with! In some towns there are from five to twenty times as many public-houses in proportion to population as there are in others. To close the same proportion in those places would be absurd. There is almost universal agreement that redundant houses should be got rid of, and it is in the villages and small towns of such counties as "Country Brewer" mentions—Hertfordshire and Cambridgeshire—that public-houses abound to greater excess than anywhere else. There the redundancy is greatest. There there will be the most reduction.

"Country Brewer" thinks that closing beer-houses will increase the consumption of spirits. This is an old fallacy. The Beer-house Act of 1830—which was admittedly a great blunder—was based on it, and so in principle was the disastrous legislation of the early 'sixties which established grocers' licences and aimed at encouraging the consumption of light wines in preference to spirits. Both policies increased the consumption of spirits.

Your correspondent contends that under the Bill the compensation will be inadequate. Mr. Montgomery has already dealt with that point. The Act of 1904 limited the compensation to the owner to the value of the premises, and provided that it should be the difference in their value with and without a licence. The assessment under Schedule A should give the annual value of the premises with the licence, and, after refusal of renewal, without the licence. If the difference between those values does not represent the added annual value which the licence gives it can only be because the assessment is wrong. If the assessment of the premises with the licence be proper and adequate the compensation under the Bill will be proper and adequate also, but not otherwise.

Hitherto, licensed premises have had one value for rating and taxation, and an altogether different one for compensation. They have, and can only have, one real market value. The Bill provides that the same value—the real and only value—shall be the value for both purposes. "Country Brewer" says that the owner should receive compensation for loss of trade. The Act of 1904 does not provide for that further than the value of the trade is included in the market value of the premises. The Bill does not propose to alter the basis of compensation in so far as it is to be the difference in the value of the premises with and without a licence. All that is claimed is that the assessment should show this difference quite accurately, and, consequently, the Bill provides that the difference so shown shall be the difference on which the compensation shall be calculated. Let owners get their licensed houses properly assessed, and all will be well with them in the matter of compensation; and, incidentally, substantial will be the gain to the ratepayer and taxpayer.

Yours, &c.,

THOS. P. WHITTAKER.

House of Commons.

May 27th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Montgomery in his reply to my letter assumes that the re-assessment of licensed property on a new principle is contained in the Bill. It is not in the Bill and as now explained opens up a wide question of considerable interest.

Mr. Montgomery accepts my illustration as a typical case. It is a real one. It is too often suggested in this controversy that brewers are dishonest in their desire to evade taxation on tied houses without any truth. The surveyors of taxes are responsible for Schedule A assessments, and I desire to know how the new assessments illustrated by Mr. Montgomery are to be obtained.

Are we to accept as a new principle that Schedule A shall include trading profits in addition to the annual letting value, for this is what Mr. Montgomery's suggestion amounts to? Are other trades to be treated on the same basis, especially those trades in which the tied house system exists—the tobacco trade, the flour trade, the tea and grocery trade, and several others? Mr. Montgomery claims the whole profit on the wholesale price of beer as the value of the tie and allows no free trade profit in his calculation. The value of the tie would more fairly be taken at 4s. or 5s. a barrel on the trade of houses like "The Black Horse," and on this basis the present assessment at £48 is fair. No brewer and no free tenant could, in my opinion, pay more rent than this. Mr. Montgomery assumes that the Surveyor of Taxes has neglected his duty and gives the assessment consequent on the passing of this Bill at £100, an increase of £52. If this were correct the results would be as follows:—

No additional tax will be received by the Surveyor of Taxes under Schedule A as the assessment of the brewery profit will fall by the exact amount of the rise of the assessment of "The Black Horse," the brewery now paying the income tax on the £52.

The tenant's licence will rise £5, compensation charge £5, inhabited house duty £1 14s., poor rate at 7s. in the pound will rise £15 14s.

The tenant's position becomes impossible. Out of a gross retail profit on the sale of two hundred barrels, say £100, he must under the new conditions pay licence £25, rates £30, inhabited house duty £2 10s., in addition to fire and lighting £15, wear and tear of trade utensils £5, and interest on his capital, estimated at £50, say £5. This leaves him £17 10s. balance for living expenses out of the sale of beer, in this case almost the entire business of the house. No tenant can live in the house on these terms. One of two things must follow. Either the brewer must reduce the price of his beer 3s. a barrel to meet the extra charges put on the tenant, and thus reduce the gross profit to £70 a year less £15 compensation charge and other outgoings consequent on the repairs and management of a tied house, or he will decide to let the house as a free house at an actual rent of £50, if he can get as much. The latter may be the better and sounder course, as the assessment demanded by Mr. Montgomery will then revert to the present amount, and, with reduced charges, a tenant may get a living. This seems to me to be conclusive proof that the present assessment is the correct one.

A general re-assessent which will carry with it an additional licence, additional compensation levy, additional poor rates, additional house duty, and a transfer of income tax is in itself so complex that I cannot think it to be the intention of the Government to offer it as a solution of the new compensation basis in the Bill without any clauses in the Bill dealing with assessment, or any explanation of this point in introducing the Bill before Parliament.

It is easy for Mr. Montgomery to double an assessment on paper without any regard to the five consequent additional charges imposed thereby on tenant and owner, but can anyone accept it as an argument of the justice of the compensation clauses as they stand in this Bill?

The ingenious proposal to put five new charges on this property, a typical case, as a means of securing a fair compensation for the loss of capital seems to me another way of destroying the capital and evading compensation.—Yours, &c.,

COUNTRY BREWER.

May 25th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"A Country Brewer," in your last issue, takes me to task for saying (in the letter you were so good as to publish on the 9th inst.) that two out of every three public-houses will be left untouched by the Bill. Doubtless there will be certain local variations, but, speaking of the country at large, the Bill, if carried into law, will leave untouched two-thirds of the public-houses now existing in England. That is one of the salient points which ought to be made known to every Parliamentary voter. Large numbers of them voted lately in Manchester and Wolverhampton in ignorance of the fact.

Again, as to compensation. If "A Country Brewer" will read Sir Thomas Whittaker's speech in the second reading debate in the House of Commons, he will find that the Bill under a time limit of fourteen years will secure full compensation for every just claimant in respect of houses closed.

The principle by which the trade itself provides the compensation was introduced and carried through both Houses of Parliament by Mr. Balfour's Government in 1904. In the opinion of the majority of impartial persons outside the trade, the principle is essentially fair and just in its application to a business carried on under the licensing conditions which have so long prevailed in this country. In any case, however, the present Bill merely continues the system of compensation accepted by the brewers.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. SWANWICK.

"REMITTED TO THE CHURCHES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In last week's issue you headed your article on the Education Bill debate as above. Let us hope that ecclesiastical leaders will agree, where political leaders are at fault. If the former can achieve a national settlement of the religious difficulty, it is impossible to imagine politicians of responsibility attempting to frustrate it.

But failure to agree on a national solution is not unthinkable even with the best intentions on the part of those who confer. What then?

Surely failure to achieve immediate settlement of the whole question need not imply abandonment by the present Government of all attempts to redeem its pledges.

The Bill which has just been read a second time admits very readily of amendment in Committee, which will altogether confine its scope to the single school areas.

I have illustrated this by putting down one or two amendments which serve to indicate the ease with which its scope could be thus restricted.

If a conference covering the whole field fails to produce a concordat, the Government must seriously consider the desirability of immediately concentrating upon, and dealing with, the single school areas.

From many points of view it would be an immense gain if the difficulties in these areas were fairly faced in complete detachment from the entirely different problem which confronts us in urban areas.—Yours, &c.,

"SIMPLE BIBLE TEACHING."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article on "Remitted to the Churches" you say that "Christianity . . . is certainly founded on the Bible."

How can that be, when it was a powerful and widespread missionary force many years before the earliest and most important books of the New Testament were written, and 150 years before they were all recognised as authoritative?

This is no quibble, because on it the whole view of the nature of Christianity depends. The Christian teaching which as a historic fact has had force in the world is not the teaching of a text-book; but is the telling about and the leading to a living person, and to life in his organic society. And this plainly cannot be done save by those who have some personal faith in that Person, and some experience in the life of that Society.

It is open to you, of course, to depreciate that teaching. But it is strange for a Liberal review to countenance popular and thoughtless Bibliolatry.—Yours, &c.,

TH. HILL.

[The article in question expressly repudiated what Mr. Hill calls "thoughtless Bibliolatry." But the fact remains that in a broad sense Christianity, as it exists to-day, founds itself on the Bible.—ED. NATION.]

"THE RIDDLE OF THE BACCHAE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of May 16th my friend Prof. Murray, reviewing Mr. Norwood's book, "The Riddle of the Bacchae," gives the following description of the theory laid down by Dr. Verrall in "Euripides the Rationalist":—

> "Euripides was a sceptic; therefore he cannot have seriously introduced gods or miracles into his plays. Therefore those parts of his plays . . . in which gods and miracles do occur, must either bear a secret meaning, . . . or they must not be parts of the play at all, but merely additions intended to save the writer from persecution by the orthodox."

On reading this, I was disposed to ask myself, not whether I understand Euripides, but whether it is possible for anyone ever to be understood. This is my argument, as it appears to a critic eminently competent and friendly! I can only say that to no one can it seem more unsound in the premisses, or more extravagant in the conclusion, than it does to me. But really it is not mine. I cannot acknowledge or subscribe to it. It is not the fact that my expositions of certain plays of Euripides are based, all or any of them, upon deduction from the real or supposed opinions of the dramatist. They are based upon the construction of the plays themselves, or rather of each separate play, regarded as a work presumably intended to bear some consistent meaning as a whole. Whatever validity my conclusions may have, they would still have, if the plays were anonymous.

I say that the Heracles is designed to exhibit the Greek "demi-god" as a mere man, an ordinary man, and (to some extent) permanently insane. I say that on any other supposition the play is inexplicable. The starting-point of my exposition is not any assumption about the author, but the fact that the hero is exhibited, in the plainest manner, both as an unbeliever in the popular religion, and also as a believer. The play is, on the face of it, perplexed and enigmatical. I seek from it, and from it only, an answer to the questions, what did the author intend to convey, and why does he convey it in such a form and manner as he does. And the same is true, mutatis mutandis, for the other plays which I have treated.

The result of these enquiries, no doubt, is to confirm the ample extant evidence respecting the opinions of Euripides, the use which he made of the theatre for the propagation of his opinions, and the reputation for insincerity and duplicity which he incurred. But these are the sequel, not the source, of the investigation.

As to the Bacchae, Euripides, I have little doubt, would have found it easy to write letters of encouragement, and honest letters too, both to Prof. Murray and to Mr. Norwood; and I shall hope to deserve one myself, if I should expound the play in my turn. Here, if ever, whatever Euripides meant or expected, it was not to produce agreement. I think he would be very well pleased with our situation, far better pleased than at any other time since he died.—Yours, &c.,

A. W. VERRALL.

EXPERIMENTS ON ANIMALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I beg room to reply to Mr. Stephen Paget's letter in your issue of May 23rd, more especially because "The Times" has refused me the opportunity of answering a similar letter of Mr. Paget's that appeared in its columns?

1. The general principles which, I claimed, should make the public hesitate to subscribe to the Research Defence Society Mr. Paget ignores, hoping by the quotation of statistics, &c., to confuse the issue. Such tactics remind one of those adopted so dishonestly by the Anti-Vivisectionists, and justify the thoughtful man's reliance upon principles rather than figures. To tell us that 94 per cent. of experiments upon animals are inoculations, and thus to suggest that but a small actual number of animals is sacrificed to experiment, is beside the mark. Indeed, the argument recalls the methods of Mr. Stephen Coleridge (one whom I revere for his integrity of purpose and love of the helpless), who would have us believe that an increasing mortality from diphtheria proves the uselessness of its anti-toxin, though he should know that the death rate per hundred of cases attacked has been reduced enormously wherever it is used.

2. Mr. Paget writes as though I were wholly ignorant of my subject, and that, in speaking of "the physiologist's unassailable secrecies," I am ignorant that my visiting card would admit me to any classes of physiology. He forgets, perhaps, that I am a colleague of Lister, Ferrier, and Halliburton, and know something of my subject. He forgets that I know that the sort of experiment which the public have just reason for fearing is done in secrecy and never in class.

3. Mr. Paget makes a poor show in defending the physiologist's devotion to humanity, especially when, as in his letter to "The Times," he declares that the discoverer of anti-toxin does a thousand times more for humanity than the mere doctor who uses the discovery. Neither Mr. Paget nor myself can claim to be of the profession's very backbone, for we are not general practitioners; and for that very reason we should know more of what devotion means than those who practise it. The general practitioner is terribly overworked, and has, on the average, wretched pay; he is hardly able to provide for family and old age, and he dies young; he often has no intercourse with his equals, and may be ruined by a word from a coroner's jury or by an ignorant layman's criticism. Yet he does not prate of his devotion. He has, moreover, his own Medical Defence Union, and makes no advertisement to the public of his virtues and needs. Against these truly heroic servants of humanity Mr. Paget sets the physiologist, who, however hard he may work, is blessed with the comforts and honor of a scientific post, the pleasures of teaching and co-operation with men of like culture. Nor are the personal risks of his calling in any way comparable to the practitioner's. Yet these physiologists appeal to the public for encouragement and moral support against their enemies whose only sin is glorying in what, more than any other property, makes mankind different from beasts, namely, their humanity.

4. Theoretically, I admit, the law does its best to prevent that free hand which I have said is accorded to the physiologist. Practically, however, there is no check upon him. The inefficiency of factory inspection is notorious, especially where factories of unblemished reputation are concerned.

5 and 6. Nor do I doubt Mr. Paget's assertion that curare is but seldom used, nor that the physiologist takes means for preventing pain wherever possible. But I repeat that familiarity with the quite horrible procedures in the laboratories, with the machines for compelling an outraged life to remain in a disorganised body, with the inevitable contrivances for preventing the animal from moving or giving evidence whether or no it is properly anæsthetised, completely justifies my fears that less care is taken than in a surgical operation to ensure perfect anæsthesia.

The remainder of Mr. Paget's letter is concerned with details and statistics which have nothing to do with the purpose of my former letter, which, perhaps, I may repeat, was not to attack the claims of the physiologists, but to assert that (1) it is not in the interests of the public sanity and health that they should be familiarised with pathological science, and (2) that if we had more thorough inspection the public would discover no sort of use for the Research Defence Society.

But, Sir, if only for the sake of forestalling future claim upon your space, pray allow me another word. My opponents stand to right and left of me. The physiologists, because I plead for the virtue of humanity, call me sentimental and ignorant of what science has done for medicine. The anti-vivisectionists assail me because I bid them be true to fact and not distort statistics. To the mere scientist, the higher attributes of man, his hopes that can never be justified by evidences, his ancient faiths not countenanced by experiment, his honoring of life for life's sake despite its cheapness, its failures, its disasters, all these which, more than the physical laws of his nature, make man peculiarly what he is, are but side issues. On the other hand, to the man of feeling and faith, science, because it worships material welfare, and spares men the very labor of living; because it multiplies the comforts of the rich and cripples the poor, chaining them to machines in prisons called cities, instead of inspiring them to work like men; because of this latter day's cringing before the wonders of science, asking of it miracles in healing and absolution for sins against the eternal laws; because of such misuse of the gifts of knowledge, I say, the man of feeling and faith comes to look upon science itself as an enemy of life. The truth is that the whole of our modern system is run on false lines. And because science invents machines to circumvent labor, organises laws to disorganise freedom, and generates disease to forestall its destructions; because, moreover, all who would live justly and simply and lovingly must conform to the tyrant ways or submit to starvation, we too readily acquiesce in the authority of the men who hold the reins of this power. Just as the question of the unemployed will never be settled by robbing the worthier of their work and wage, but only when the righter way of mutual service is refound, so the rational cure of disease will be discovered, not by experimental pathology but by living the saner life. The people must learn the way to live rather than tricks to hoodwink death.

Sir, Mr. Paget's letter is practically an invitation to the public to trust the physiologist and ask no questions. But many of us have learned through bitter experience a distrust of Authority whatever her credentials, and however sincere her supporters. Time was when those who claimed a special prerogative from on high to preach the gospel of love, and were accredited by the people with power direct from the Originator of that gospel, were yet guilty of the Spanish Inquisition. Not even centuries can change the nature of man; and we who doubt must not be blamed if we ask for assurance that those who now preach a gospel of science are not tainted with a penalty of power that blunts their sympathy with suffering.—Yours, &c.,

GREVILLE MACDONALD.

Harley Street, W.
May 26th, 1908.

P.S.—By this morning's post I receive a most shocking confirmation of the danger to the public in familiarising them with physiological horrors. In an advertisement of a certain meat juice, I find two colored portraits of distinguished medical men in Paris. One is represented as turning a huge press. From its sides pours the blood of a live ox whose body is crushed flat, but whose head protrudes with an expression of agonised suffering. The other is holding up by the tail a live rabbit, with a huge thermometer projecting from its body, and the upturned eyes suggesting futile appeal. These are jokes, I presume; but not the less do they symbolise the appalling degradation to which familiarity with physiological detail has brought their perpetrators. I enclose these for your inspection.

WHAT DOES VOTES FOR WOMEN MEAN?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "A. Grimshaw Haywood," in your issue of the 23rd inst. asks for information as to the exact terms on which women are asking for the vote. Suffragists demand the vote on the same terms as it is or may be granted to men. That is to say, they demand that every woman who would be entitled to vote if she were a man, shall be placed on the Parliamentary register. They are not asking that all women should be admitted to the franchise, since all men are not; they simply ask that duly qualified women should be entitled to vote at Parliamentary elections.

As to the anti-Government policy which your correspondent objects to, the Suffragettes oppose the Liberal candidate at bye-elections because he is the nominee of a Government which refuses to give votes to women. So long as the Government remains obdurate, it is impossible for a Women's Enfranchisement Bill to become law. This is clearly shown in the fate that has befallen Mr. Stanger's and the twenty-eight previous Women's Enfranchisement Bills.

One of the most effective methods of bringing pressure to bear upon any Government is by fighting against them at bye-elections.

The Suffragettes are determined to oppose every nominee of the Government until such time as they receive a definite pledge stating that the Government intends to adopt and carry into law a Women's Suffrage Bill.

Trusting you will find space for this somewhat lengthy letter.—Yours, &c., NANCY LIGHTMAN.

THE RUSSIAN VISIT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was glad to see your firm and dignified protest in last week's NATION against the King's visit to the Russian Emperor.

This is the second time that our tactful King has declined from grace; the first being when he was unfortunately absent during the interregnum consequent on Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's death.

However, the country seems fairly roused now, and Mr. O'Grady's spirited protest in Parliament last night will do much to restore the confidence of democrats in the Labor Party, which, I believe, it was losing owing to its too conciliatory attitude.

One cannot help wishing that on such an occasion the whole Party had protested, for surely there never was a more fitting time for men elected by the Labor vote to raise their voices.

It is remarkable that it was left to an Irishman to do the work of the British democracy.

Can it be that all classes of our population are too parochial and narrow in their interests to see anything outside their immediate affairs?

Anyhow, we may hope that the strong feeling that has been roused in the country against the visit of our humanitarian and good-humoured King to the representative of the most blood-stained and tyrannical government of modern times may be abandoned.

Surely, if our King wishes to meet his relation, the Emperor, in a friendly way the natural place for them to meet is in some neutral State.

Yours faithfully,
R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

THE TOLSTOY CELEBRATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It appears to be certain that Count Tolstoy, while desiring to hold completely aloof from all responsibility for the celebration of his eightieth birthday on August 28th, is yet not displeased at the idea of an appreciative and sympathetic recognition of his labors by those who have been consistently his friends in England.

This Committee, therefore, will now proceed to carry out the scheme which has already been laid before the public. They propose:—

1. To prepare an address of congratulation to be signed by all persons who are in sympathy with Count Tolstoy; and
2. To publish and distribute as widely as possible a cheap edition of his writings in English (since this, it is understood, would please him more than anything else).

The latter involves the translating of a number of his works still untranslated, buying the copyright of certain translations which do not belong to him, and securing a publisher against loss involved in publishing a popular edition. The edition should be worthy of Tolstoy and his English admirers.

We feel sure that Tolstoy's English readers and disciples recognise his unique position, and will join us in carrying out these objects in a manner suitable to so exceptional an occasion.

The address will lie for signature on or after June 15th at 14, St. James's Square, S.W.; Messrs. Williams & Norgate's, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; Mr. A. C. Fifield, 44, Fleet Street, E.C.

Cheques or postal orders may be sent to Messrs. Barclay & Co., 1, Pall Mall East, payable to "Tolstoy Fund," or to the Hon. Secretary, 14, St. James's Square, S.W.

THE REFERENDUM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It seems very unfortunate that because Catholics dislike the Education Bill of the Government, and others dislike the Licensing Bill, and so on, that we stand a chance of having our Free Trade system set on one side, not on its merits, but on side issues. Oh, for the Referendum which would prevent such serious misrepresentation.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

AT NIGHTFALL.

(Words for a Cadence of Chopin).

WHILE he rides the spectral avenues,
Night's black caldron spills its raven hues.

Stars forsake him: shadows cover him:
Deadly trees drip poison over him.

In the fields his steed went cantering;
Through the thorns it stumbles sauntering.

In the sun his horn rang merrily;
Weary now, he winds it wearily.

Ghosts of men, that once were friends to him,
Whisper through the gloom like fiends to him.

Bones of heroes bleach and blacken there,
Whom the dusk has overtaken there.

Sure he knows the night must come on him,
That shall bring the same dark doom on him.

He, too, drop, where others dropped before;
Though he hope not all they hoped before.

Still he smiles serenely, candidly,
Facing night and doom undauntedly:

Still, though every hope be stinted him,
Rides towards the place appointed him.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will publish towards the end of next month a new volume of "Miscellanies" by Lord Morley of Blackburn. It will contain reprints of his essays on Machiavelli, Guicciardini, and several other literary topics.

THE number of British subjects who have risen to eminence in the service of foreign Governments is very considerable, as a book which is shortly to be published by the Marquis de Ruvigny shows. It attempts to enumerate and account for those English, Irish, and Scottish families who, leaving their own countries, became naturalised and ennobled abroad. The "wild geese" who flew away from Ireland are, of course, known to fame, and the 'fifteen and 'forty-five drove a host of Scottish families into exile. A great number of these entered the military service of the land of their adoption, and the Order of St. Louis was won by over two hundred Scottish and Irish officers for valour on the field. The roll of the Spanish Order of St. James of the Sword, also, between the years 1600 and 1860, gives the names of fifty-four Irish soldiers besides Scottish and English. Even higher honours were won by some of the descendants of these exiles, and we find a MacMahon, President of the French Republic, a Clarke, Minister of War to Napoleon I., a Stuart-FitzJames, Duke of Alva, and a Count Hamilton, President of the Swedish Diet. It is surprising that so little has been written upon these famous exiles, or upon the foreign legions in which they usually served. The Marquis de Ruvigny's book upon the subject can hardly fail to be of romantic interest as well as of great historical value.

PROFESSOR MASPERO has written an introduction to a book on "The Queens of Egypt," by Miss Janet Buttles, which Messrs. Constable will publish within the next few weeks. Although the queens of ancient Egypt held a position unique in the world's history, and the legal standing of women in general was a remarkable one, this is the first book that has been written on the subject. Only of late years has enough material for such a work been brought to light, but modern Egyptology has collected details sufficient for Miss Buttles's purpose. Her book extends over a period of thirty-five centuries, from 4000 B.C., when we have the first record of a queen upon the throne of Egypt, down to 525 B.C., the date of the death of the Queen of Thebes. Miss Buttles has aimed at reconstructing the environment, political, social, and domestic, of these ancient Egyptian queens—an interesting though difficult task which is at least sure of the credit that belongs to pioneer work.

A BOOK on "Chaucer and His England," by Mr. G. G. Coulton, will be published in the autumn by Messrs. Methuen. It deals not only with the poet, but with the whole society of his day, and may be expected to throw much fresh light on our knowledge of the period. Mr. Coulton's former works on medieval history, "From St. Francis to Dante," and "Medieval Studies," gave rise to a storm of controversy, but Mr. Coulton brought forward a heavy weight of evidence in support of his account of medieval monastic life.

READERS whose taste lies in the direction of adventure will welcome two books which Mr. Murray announces. "Gentlemen Errant" relates the travels and adventures of four noblemen in Europe in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. They wandered about in search of wives, wealth, and battles, somewhat after the style in which d'Artagnan set out into the world to seek his fortune. The book has been compiled by Mrs. Henry Cust from authoritative sources. The other book, "A Mariner of England," is the autobiography of a seaman named William Richardson, who lived in the moving times from 1780 to 1817, and, starting as a cabin-boy in the merchant service, became a warrant officer in the Royal Navy. Richardson served in a slaver on the Guiana coast, took part in Abercromby's expedition to St. Lucia, in Strachan's action after Trafalgar, and was employed in rigging up the fireships for the attack in the Basque Roads, of which he gives a vivid description. A seaman's account of the slave trade and of life in the Navy of Nelson's days can hardly fail to be fresh and full of interest.

AN important work on "Indian Sculpture and Painting," by Mr. E. B. Havell, Principal of the Government School of Art and Keeper of the Art Gallery at Calcutta, will shortly be published by Mr. Murray. The book is written from the artistic, not the archæological, standpoint, tracing the evolution of the Indian ideal and explaining the fundamental differences between it and the standards of Greece and Rome. Mr. Havell, who has given many years to the study of Indian fine art, holds that the painters and sculptors of India are not, as is commonly believed, inferior to her poets and dramatists. The concluding chapter of the book deals with modern Indian painting, special attention being given to the work of Mr. Abanindro Nath Tagore, a painter whose genius has been recognised by many European artists. The work will contain a number of colour reproductions of typical masterpieces both in painting and sculpture.

ONLY two more volumes are required to complete the twenty of which Messrs. Jack's fine series "The Makers of Canada" will consist. These, which are "Lord Sydenham," by Professor Adam Shortt, and "Sir James Douglas," by Mr. R. E. Gosnell, will be issued during the coming autumn. Lord Sydenham's career is of great political interest since it was while he was Governor-General that the union of the different provinces was accomplished. Sir James Douglas had a varied and adventurous life. He was a member of the court-martial that condemned Admiral Byng and later served at the reduction of Quebec and commanded at the capture of Dominica. His work in British Columbia coincided with the development of the country by the early fur-traders, so that in dealing with him Mr. Gosnell has plenty of romantic episodes on which to draw.

THE next volume in Mr. Fisher Unwin's "South American Series" is on "Peru," and has been written by Mr. C. Reginal Enock, whose excellent book of travel "The Andes and the Amazon" will be remembered by those interested in South American exploration. The coming work gives a detailed history of Peru, with its romantic episodes of the Incas and Pizarro, but a full description of the present political and commercial condition of the country is also included. Peru has long stood in the minds of men as a symbol of unbounded wealth, and Mr. Enock shows that there are great mineral resources in the country yet undeveloped, while cotton and cane plantations, and the indiarubber forests which are abundant in Peru make it a fine field for colonists. The country certainly seems destined to have a magnificent future, and Mr. Enock has done useful work in directing attention to its possibilities. Major Martin Hume has written an introduction to the volume.

JAMES THOMSON.*

How charming Kew must have been in the days before it was a suburb, before even George III. had discovered it! How charming it is even now that it forms a fraction of London's frayed edge, especially when the azaleas and rhododendrons are in bloom, despite the vast swarms of cockneys that pour across its bridge and patronise its shilling teas! The area of its tea gardens is ever enlarging; the quaint high-pitched bridge had to be reconstructed a year or two ago, when the contractors played the good joke, now rendered a trifle stale by excess, of postponing the completion of the structure until a month after the formal opening. The bridge was put up to auction in 1819 and sold for £22,000. It is probably worth more now, but it is far less picturesque than the old toll-bridge, and nothing like so steep. Passing by the green, and the Herbarium where the blind King of Hanover used to play as a boy, and the long, grudging park wall, and Queen Charlotte's Pagoda, the smooth turf round which it was William Cobbett's youthful task to keep neat, and the prim round targets of the Toxophilite Club (indomitably suggestive of Gwendolen in "Daniel Deronda"), be sure to look out as you enter Richmond for a modest turning on the right named Evelyn Road. It will take you into Kew Foot-lane, where the poet Thomson lived for many years, first in a small cottage higher up, later in a larger cottage, now absorbed into the Royal Richmond Hospital, where the Foot-lane is fed by Evelyn Road. We always make this detour to avoid the noise and the ugliness of suburban shops, to get a glimpse of the Old Deer Park, and to meditate on "The Druid," as Collins called him. One likes to remember him, if not to read him. One likes to think of him returning along the foot-lane after midnight from a visit to Twickenham, fumbling about with his cottage door, or walking back from the river after a city jaunt with Mallet at any hour of the night. Was he really so fond of a "wee drappie" too much? Did he really cut his books with the snuffers? When Quin frightened the hairdresser's apprentice by stating that he kept barbers' ears in his parlour as a boy did birds' eggs upon a string, did Jemmy Thomson soothe the sensitive actor by interjecting, "Never fear, mon, Wull shaves vera weel"? Until about forty years ago there was a pretty little summer-house in the lane with this inscription:—

> "Within this pleasing retirement, allured by the music of the nightingales, which warbled in sweet unison to the melody of his soul, in unaffected cheerfulness and genial, though simple elegance, lived James Thomson. Sensibly alive to all the beauties of nature, he painted their images as they rose in review, and poured the whole profusion of them into his inimitable 'Seasons'! Warmed with intense devotion to the Sovereign of the Universe, its flame glowing through all his compositions, animated with unbounded benevolence, with the tenderest social sensibility, he never gave one moment's pain to any of his fellow creatures, save by his death, which happened at this place on the 22nd August, 1748."

Was this really so, apart from the date of the poet's death, which is here put forward by just one week?

Mr. Macaulay appears to regard these little traits as of very secondary importance; but to us they seem to make all the difference. So long as Jemmy Thomson was a quiet, honest-hearted soul who lived in a "foot-lane," stumped among his books and composed Miltonics during the night, got drunk once a week with Parson Cromer and other cronies, and was extravagant only in wigs—so long we were content to regard him as a picturesque and rather engaging minor poet, who, having had his day, had become, perhaps, just a little unduly obscured and forgotten. Like a dissenting conventicle or a Roman Catholic Chapel in the days when such temples were hidden away in some very modest bye-lane of the city, the reputation of Thomson made no claim to popularity, but it had something about it that was endearing to people of a meditative or retrospective cast of mind.

Down to 1800 Thomson was Scotia's national bard, and to Lamb and Coleridge he was what Eliza Cook or Martin Tupper were to Matthew Arnold, a bye-word for the poetry known to the inn parlour. And Thomson stood in somewhat the same relation to Cowper that Gray stood in to Tennyson, a kind of rude forefather of Nature Poetry. But now that Thomson emerges from the shady side of the road, now that he parades with some fanfaronade as a Grand Poète, and occupies a choir-stall in the choral service of English verse—now that, in other words, he pretends to a monograph in the English Men of Letter series, we cannot but fear that his modest and unpretentious popularity is in some degree of refrigeration. In due historical priority and place Thomson was undoubtedly a very real poet; he saw everything poetically—as Johnson admits—and well he might in such an age, when people of rank and fashion thought themselves highly honored in extending to nature poets the privileges which belonged by prescription to the junior members of the first aristocracy, commencing with comfortable sinecures ranging from £300 a year upwards. The guineas, by the score and the fifty, which the booksellers of those days paid to untried young poets are the astonishment of subsequent generations. Our poet, it is true, wrote sonorous blank verse; he contrived poetical compounds not unworthy of Keats, such as "the faint-gleaming dawn," and he first told of a "bickering" stream; but it must be admitted that Thomson had little originality, and for that lack he pays now in the general indifference. To gossip about Thomson a little, to encounter an occasional (very rare) excerpt in an anthology, or even to hear of a colossal French monograph on the European influence of "The Seasons" breaks no bones; but to have him treated with such conscientious rigour and frankly academic thoroughness by Professor Macaulay in this series, can hardly fail to prove an ordeal as to the ultimate effect of which upon the delicate equilibrium of the Thomsonian Legend we cannot but tremble.

The whole point of this highly organised and educative book, though it seems as if Professor Macaulay were hardly aware of it, is to show how very little claim Thomson has to that outstanding power of initiation and artistic direction which alone, in our opinion, should be allowed to constitute a claim to a place of such prominence as that implied by a volume in this series. The claim that Thomson (and not Homer) was the pioneer of nature-poets was always about as absurd as the pretension that Capability Brown, rather than Adam, was the first of landscape gardeners. The fact is simply that the urbanised folk of Queen Anne's day were the first who needed set pieces in this particular kind. They demanded them of Pope, but Pope was otherwise employed, and Thomson, a praiseworthy apprentice, having obtained his master's gracious permission and goodwill, made a specialty of them. Pope taught him to study old English poetry, and to develop Miltonic diction. Since Addison's papers, Milton had, indeed, been adopted by the blue-water school of English poetry as a model worthy of all national imitation, and when later, in the "Castle of Indolence," he went further back still, Thomson was not endeavouring to revolutionise English poetry, but merely following a fashion of Spenserianism which had by that time (1747) set in with considerable violence.

His set-pieces, for all their narrowness of convention, show that Thomson was a true poet, if rather a grandiloquent one. Moreover, they set Pope free to follow the bent of his own genius, which that poet did to an extent far beyond Thomson's reach. Thomson could never entirely emancipate himself from the studio tricks and mannerisms acquired from Twickenham. Occasionally it may be that he caught a gleam of Pope's vivacity, as where he wrote of his friend Murdoch as—

but this was seldom. Mr. Macaulay's general criticism is admirably sound, scholarly, and sagacious, and we are quite sorry when biography and criticism determine, having fully expended themselves, in 105 pages. One hundred and fifty pages still remaining to be filled, these are occupied with a minute analysis with numerous quotations not only of "The Seasons" and "The Castle of Indolence," but also of "Liberty" and "The Dramas." This is too much! One rubs one's eyes, one is obsessed by the idea that this is not a volume of English Men of Letters at all but a Thesis for the French Doctorat. But it is all in vain. Mr. Macaulay is pitiless, remorseless! he goes on analysing the dregs and codifying the results like a Poetical Bentham. No literary laboratory in future can be complete without his monograph. It is all very sympathetic, discreet, and dormitive; but it won't lead to a single dog's ear of the right sort for the soft, kind-hearted, well-nourished Thomson. For our part, let us retrace our steps, and, as we recross the new bridge, linger affectionately on the right parapet over the still charming profile of Strand-on-the-Green. Hither the bard would summon a waterman to row him to his friends on Hammersmith Mall. Here it was that he caught a chill on that fatal day in August, 1748. The Gentle Shepherd who depicted the seasons fits quaintly into the scene of this "many twinkling" waterside hamlet. As a nature poet he was not greatly accomplished like Keats or Tennyson; but let it be remembered that he drew Nature for its own sake, not with the delicacy or minuteness of Cowper or Crabbe, but broadly and well. There are many mansions in the Paradise of Poetry, and Thomson made no claim to one facing "the Park." Friendly and discreet, with three or four hundred books and a compact cellar of claret, and a head humming with poetry, especially in the small hours, he dwelt amid the nightingales and facing the old Deer Park in Kew Foot Lane.

OPERA AND THE ENGLISH.*

We English are probably the most extraordinary people under the sun; instead of listening to music for ourselves and enjoying it, we prefer to read what someone else has to say about it. How otherwise can we explain the fact that so many books are published—apparently with enough success to induce publishers and authors to continue in the business—upon all kinds of composers of whom the average Englishman knows nothing, and can never know anything so long as the present conditions continue? Within the last three or four years, for example, there have been quite a dozen books issued the sole object of which is to tell people the stories of the Wagnerian operas. Yet in the English provinces the public is still, some twenty-five years after Wagner's death, almost wholly ignorant of his work. It hears the "Tannhäuser" overture pretty often, and half-a-dozen other excerpts make their way into concert programmes now and then. It has an occasional chance of hearing "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin" given in a second-rate style. The "Rheingold," "Götterdämmerung," and, of course, "Parsifal," it has never seen; of "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger," the "Valkyrie," and "Siegfried," it has had at most a performance or two. Even this applies only to the larger towns. Yet for some strange reason or other this same public will buy book after book on the subject of Wagner's music-dramas. Nor is this passion for the literary side of opera confined to Wagner's works. At least four books dealing with the "plots" of all the chief operas, from Gluck's "Orfeo" to Puccini's "Madame Butterfly," have quite recently been published in England; one of these volumes claims to be the twenty-fourth edition of a book first issued a good many years ago. And here is the third edition of Mr. Streatfeild's excellent book on "The Opera" to show that the public appetite for verbal descriptions of musical works is inexhaustible. If the English public were not so inveterately sluggish, so slow to bestir itself for anything that has no recommendation beyond the fact that it is artistic, it would see to it that it had some opportunities of hearing operas as well as reading about them. As it is, not one Englishman in fifty thousand has any chance of hearing more than ten or twelve of what may be called the standard operas, to say nothing of new or old works that run for a few weeks without becoming permanently fixed in the repertory. In 1905 there were two hundred operatic performances in this country, as against 7,600 in Germany. On the other hand, we have probably had at least 10,000 performances of "The Messiah" and "Elijah." Yet we wonder why foreigners regard us as an unmusical race!

For those who want to read about operas even if they cannot hear them, Mr. Streatfeild's book is much the best that can be had in English. He is not a mere story-teller; he is a critic and historian as well. Sandwiched in between the stories of all the operas in the modern repertory are swift and reliable sketches of the development of opera in each country; while the musical characteristics of each composer—almost, indeed, of each work—are discussed briefly but illuminatively. One cannot, it is true, agree with all his judgments, and one could wish that he had given a little more space to some topics and a little less to others. He talks unusually well about Méhul, Weber, Berlioz, Bruneau, and other composers, and about unduly neglected works like Schumann's "Genoveva"; but he skims rather too hastily operas like "Carmen" and Gluck's "Paris and Helen"; gives us a little too much Massenet, overrates an intrinsically poor musician like Boïto, and hardly does full justice to Cherubini and Cornelius. He has not much palate for Oriental humour, or he would not call the plot of "The Barber of Bagdad" "puerile," or speak of it as a "silly story." Nor does the rather sniffing allusion to Tchaikovski's "Eugen Onegin"—he merely tells us that "much of the music is interesting"—suggest that he has caught the essential charm of the work. Like most people, he overestimates "Aïda"; as a matter of fact, Verdi's last period does not begin with "Aïda," but with the Manzoni Requiem three years later; the psychological gulf between "Aïda" and "Otello" is really greater than that between "Trovatore" and "Aïda." And one would have expected a critic of Mr. Streatfeild's discernment and independence to have broken away from the old-fashioned exaggerated adulation of Mozart. He complacently accepts the conventional view—most fatuously expressed in Gounod's hysterical book on "Don Giovanni"—that Mozart was a musical god who could do no wrong, especially in opera. Even Hazlitt, many years ago, expressed his surprise at the pother that was made about "Don Giovanni"—which, like "Figaro," is a delightful work with some moments of unusual power, but by no means the series of profound and unerring character-studies that we have always been told it is. Mr. Streatfeild echoes too readily the sacrosanct theorem that in "Figaro" "the all-embracing genius of Mozart made an artificial comedy of intrigue, which is trivial when it is not squalid, into one of the great music dramas of the world." Beaumarchais's comedy is not artificial, not trivial, and not squalid; on the contrary, it is full of an insight into character, a justness of observation, and a spice of expression, to which Mozart never attained in opera. To go from Beaumarchais's "Figaro" to that of Mozart is at times like going from the big world into the nursery; Figaro himself is, in Mozart's opera, the merest child in comparison with the subtle, alert, quick-witted Figaro of the dramatist. If any other musician had missed the whole point and essence of the play as Mozart has done, he would be condemned for it; when Mozart does it the critics turn up the whites of their eyes in admiration, and talk of him as having "lifted the drama into a diviner world." Modern musical criticism should get away from these legends of the 'thirties and 'forties.

Upon one other point we are compelled to disagree strongly with Mr. Streatfeild. He pleads for a "national school of opera"—which he rather fantastically thinks could be founded on Sullivan—suggests that "if ever we are to have a school of opera in England" we must begin like Weber, and "turn to the melodies of our native land," and opines that "if we are ever to have a national English opera we shall get it by writing English music." Some of us think, on the contrary, that to aim consciously at a "national" or "English" style is to prevent English music from ever becoming first-rate. Great art is not national but universal. Gluck and Wagner did very well without "the melodies of their native land," and Weber could have done without them. Sullivan is enjoyable not because he was English, but because he was Sullivan. We do not, in fact, need a "school" of opera or a school of anything else. All we need is composers who shall have something to say and know how to say it. "Gerontius," for example, is a great work, but it is not "English" in any sense; it is no more English than human nature is English. Great art does not speak in dialect.

Murray was rash enough to express a hope that the great "Oxford Dictionary" would be finished by the year 1908. The year 1908 has come, but, alas, not yet the tenth and last volume of the world's greatest lexicon. To some of us the slow advance may be disappointing: to those who have watched with wonder Dr. Murray's unremitting toil and unquenchable ardour, it fosters an eager hope that the master-builder may be spared to see his great task accomplished: but every studious lover of the English language must have a sense of thankfulness that this splendid monument of English scholarship and Oxford munificence is not being spoiled by the arts of the "hustler" and the "jerry-builder." The value of the Dictionary lies mainly in its historic accuracy and research, and to prepare it more rapidly would be little wiser than for a merchant to throw his most precious cargo overboard in order to gain a few knots of speed or to save a few tons of coal.

The portion of the letter "M" before us gives a fairly equal number of technical and scientific terms and of venerable English words with a long and interesting history. Our political readers may find some appropriateness in the publication of the "Monopoly-Movement" section simultaneously with the introduction of Mr. Asquith's Licensing Bill! The earlier pages of the section deal with Mono- compounds, and will chiefly appeal to the student who is taking a casual dip into a treatise on some unfamiliar scientific or philosophical subject. But here and there may be found some long-drawn-out verbal horror which can plead utilitarian justification for its existence. The terrible term Monopolylogue, with all its length, is a convenient name for an entertainment in which one reciter sustains the parts of many speakers, but we venture to think that the Editor might have characterised the adj. Monoptical (one-eyed) as something worse than "humorously pedantic." One of the gravest perils of the "Oxford Dictionary" is that its excellence may give it a misunderstood authority. The fact that a word is recorded there without condemnation will too often be taken to give a patent of respectability to a verbal vagabond. May not the point of this remark be seen in the inclusion of the adj. Monstre (marked, indeed, as a foreign word) and its description merely as "a frequent journalistic substitute for Monster"? Oddly enough the illustrative quotations are not from journalists.

The group of medieval Romance words includes Mortgage and Mortmain. The article on the latter has considerable historic interest, whilst the quaint etymological explanation of the former, quoted from Coke's great "Commentary on Littleton" (A.D. 1628), is not unworthy of one of our twentieth century judicial humourists:—

> "It seemeth that the cause why it is called mortgage is, for that it is doubtful whether the Feoffor will pay at the day limited such summe or not, and if he doth not pay, then the Land which is put in pledge vpon condition for the payment of the money, is taken from him for euer, and so dead to him vpon condition, &c. And if he doth pay the money, then the pledge is dead as to the Tenant, &c."

Speaking of humour, we must not overlook the delightful quotation under Monosyllabic, adj. 2, from Dickens' "Nicholas Nickleby":—

> "The same gentleman . . . again made a monosyllabic demonstration, by growling out 'Resign'!"

To many readers the treatment of the words More and Most may appear needlessly elaborate; they occupy thirteen columns. But it is precisely here that the student of language will find the greatest satisfaction, as it is here, certainly, that the compiler has done some of his best work. The contrast, for example, between the comparative forms "truer," "oftener," and the combinations, "more true," "more often," is admirably brought out. The articles on Month and Moon are almost encyclopædic in treatment; yet it is difficult to suggest any part which could have been omitted without serious detriment to the clearness of the historic presentment; indeed, the condensation by which hundreds of compounds and phrases are dealt with in the six columns devoted to the substantive Moon is most commendable. The words, Moor sb.[1] and Moss sb., show a similar treatment of a wealth of compounds.

The group of words connected with the O.E morgen—Morn, Morning, Morrow, gives scope for much philological exposition, and is profoundly interesting. If we venture a criticism, it is that perhaps the inchoative or inceptive idea implied in the final -ing of Morning is insufficiently illustrated. It would, we think, have been well to follow the treatment of Evening, and to attempt a distinction between the older and narrower sense (the twilight hours that introduce the "morn") and the later and more general one in which it gradually became merged. We think, too, that it is undesirable to leave a main word without other explanation than a parenthetical cross-reference, as in the compound Morning-gift, the bridegroom's dower to his bride. Perhaps, also similar "counsels of perfection" might be given in regard to the Papal title Monsignor, --signore, which is not marked as a foreign word, although the Italian plural, -signori, is added, and to Mote v.[1] (to be obliged), which is merely marked as archaic, whereas it is clearly obsolete, the only example since the eighteenth century being quoted from Byron's "Childe Harold." No scanty praise is, however, implied in the fact that a critic can only find tiny flaws in a mass of admirable work.

The section of P (Polygenous-Premious) before us is the work of Dr. Murray, and is prefaced by a few pathetic words of gratitude for the help and sympathy of honorary fellow-workers recently removed by death. Whenever the story of the New English Dictionary is written it will contain a wonderful record of splendid services gratuitously rendered to this great work by many of England's busiest and most learned men and most cultured women. Few have rendered better service or shown greater sympathy than Miss J. E. A. Brown of Cirencester, Lord Aldenham (formerly Mr. Henry Hucks-Gibbs), and Dr. E. L. Brandreth, who all passed away in the year 1907. Such helpers deserve a nation's gratitude.

For the most part the letter P introduces words ultimately derived from Greek and Latin, and these have usually a shorter history in English than those of Saxon ancestry. For this reason we shall look for the editor's best work rather in the tracing of the sense-development than in etymological investigation. One special feature of interest is the comparatively large number of words (e.g., Pope, Port, Post, sb.[1], &c.) borrowed from Latin at the earliest period of Teutonic contact with Roman civilisation, whilst another group, dating from the earliest French contact (e.g., Poor, Pose, Pouch, Pray, Preach, &c.), is scarcely less interesting. It must not, however, be supposed that the etymologist will find no problems to solve. There are many difficulties yet to overcome and many obscurities on which, so far, even twentieth century philology has thrown no adequate light. It is suggested, for instance, that the word Pond, a pool of water, may be a variant of Pound, an enclosure, but beyond this nothing is yet known of the ultimate derivation of either.

A curious, but common, freak of our language is shown in the insertion of an alien n in the words Porringer and Pottinger, derived from Porridge and Pottage, and a similar eccentricity in the altering of the fifteenth and sixteenth century word Poulter, a dealer in pullets, into our later unreasonable Poulterer.

It is, however, especially in the exemplification of the methods by which language changes and specialises the meaning of words that we find unusual interest in this section. The word Post sb.[2] first meant a relay of messengers or horses placed or "posted" at a particular spot to carry forward important despatches; then the messenger who rode "through the posts," and so any bearer of urgent despatches; then the vehicle carrying the despatches; then the removal or "clearance" of a quantity of letters from any one place of collection; then the official system of letter-carrying, and so all the modern uses of the word connected with the Postal Service: now the system is "the Post," the office or pillar-box is "the post," the clearance of letters is "the post," and even the official who delivers the letters is also called "the post," much as the word Mail, which meant a trunk or wallet, has acquired an equally extended meaning. But a more remarkable fact is the appearance of no less than nine substantives Post, all ultimately derived from the Latin verb pono, to place. The earliest of these, Post sb[1], meaning a stake or pillar fixed in the ground, appears in O.E.; in the sixteenth century we get sb.[2] (from the French), a relay of men or horses to hasten transit; sb.[3] (also from French), the place or duty appointed for a soldier (whence the naval terms Post-captain, Post-ship); sb.[4] (from Italian), a term, now obsolete, used in card-

AN AUSTRALIAN VIEW OF "PUBLIC OPINION."

Here is an Australian estimate of PUBLIC OPINION, from the Sydney Stock and Station Journal, published in Sydney, N.S. Wales:—

"This week there came to hand the very sort of paper that a busy man wants, and that is PUBLIC OPINION. I remember having seen it years ago in England, but somehow amid the multitude of things I saw at home, it failed to grasp my imagination. But it's an all right paper. You would think it was the idea on which Stead modelled his Review of Reviews.

"It is simply what it professes to be, public opinion. It gives you the opinions of leading men and leading papers in regard to the current events of the day. No man out here has either the time or the inclination to read all that is going on in the great British world, and this paper boils it all down, and gives it as purely as possible. What I like about it is the fact that the editor does not appear to have an axe to grind or fad to illuminate. That is what we need. We all have fads of our own here, because I think we are more intelligent than the stay-at-home people. If we're not, we probably think we are, so it's all the same. 'Cogito ergo sum.'" playing; in the eighteenth century, sb.[5] (apparently from Italian through German), a technical term in certain trades; in the sixteenth century again, sb. [6] (directly from the Latin), a technical term in law; in the eighteenth century, sb.[7] (a late formation from the English verb), an entry "posted" in a ledger; in the nineteenth century, sb.[8] (formed from the earlier sb.[3]), a military bugle-call; and, lastly, sb.[10] a modern abbreviation for "Post-captain"; whilst there is still sb.[9] (not of Latin origin), an Indian plant name. The casual reader is tempted to think that substantives [2], [3], [8], and [10], might appropriately be treated as one word; but doubtless it is historically more accurate to mark [2] or [3] as distinct borrowings from French, and [8] as a new English formation; and we suppose that the plea for sb.[10] would be that as a mere ellipsis it may stand for any compound form of any of the earlier substantives. We cannot but think that the reprinting of a few such articles as those on Post, sb. and vb., Poor, adj., and Pre-, prefix, in school-book form would furnish capable teachers of English with an invaluable implement for developing that appreciation of words which, whilst essential to good speaking and writing, is comparatively rare. The Dictionary is impossible as a school-book, but a judicious selection of some of its best historical articles would be of immense educational value.

Amongst articles of special historic and general interest we must mention those on Polynesia, Pomegranate, Potato, Pragmatic, and Pray. Concerning the introduction of the Potato we read:—

> "In 1693 its introduction into Ireland was attributed to Sir Walter Raleigh 'after his return from Virginia' (where he never was); but no contemporary statement associating Raleigh's name with the Potato has been found."

We began our examination of this section expecting to find somewhat less than the average degree of interest in the words it contains; but the expectation has not been fulfilled. The features of attraction vary, but the excellence of the treatment and the wealth of illustrative quotation maintain the charm of this unique treasure-store of words.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The Catholic historian, Johannes Janssen, in volumes IX. to XII. of his "History of the German People" (translated into English by A. M. Christie, and published by Kegan Paul, 25s. per two vols.), has performed with great skill for his own country the task which Father Gasquet has partially attempted for England. He has challenged the theories of the standard Protestant writers, and has accumulated a mass of evidence which will to some extent necessitate a revision of older views. Janssen's proposition is that the fount and origin of German decadence in the seventeenth century is nothing else than the Protestant Reformation. According to his interpretation of the past, the Thirty Years' War was but the inevitable climax to the century of demoralisation that followed the nailing up of the theses on the church door at Wittenberg. During the hundred years that elapsed between that event and the outbreak of the great war, Germany underwent "an almost entire change, both in inward character and outward aspect, in every part of its existence; and the reason of this lay in its separation from its own past, in the violent breach which had taken place with all the traditions of former times. . . . The fiercest fire of religious hatred blazed abroad, and Germany became gradually filled with a spirit of theologising savageness and barbarity which had the effect of undermining all strongholds of faith among the people, of obscuring the moral judgments of the nation, and of bringing learning and art into contempt and ruin." This history is thus frankly apologetic in character. Its method illustrates the advance that has been made in the manners and tactics of religious polemics during the last 300 years. In the sixteenth century Luther had urged that "without doubt those who have the Spirit of Christ know well that they can bring no higher or more acceptable praise-offering to God than all that they can say or write against this bloodthirsty, unclean, blaspheming whore of the Devil." Thus gracefully did Luther refer to the Papacy. His followers with zest accepted his advice. They and their opponents—both Calvinist and Catholic—vied with each other in enriching the theological vocabulary of abuse with expressions gathered from the stable and the gutter; and summaries of these noisome controversies fill more than 400 pages of the present translation. Janssen himself studiously refrains from abuse. His own method is to collect evidence—the evidence which tells against the Protestants, all the bad deeds and thoughts that emanated from them in this miserable age; and since his work professes to be scientific history, he does not altogether ignore the shortcomings of the Catholics themselves. In the two volumes which narrate (more fully than in any previous English work) the confused political history of the German States from 1582-1617, the religious bias of the author is less disastrous than in the volumes which deal with the art and literature of the Reformation age. Janssen is too good a Catholic to be a critic. To him Holbein is the painter of Henry VIII.'s "concubines"; Lucas Cranach is the producer of "dogmatic denominational pictures"; Dürer is the inventor of "a new art under the influence of a false naturalism." An historian with whom the nude is synonymous with the indecent cannot be a safe guide to the merits of Renaissance art. Like an unsympathetic inquisitor, Janssen condemns the productions of this unbelieving age to wholesome condemnation. Odd bits of interesting information may be dug out of this history—for instance, about Paracelsus and demonology. To read through the four volumes from cover to cover might be recommended as a form of Lenten penance.

The reader of Mr. Reginald Lucas's biography, "Colonel Saunderson, M.P." (Murray, 12s. net), will gain from its pages a pleasant impression of the witty, brilliant, and generally good-tempered leader of the Orange Party in the House of Commons. Colonel Saunderson was sometimes a vitriolic speaker, but he made few or no personal enemies, chiefly because his opponents felt that he was sincere, and because his career had no taint of self-seeking. He gave and received vehement and even brutal abuse, but when the long battle was over he and his adversaries retired with mutual respect and even good-will. Without the highest gifts of oratory, he was a fine declamatory speaker, and he carried on the struggle against Home Rule with a fierce kind of insight which occasionally produced notable effects. In private life Saunderson was a raconteur brimming over with humorous irresponsibility. He was a great yachtsman, building and sailing his own boats. He was also a keen golfer, and some of the illustrations in this volume show that he had skill with brush and with pencil. To complete the curious range of his activities, he was something of a preacher, and a small collection of his sermons has been published. Some of the Colonel's judgments on the great Parliamentary figures of his time deserve mention. He described Palmerston as "the Chamberlain of his day, the embodiment of the John Bull spirit and national feeling." Disraeli was the most interesting speaker, Gladstone the most powerful, but Bright far excelled them both. He gave utterance to the finest English the Colonel had ever heard in the House. The keynote of Colonel Saunderson's character was his sincerity and his power of speaking and acting as he thought. It was this quality which made him a power both in Ulster and in the House of Commons, and it is this quality on which Mr. Lucas rightly lays stress in this interesting memoir. Saunderson was in no sense a great man, but he did much to discredit the policy which one of the greatest of English statesmen attempted.

Sir James H. Ramsay's latest contribution to English medieval history, "The Dawn of the Constitution" (Sonnenschein, 12s.), like his former works on the same subject, is based on an independent and scholarly examination of the original authorities. It covers the reigns of Henry III. and Edward I., the latter sovereign's Scottish policy receiving special attention. Sir James Ramsay rates Edward I. rather lower than do most historians, though he is by no means blind to the patriotism and love of justice which did much to redeem Edward's uncompromising autocracy and the equivocation into which his high ideas of the royal prerogative sometimes led him. The period is an interesting one, and the narrative gives the general reader a good idea of the gradual process by which the need of money for the French and Scottish wars forced the kings and nobles to add to their councils those representatives of counties and towns who in later years attained so powerful a position. The full way in which the revenues of the two sovereigns are dealt with is a valuable feature of a book which should prove of great service to students of our early political and constitutional history. The attribution of the lines beginning "Ruin seize thee, ruthless King," to Gray's "Elegy" is obviously a slip of the pen. The book is well furnished with references to original authorities and there is an excellent index.

A Novel-Reader's Guide:—"Prisoners of Chance." By Randall Parrish (Putnam's Sons, 6s.). An excellent series of tales of adventure. The scene is the America of the later eighteenth century and a strange tribe of sun-worshippers is introduced.—"The Pedestal, or Son and Mother." By Desmond Coke (Chapman & Hall, 6s.). A story of a boy baronet and his widowed mother, showing observation and written in a pleasant style.—"The Splendid Coward." By Houghton Townley (Greening, 6s.). A melodramatic story of a forgery for which a son assumes responsibility to shield his mother.—"The Wheel o' Fortune." By Louis Tracy (Ward, Lock, 6s.). An exciting story of hidden treasure.—"A Prophet's Reward." By E. H. Strain (Blackwood, 6s.). A good historical romance of the French Revolution.—"The Shadow Between." By Silas K. Hocking (Warne, 3s. 6d.). Card-sharpers, silver caskets, wrecks, mines, and missing documents follow thick upon each other, but, despite them all, the tale is unconvincing.

The Week in the City.

The steady decline of money rates is a cause of rejoicing both to the Stock Exchange (which always gets business from the short loan market when money is cheap) and also to commerce and business. The reduction of the Bank Rate to 2½ per cent., which came on Thursday, had been anticipated for some time. Yet there is no decided upward movement in securities. The growth of speculation in the United States and Canada is not liked here, and the American market has been in a nervous condition, with a good deal of genuine selling from the other side. The crop reports are less satisfactory, and it is felt that we might see another ugly crisis if the bumper crops (which have been so much discounted by greedy Yankee speculators) should prove a disappointment. I am afraid the list of commercial failures is still far from complete. In Chili, indeed, the situation is mending a little, and the same may be said of Peru. But Brazil is beginning to pay the penalty for its coffee valorisation scheme, as, indeed, it deserved to do; for the attempt to prop up prices by Government buying was wholly artificial. The news from Japan is also rather serious. A great number of failures are occurring, and among foreign merchants there have been considerable losses. The debt charge is beginning to prove a heavy burden, and the only relief is heavy reduction in army and navy, which is just what the Government has been trying to avoid.

The Credit of Russia.

A Paris financial house has just issued a paper about the Russian debt, obtained from official sources. According to this, on January 1st of this year Russia's debt was 929 millions sterling, and the annual charge for payment forty-one millions. More than ten millions had been added to the debt during 1907, yet a writer in the "Westminster Gazette" says, "it should be noted that Russia's financial position is perfectly sound." I sincerely hope that British investors will note the exact contrary. The position, indeed, is radically unsound. Last year was a comparatively good year, yet it added ten millions to the capital, and at least half a million to the debt charge. This year the Government talks of a much larger loan, and although the French investor may again come forward, every new addition to the debt decreases the security, which is the taxable capacity and patience of a very poor, discontented, and heterogeneous population. The idea that the King's visit to St. Petersburg will make Russian investments popular in England is surely mistaken. The only reason why the French bankers go on supporting Russia is that they dare not allow her to default, but that consideration will not affect London, and investors here will not put much money into Russian securities until they see signs of returning sanity in the Government and returning prosperity in the country. Recent consular reports from Russia are most depressing. The industrial situation is almost as bad as it can be. On the other hand, there are fewer big disturbances and outrages, and the continued existence of the Duma must be counted a favourable factor, especially as it has put a stop to the projected naval programme. The secret of the Russian loan has been very well kept, and the best-informed people in the City are quite uncertain about the date when it may be expected. Probably it will not be for some time, and, meanwhile, the Foreign Bond market has been enjoying quite a boom.

Central America.

Although Central America is still one of the most distracted and disagreeable parts of the earth, there seems to be more hope now that the United States and Mexico are exerting themselves on behalf of peace and order than at any previous time. The Panama Canal is now making rapid progress, and that will certainly give an impetus to the adjoining countries. The foundation and establishment this month of a Court of Appeal where the Central American States can settle their innumerable feuds by peaceful litigation is a great step in advance, and Mr. Root deserves great credit for his skill in carrying through the idea. Investments in Central America are still speculative, but there is more hope for them than there used to be.

The Male Complexion.

Men are supposed to be somewhat indifferent regarding their complexions. But why should they be indifferent? Complexion ought to be a serious matter to a man as well as to a woman.

The better a man's complexion the more youthful he looks, and youthful looks are a passport to many desirable things. Moreover, the purer a complexion a man has the more healthy is his skin—and he himself feels more bright, more active, more alert. Indeed, it would be possible to prove by strictly logical argument that a man's complexion is an important factor in his success. And that is one of the reasons why he should

Diary of the Week.

On Thursday, Mr. O'Grady, on behalf of the Labor Party, moved a reduction of the Foreign Office vote, as a protest against the State visit to Reval. He spoke strongly but moderately, and suggested that the King's humane character was alien to the horrors of persecutions in a country where in a short period 1,200 people had been executed for expressing Sir Edward Grey's political opinions. The Tsar's personal responsibility for these crimes was shown by his wearing of the badge of the anarchic association known as the Black Hundreds. The following speeches revealed divided opinions on the Liberal benches. Mr. McNeill took what seems to us to be clear constitutional doctrine when, following Sir William Anson, he insisted that if the Reval visit was official, the King should have been accompanied, not by Sir Charles Hardinge, but by Sir Edward Grey. Sir Ivor Herbert thought the refusal to go to Reval would be insulting to the Russian nation, which was the view of Mr. Belloc. Mr. Harwood, on the contrary, asked if British opinion would sanction a State visit to the Sultan, and thought that in a life and death struggle for freedom we should hold aloof from the oppressing force.

Sir Edward Grey showed the extreme nervousness which marks him out from all our Foreign Ministers, and conspicuously from Lord Lansdowne, as his indifference to liberty separates him sharply from the Liberal tradition in exterior policy maintained by Palmerston, Russell, and Gladstone. His main argument was that the Russian policy of the Government, based on agreement and cordial understanding, though not on any new Treaty or Convention, led to peace, that of refusing a State visit to the Tsar to war. We think that some limits should be set to this type of argument. In the same spirit Sir Edward Grey argued on the Sugar Convention debate that we could not even announce our Free Trade policy in regard to sugar imports without provoking Continental unfriendliness, and declared that we could not cancel the shocking sentences at Denshawai without peril to our hold on Egypt. No British party opposes friendly relations with Russia; and we do not think that John Bull would have been stricken with the tremors of palsy if he had learned that they stopped short of a State visit to the Tsar.

Sir Edward held that there was distinct progress in the internal situation, and that liberty was slowly developing. Certainly the Duma was not elected democratically, but neither was the House of Commons within his own memory. Mr. Balfour and his Party cordially supported the Foreign Secretary, declaring characteristically that clear judgment on the rights and wrongs of the struggle in Russia was impossible for contemporaries, that liberty was not nowadays imperilled by meetings between monarchs, and that mere moral, or "barren" intervention in Russian affairs was an insolent claim of superiority. Mr. Keir Hardie was called to order by the Chairman of Committees, and risked suspension by saying that the visit was a condonation of "atrocities" for which the Tsar and his Government were responsible. This ruling seems to us greatly to narrow the ground of Parliamentary criticism of despotic acts of Governments. The Labor motion was rejected by 225 votes to 59.

The Russian Liberal papers, writes our St. Petersburg correspondent, reproduce, without comment, the not very enthusiastic remarks of the English Liberal papers on the approaching meeting at Reval, but confess that they are obliged (from motives of prudence) to omit some hard things which their London confrères say of the Russian Government. As for the Russian Liberals, their position is this: They are unwilling to see the bureaucratic régime strengthened by a rapprochement with England. They would like to see the Tsar without an ally in the world, isolated, contemned, until such time as he repents and governs his people properly—that is, allows them to govern themselves. But at the same time they see that if a rapprochement with Liberal England does not take place, a rapprochement with illiberal Germany is certain; and, as Russia generally thinks that the reactionary advice of Berlin is accountable for much of the Tsar's obstinacy in misgovernment, they desire a rapprochement with England. Rightly or wrongly, the Russians are convinced that if the Tsar's throne fell before the revolutionists, the Kaiser would immediately march on St. Petersburg in order to restore the autocracy, just as the Prussian armies tried to march on Paris when the first French Republic was proclaimed. They think that he would do this not only because of the strong views he holds on the subject of Divine Right, but also because of his fear that the Russian example would speedily be imitated in Berlin. Any rapprochement, therefore, which would place this strong-minded man in close relations with the Tsar would be viewed with alarm by about 99 per cent. of the Russian people. On the other hand, an alliance with England would, in the opinion of the Liberals, be most desirable, inasmuch as it might lead to the Tsar falling under the influence of a sensible, democratic monarch without any medieval illusions on the subject of government.

The Opposition amendment to the second reading of the Finance Bill was rejected on Tuesday evening by 367 to 124. Nominally the amendment, which no member of the Front Opposition Bench cared to move, called for a broadening of the basis of taxation on the ground that existing finance offered no adequate provision for naval and military defence, old age pensions, education, and the relief of rates. No attempt was made to expound the meaning of this phrase, which Mr. Buxton called a "platformula," and no Conservative leader plumped either for retaliation or food taxation, or protective taxes on manufactured articles. Mr. Bonar Law, challenged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say whether he favored the taxation of bread and meat, answered, "Make me Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I will tell you." Mr. Balfour, similarly confronted, declared that he had once imposed a corn tax, and if the circumstances of the country required it he would do so again. Declining to indicate their own policy, and thus securing the vote of the tiny Free Trade section, the Opposition endeavored to force the Government to declare the lines of the Budget of 1909. The Prime Minister bluntly said that no one "out of a madhouse" would suppose that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would declare his Budget twelve months in advance. Generally, the Government opposed firmly the broadening process which, as Mr. Winston Churchill said, simply meant transferring taxation from the rich to the "thread-bare shoulders of the poor."

An important debate was raised by Mr. Villiers on Wednesday on the renewal of the Sugar Convention of 1902, which is now to be continued for five years. The principle changes are that instead of prohibiting the supply of bounty-bed sugar, we consent, in fact, to limit its import, and bind ourselves to guarantee that no exported sugar refined in the United Kingdom has been bounty-fed. Russia is to be allowed to send us a million tons within six years, the limitation of supply, of course, carrying with it the desired stiffening of prices. In defending this position Sir Edward Grey spoke to a silent and unsympathetic House. His chief arguments were that, whether we were agreeable or no, Germany would have forced Russia into the Convention, and that Russia's yearly export was so low that we suffered little or nothing by its prohibition. Sir Edward Grey further suggested that if we had denounced the Convention our Continental relations might have been imperilled, and the most vital clause in our commercial treaties violated or evaded. This seems to us super-timidity. What nation has hitherto penalised Great Britain for keeping her ports open? No Liberal members supported this contention. Three members, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Austin Taylor, and Mr. Lough, who spoke with great brilliancy and some feeling, all denounced the Convention. On the other hand, Conservative and Protectionist members like Lord Percy and Mr. Mitchell-Thomson, who desire what they call the "steadiness" of sugar prices, praised the Government for their change of policy, and the Protectionist Press strongly approves.

Mr. Sydney Buxton has achieved one of the most brilliant administrative successes of the Government by arranging that after October 1st postage from this country to the United States shall be at the rate of 1d. instead of 2½d. The loss to the revenue is estimated at £130,000. We imagine that this will be rapidly made up, inasmuch as the number of letters sent in ten years has more than doubled. This reform is a great stroke for national comity, and works indirectly for Free Trade, while it will act as a very special boon to the poor Irish in America. The new rate makes the 2½d. post from London to Paris look absurd, and it is a long step forward to universal penny postage. Mr. Henniker Heaton, the father of this fruitful social idea, is greatly to be congratulated.

There has been considerable disorder in Samos, an island which since 1832 has enjoyed autonomy under a Greek prince nominated by the Sultan, but ruling on the advice of a Senate of four chosen from a Parliament elected by universal suffrage. For some years the Porte has been endeavouring to curtail the privileges of the island, and a small pro-Turkish clique has done its utmost to thwart the reforming spirit of Karatheodori Pasha during his period of rule in the island. The efforts of the people to extend their banking facilities have also been checked. Prince Andrea Kopassie has come into conflict with his Parliament, and was imprisoned by them, and summoned Turkish troops from Salonika. They have "restored order": a dangerous phrase where Turkish troops are concerned. It will be very unwise of Turkey to light the flames of fresh discontent in Asia Minor, to which the trouble in Samos may well spread.

The illegality of the action of the Natal Ministry in the stoppage of Dinizulu's salary, with their defiance of Imperial remonstrances, received so much attention in last Thursday's debate upon Natal as to obscure the far graver issue of the general administration of martial law, and the obligation of the Imperial Government in respect of the Act of Indemnity. Colonel Seeley appeared to accept the important interpellation of Mr. Lyttelton to the effect that the Governor retained the responsibility of refusing assent to martial law if he held such a course unjustified. But later on he lapsed into the view that Sir M. Nathan could not refuse in a self-governing colony to follow the advice of his Ministers. Sir William Robson, professing to expound the legal aspect of martial law, distinguished between the earlier school of jurists who held that martial law ought only to be resorted to for the purpose of meeting armed force, and what he termed "another school of jurists" who held that the apprehension of armed force was a sufficient justification. This latter reference is to the Marais judgment. By this finding during the South African War, Lord Halsbury, contravening the universally accepted doctrine, established the dangerous precedent which now bears fruit in Natal. It is noteworthy that neither this debate nor the various questions put to the Colonial Office has yet extracted any statement as to whether the Imperial Government, without any sort of independent inquiry, intends to ratify the Act of Indemnity by which the Natal Legislature proposes to whitewash its illegal conduct.

There is not much evidence yet of a new epoch in Portuguese history. One of the most unpopular and ill-advised acts of King Carlos and Senhor Franco was to increase the Civil List, and now the Government is proposing an even larger addition. The fact that the method this time is constitutional and not despotic, makes the measure no more palatable, for Portuguese finances are already hopelessly involved, and the wine-growers and agriculturalists generally are passing through a crisis. This kind of statesmanship is not improved by organising "loyal" demonstrations of students, which lead to street disturbances, irritate the very general Republican sentiment, and provoke heated scenes in the Cortes. The old political parties have not learned much from recent events, and are as indisposed as ever to grapple with the serious work of reform so desperately needed.

The Irish Universities Bill has encountered a serious obstacle in Committee. This is due to Mr. Birrell's decision to affiliate Maynooth. English Nonconformists who accept the Bill, not unnaturally ask that there should be some regular academic association between Maynooth students and the new Dublin University, and Professor Butcher has moved a proviso requiring affiliated students to pass two years of study in a constituent college. There seems no reason why a hostel for Catholic students should not be built in Dublin. Probably a compromise may be arrived at by adopting Professor Butcher's proposal as soon as such an institution can be set up.

General Sir Redvers Buller died on Tuesday at Crediton in his sixty-ninth year. He and Sir Evelyn Wood were the two most notable members of the Wolseley school of warfare. Buller, with all his friend's bravery, had little of his brilliancy and insight. His most conspicuous and most gallant service was rendered during the Zulu War of 1878, and in the time of peace he made a good Adjutant-General and a good Quartermaster General, doing some small bits of organising well. But his brief period of chief command in the South African War was a failure. He fed his troops well during the Natal campaign, but his battles were ill-fought, showing lack of tenacity and resource. It is fair to say, however, that the Boers considered him the best of the British commanders during the war, and in spite of his reverses, and up to the moment when his own tactlessness brought about his withdrawal from his Aldershot command, he remained the soldiers' favorite general.

The elections to the Prussian Diet, whose general character Herr Bernstein describes elsewhere, have thus far yielded a considerable victory for the Socialists. In spite of all the barriers, five Socialist delegates are certain to enter the Diet, and they are involved in five second ballots. The Socialist victories are mostly in Berlin.

The removal of Zola's remains from the famous cemetery at Montmartre, to which there is now the usual pilgrimage, to the still more famous Panthéon, was marred by a revival of fanatical Nationalism. The ceremony was an act of solemn State restitution and honor. M. Fallières attended it, and personally saluted Madame Zola, and the Minister of Commerce delivered a panegyric on Zola's service to the cause of "justice, truth, and light." As the troops were defiling, a M. Grégory fired two shots at Major Dreyfus, one of them wounding him deeply in the arm. He proved to be a member of the staff of the fashionable French paper, the "Gaulois," the proprietor of which, M. Arthur Meyer, is himself a Jew by birth. The criminal was seized by Major Dreyfus's brother, M. Mathieu Dreyfus, and the wound is not dangerous. The Nationalist Press generally rebuke and disown his act.

The London Missionary Society have arranged a great spectacular pageant of missionary life and work under the name of "The Orient," which was opened by Mr. Winston Churchill at the Agricultural Hall, on Thursday afternoon. We shall deal with this interesting event fully next week. The Hall has been changed into what has been called a Palace of Missions, in which every form of Eastern and Western faith, other than Christianity, from the most enlightened to the most primitive, will be brilliantly illustrated. There have been great organising efforts to make the spectacle live, both as a picture and as an intellectual reality, and during the exhibition a constant succession of lectures and addresses will vary the material show.

The papal interdiction (writes our Paris correspondent) of clerical mutual aid societies in France is entirely consistent with the previous action of Pius X., and shows the same disregard for the interests of the French Church, as distinct from those of Rome. The Pope refuses to allow French priests to use their right as citizens, under the ordinary law of France, to provide for their old age by mutual insurance. The French Government will be not a penny the worse, either morally or materially, but, on the contrary, the richer by one or two hundred million francs, which the clergy lose. It will be remembered that in March the Archbishop of Rome obtained the Pope's sanction to a scheme for mutual aid societies in his province, and announced the fact in his official diocesan periodical. Thereupon Cardinal Mery del Val had the Archbishop's announcement contradicted first in the "Corrispondenza Romana," and then in the "Osservatore Romano," which is the official organ of the Vatican. Since then his Eminence has employed every method to obtain from the Pope a condemnation of the mutual aid societies.

Mr. Stead has drawn from Mr. Moberly Bell, the manager of the "Times," a statement as to the improved circulation of the paper. It would seem that the point to discover is not who buys the "Times," but who owns it. The identity of the successor, or successors, to the Walter family in the controlling ownership of the "Times" has hitherto been withheld from the public. Yet its disclosure seems to us to be vital to the character of that journal.

The collection of Illuminated Manuscripts, which is now being exhibited at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, is unquestionably the finest that has ever been brought together in a single gallery. Its range is from the ninth to the sixteenth century, and it includes examples of every civilised nationality in Europe. There are over eighty English MSS., the Winchester School of the tenth century being represented by the famous Benedictional of St. Aethelwold, and the later periods by many quaint and beautiful specimens of Bible, Breviary, Psalter, and Book of Hours. Of no less importance is the French Series, which begins with a Beauvais Sacramentary of the tenth century and includes examples of the schools of Pucelle and Jean Fouquet; while the technical achievement of the Renaissance may be studied in the Italian work of the fifteenth century, and Flanders and Spain are fully and admirably represented.

Politics and Affairs.

THE PERIL OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The present Government is at times something of a puzzle to its friends. It does many good things; it contains men at once brilliant and able. But neither it nor its predecessor seems to live in the centre of politics—to set up with sufficient clearness and precision what are the conditions of its existence and how it means to fulfil them. It has a great store of energy in the laying down of ground plans, but it is occasionally embarrassed when it comes to the completion of the edifice. Take its sessional programme. About three full weeks of working time for the elaboration and completion of its measures remain to it before the session comes to an end. How is that time to be divided between the Licensing Bill, the Old Age Pensions Bill, the Education Bill, the Universities Bill, the Housing Bill, the Prevention of Crime Bill, the Children's Bill, and the Miners' Bill? Only two of these measures have entered the stage of Committee. Not all have been read a second time. The most important of all, the Licensing Bill, is practically remitted to the autumn session, and a violent and disturbing controversy, which upsets the normal balance of politics, must drag on through the year, and end perhaps, like the first Education Bill, in a fevered exchange of abortive communications with the Lords in the last days of December, 1908. But it is not only in the House of Commons that a Liberal Government lives. It must remain in vivid touch with popular sentiment. This contact seems to us to have been rather rudely shaken by the appearance of the Old Age Pensions Bill. It looks as if the Government had in this respect repeated the error of its predecessor in regard to the Trades' Disputes Act. Then the Ministry chose to take up a position which it could not defend before the House, and had to abandon at the instance of the Labor Party. The late Premier's adroitness saved the situation; but again we have the prospect that haste and a wrong choice of methods will force the Government to choose between abandoning or greatly modifying a faulty scheme, and sacrificing most of the social grace and usefulness of old age pensions. The disadvantages of this course, with which we deal in detail elsewhere, are clear. The Government will be represented by its foes on the extreme Left as having withdrawn from their Bill the most valuable feature of an Old Age Pensions scheme—namely, the lifting from the shoulders of the poor of a great weight of undeserved shame in old age and the establishment of a right, only granted at the extreme term of life, when bodily and mental failure is often complete, to an extremely modest subsistence. On the Right they will be held to have proved the demerits of a non-contributory scheme, and to have plunged without due calculation into the alternative. Now a third case of difficulty presents itself, the adherence, in a modified form it is true, to the Sugar Convention.

There, one would say, the course was plain. The Government came in as the trustees of Free Trade. The Sugar Convention was a Protectionist device. Adherence to it was pressed by Mr. Chamberlain, a Protectionist, as part of his preferential scheme. Its object was the Protectionist object of keeping up prices, and advantaging producers at the cost of consumers. In this case the consumers were the Free Trading British nation, the chief producers were Protectionist Germany and France. Germany, in particular, wanted to sell us as much sugar as she could, and at as a high a price as she could, and to find some means of steadying the downward tendencies of the market. All these policies and intentions were fully realised by the Liberal Party when they were in Opposition. Their leaders all agreed, with the single exception of Sir Edward Grey, that the Convention was a thoroughly bad instrument, and must be done away with. Their contention that it kept up prices has, as Mr. Lough shows in the "Contemporary Review," been thoroughly justified. We have had dear sugar, and the Convention is a powerful international instrument for keeping sugar dear. It was also declared that Great Britain could not join such a body with effect, because her single separate voice would be overborne by the commanding majority wielded by the producing Powers.

Well, we have become parties to the Convention, and engaged ourselves to consent to its renewal for a period of five years. The prophecies have been fulfilled. Sugar has remained dear. Our representative has usually been outvoted. The distinct pledges made by our own Government have not been kept. In August, 1907, Sir Edward Grey declared that the British policy was to be "free from any risk of having our markets restricted by the decision of the majority of Powers." We have now, in effect, submitted to such a restriction in the case of Russia, at the instance of Germany, her great rival in the British sugar market, and the effect of the announcement was a rise of a farthing in the pound in the price of sugar. We cannot say that we are impressed by Sir Edward Grey's argument, used in the House of Commons on Wednesday, first, that because Russia is to be allowed to import a million tons of sugar to Great Britain within six years our consumers will not seriously suffer; and, secondly, that if we had not joined the Convention Germany would have forced Russia into it. What power had Germany of forcing Russia into the Convention? That of shutting out her sugar from German consumption. But in return Russia, if fenced out from Germany, would have had the free and splendid British market at her disposal, the prize for which, of course, Germany herself is contending. It seems to us that we cannot easily measure the loss we have incurred through our failure to keep our ports absolutely open, and our use of the absurd device of lending ourselves to the restriction of the Russian export of sugar, while in words we invite unlimited imports. Russia has rich and most rapidly developing resources of sugar production. She has already stored up 500,000 tons, most of which, if Great Britain had kept a perfectly free hand, might have been used to sustain our own people. Indirectly she has in the past been a large exporter to these shores. What business is it of ours to aid the very natural desire of Germany to retain two-thirds of British consumption for herself, while she graciously permits Russia to enjoy about one-tenth? And what, with our single and well-defined interest in cheap sugar, have we to do with all these shifty and elaborate devices of Protectionist countries to keep it dear? Sir Edward Grey seemed to fear that, if we had not consented to bolster up the Convention, the Continental Powers might have reverted to bounties. Well, let them revert. If they like to tax their people in order to give us cheaper sugar, they are at liberty to perform this altruistic act. That they could have broken up the "most favored nation clause" in revenge for a simple adherence to the policy of open ports through which the volume of their trade freely pours, or that they would have shown some serious kind of unfriendliness, seems to us a somewhat panic-stricken notion. It is, indeed, unfortunate that Sir Edward Grey is usually unable to look at a simple proposition of Liberalism without discovering in it some explosive bomb, designed to wreck the Empire.

These matters are not details of policy. They have to do with its broad conceptions, and we think the Party has a right to call for clearness of vision concerning them. The existence and success of the Government are of the utmost value to the nation—to peace, to Free Trade, to social reform conducted by a party free of revolutionary formulæ and thus able to retain the support of the enlightened sections of the middle classes. Never was a less trustworthy Opposition, less candid, and more likely to plunge into what, without party animus, we may fairly call great tragedies of national politics, such as Protection and a war with Germany. To both of these ends the set and tone of the prevailing forces in Toryism are manifestly directed. But the country must be convinced that firm, active hands are at the helm, and a calm, steady vision on the look-out, that problems are being carefully thought out and thoroughly worked out, their cost counted, their place in the general scheme of policy duly fixed. The Government are hardly beset; but great forces of justice and consideration arise to help men who mean well, and can present clear reasons of principle and popular need for all that they do.

THE BLOT ON THE PENSIONS BILL.

The text of the Pensions Bill was issued on Tuesday, and we are concerned to find it marked by two very grave and far-reaching defects. This is the most important piece of constructive social legislation which the Government can be certain of carrying, and it is therefore of the first importance that it should be well-conceived. No one has asked that a complete scheme should be produced all at once, but it is essential that the model produced this year should be sound. When we read Mr. Asquith's statement we thought that, with one exception, such defects had been avoided. The scheme was to be non-contributory. There was to be no general or inquisitorial test of character, and the receipt of poor relief in the past was not to act as a disqualification. We are sorry to find on reading the text of the Bill that on the two last points it does not fulfil Mr. Asquith's expressed intentions. The Bill does impose a character test of the loosest and most objectionable kind, and it disqualifies all who have received poor relief, other than medical relief, since the beginning of this year; that is to say, everyone who is now above 69 in receipt of ordinary outdoor relief.

On re-reading Mr. Asquith's speech we cannot plead guilty to misunderstanding him. Nor can we make his words square with the provisions of the Bill. Take first the character test. Mr. Asquith handled it vigorously. "The less you go into questions of character, short of actual convictions of crime, the better. All the suggested tests look well on paper; thrift, prudence, character, good repute, look well, but when you put them into concrete shape, they are difficult to apply, and the application is apt to produce cases of unwarrantable hardship. Subsequent misconduct is a totally different matter."

We fully agree. Now, turn to the Bill:—We read in Clause III. that a person shall be disqualified, not only "if before he becomes entitled to a pension, he has habitually refused to work," but "if he has been brought into a position to apply for a pension through his own wilful act or misbehaviour." This is to hand over the whole of a man's record to the inspection of a Pension Committee. There is no time limit. The sins of omission of remotest youth may be the causes of the relative poverty of old age. There is no folly or mistake, not to speak of more serious faults, that might not be brought up against a man under this head. The result would be a wide divergence in the practice of different committees, reproducing the present variations in the granting of out-relief. There could be no pretence to a fair judicial enquiry. The investigation would simply resolve itself into a general inquisition into character, conducted by the local gentlefolk, clergy, and traders, or by members of the Charity Organisation Society. The test of habitual refusal to work is not, indeed, unreasonable, if it can be so distinctly defined so as to be capable of rigid proof. But even this point is not one to leave to the discretion of administrative bodies. Still less is it advisable to erect them into a General Inquisitory Board. There is an automatic test in the pension system which is worth all others put together—the test of living on the pension without asking for further help, or giving further trouble. Those who fail to do so may fairly be deprived. That, as Mr. Asquith said, is a "totally different matter" from the inquisitorial tests that go back over a man's past.

We pass to the disqualification of paupers. Here again Mr. Asquith's words, though not perfectly clear, are incompatible with the text of the Bill. Once again Mr. Asquith refused to go back upon the past. He rejected, amid cheers, the proposal of the Chaplin Committee, and refused to make the receipt of poor relief within twenty, ten, or even five years a ground of disqualification. He proposed "to exclude in the first year from the scheme actual paupers only." "Actual" might mean two things. It might mean those in receipt of relief at the time when he was speaking, or those in receipt of relief at the time when they apply for pensions. The Bill adopts neither meaning. It disqualifies for the present and for the future, "until Parliament otherwise determines," all who have received non-medical relief since January 1st, 1908. This is to rule out all old people above sixty-nine who are now on the rates. Members of the Society of Engineers who have been in receipt of good wages all their lives, and are already drawing pensions of ten shillings a week, are to have five shillings added. A rural laborer who has never earned more than fourteen shillings a week in his life, and has been forced to apply for help at 69 or 70, is to have nothing. A boilermaker whose union is indiscreet enough to give him 11s. a week gets nothing. A small capitalist who draws an income of £26 a year from safe investments gets £13 to add to it. But if he has £27 he gets nothing. A seamstress who has stitched shirts for 10s. a week till her eyesight failed, and was driven last January to the workhouse, gets nothing. A widow whose husband left her £20 a year gets £13. There is no end to the anomalies, the absurdities, the injustices. The clause practically wipes out of the scheme the poorer half of the working classes. For what percentage of this class are able to pass their 70th year without applying for relief? The effect of the Bill as it stands will be to pension the relatively well-to-do workman provided he is not just a little bit too well-to-do. He must not save too much, yet to avoid the inquisition he must show that it is through no fault of his own that his income is below 10s. a week. On the other hand, if he has never had the means of saving, and if his health fails him at 69, he must expect no mercy. He must go to the poor-law. As to the hope of simplifying the poor-law itself by removing the aged from its operation, that, of course, vanishes if the Bill passes in its present form. Indeed, we may well ask whether the six or seven millions that the scheme is to cost will bring the community as a whole any adequate return. To save the aged poor from destitution and dependence, to clear the poor-law of the burden and prepare the way for a still greater reform next year, were boons worth paying for. But the further endowment of the relatively prosperous artisan does not rank first among the objects which have a claim on the public purse.

We trust the Government does not intend to adhere to the Bill as it stands. A great mistake has been made in leaving it to departmental drafting. The result, as we have shown, is to defeat Mr. Asquith's expressed intentions, and to produce a Bill which at more than one vital spot is unsound. In addition to the defects already noted, the income limit is retained without a sliding scale. We have before pointed out the unwisdom of this arrangement, and need not here repeat our arguments. We can only trust that Mr. Lloyd George, who will now have the Bill in hand, will give serious and immediate attention to these points of seeming detail which are in reality threatening the whole scheme with shipwreck. Such a scheme as the Bill outlines can never pass the House of Commons, for it defeats the generous intentions of the party, and, we believe, of the Government, and takes away nearly all the grace and social efficacy of the gift of old age pensions.

THE "BROAD" ROAD TO PROTECTION.

The recent annals of Parliament nowhere record a more wanton waste of time than the debate on the amendment to the Finance Bill which the Opposition, abusing their rights of criticism, forced upon the House of Commons. The substance of this amendment was contained in the words that "this House regrets that no attempt is made to increase the resources of the Exchequer by broadening the basis of taxation." Now, neither in the speeches of the proposer and seconder, nor in those of Mr. Balfour, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, or Mr. Bonar Law, was there any attempt to explain, much less to justify, this proposition. Their policy throughout was one of manifestly organised avoidance. Everyone in the House and in the country is aware that "broadening the basis of taxation" is a euphemism for the protective proposals to which the Opposition is committed, and that, if it had been possible to secure a favorable vote for such an amendment, it would have been understood as a vote for Protection. Yet for two whole evenings this wearisome debate meandered from irrelevancy to irrelevancy, discussing now the economics of the Patents Act, now the Sinking Fund, now the relative financial strength of England and Germany, now the Naval Standard, brought up by sudden jerks whenever it strayed carelessly near to the brink of the fiscal proposals which alone gave point to the amendment. Once, and once only, did Mr. Balfour allow himself to be lured into a feigned declaration on the subject of taxing food, to the effect that he would be prepared to do again what he had done in 1901, "if the financial necessities of the country required it."

Nor was this all. Grave ex-Ministers committed the colossal impertinence of pretending that the amendment justified them in demanding from the Government an announcement of the steps which they intended to adopt for raising, not this year's income, but a hypothetical income to meet next year's expenditure. Well might the Prime Minister exclaim: "Does anyone out of a madhouse suppose that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going to get up and tell you twelve months in advance how he was going to arrange his taxation in his next budget?" If "broadening the basis of taxation" as a synonym for Protection had been so clearly defined already as to require no explanation, the supporters of the amendment were still called upon to make good the substance of their demand. In point of fact, as everybody is aware, the sole merit of this phrase has lain in its ambiguity, and the sole fruits of this wasted debate has been to increase that ambiguity. For until recently the leading mystery in the protectionist proposals had reference to the taxation of raw materials. Every formal statement by leaders of Protectionism has contained an assertion of the exemption of raw materials from taxation, but never accompanied by any definition of that term, or any statement whether semi-manufactured articles were included in that category or not. Whenever the local game of politics brought some grievance relating to raw materials to the front, such as slate, cement, iron bars, and, quite lately, hops, Tariff Reformers, great and small, have expressed their eagerness to tax that particular raw material. Indeed, as Mr. Buxton usefully pointed out in the debate, if raw materials are not to be taxable, all possibility of a Colonial preference with any semblance of efficiency in it disappears, so many of the largest imports from the Colonies belonging to this class. Needless to say, no gleam of light was shed upon this mystery. But now, as Mr. Churchill observed, it has become doubtful whether the broadening basis of taxation includes foods, for Mr. Bonar Law, in his latest reference to fiscal reform, spoke only of taxes upon manufactured goods, and when expressly challenged, gave a purposely evasive answer.

Can it be, then, that agricultural protection is to disappear, and that henceforth Tariff Reform is a mere manufacturers' game, to be spurned by the agricultural interests when they realise how they have been sold? Not at all. This was not the meaning of the evasions and silences, or of the wasted evenings. From Mr. Balfour's standpoint, the evenings were not wasted. His sole object throughout has been to keep Tariff Reform fluid, and, above all, to prevent the crystallisation into definite proposals. If things are now more mixed than ever, that is so much to the good, as he sees the political game. This is not, however, because he is "at heart" a Free Trader, and wishes to save his party from perdition. No such thing. The Conservative Party is solidly Protectionist, and Mr. Balfour knows it. But his recent experience has more and more convinced him of the utility of ambiguous phrasing as a means of luring back to the fold strayed or straying sheep. And "broadening the basis" has proved a particularly profitable protest against the "profligate finance" of the Government. It has won Lord Curzon, once a stout Free Fooder, who has been persuaded that the "broad basis" means an innocent Indian tariff, and not the revolutionary weapon forged in Birmingham. Lord Avebury, the voluminous pamphleteer of Free Trade, has cajoled himself into the supposition that the "broad basis" of new taxes will be accompanied by corresponding excise duties, and that the integrity of Free Trade will be thus miraculously saved. But the greatest triumph of all is the apparent capture of Lord St. Aldwyn, whose matchless dissection of the follies of Colonial Preference in the House of Lords last week was accompanied by an intimation that the general wickedness of the Government finance obliged him to put a favourable interpretation upon Mr. Balfour's policy. Long live "the broader basis"—at least, until the general election has put in office a Protectionist Party, who shall then proceed to tax foods, manufactures, and as many raw materials as can make good their claim in the accepted manner! Two days spent at the expense of the Government in advertising the most profitable linguistic ambiguity which has yet been thrown up by the fiscal controversy furnish a sufficient explanation of the party tactics of this discreditable episode.

THE SPECULATIVE REVIVAL.

ARE we at the beginning of a Stock Exchange boom? is the question that brokers, dealers, speculators, and even steady-going investors, who have been waiting for a turn of the tide, began to ask themselves and one another last week, when the Bank-rate was reduced to 2½ per cent. In nine cases out of ten the answer seems to have been "Yes." As a matter of fact, there had already been a very important rise in many of the leading markets from the lowest point touched last winter, when the shrinkage of values had gone so far that most people began to lose heart, and abandoned the cheery optimism that usually makes the bull contingent predominate over the bears. But as usual cheapness worked its own cure. The foolish speculator who had gone in, as usual, at the top, paved the way for the wise investor who recognises low prices, and likes to have good things cheap, whatever the mood of the moment. The tension of the money market had been, perhaps, the principal cause of the slump; and as that tension relaxed, money began to flow into the Stock Exchange. How the tension arose, and how the strain was relieved, is a question that deserves answering; for until it has been correctly answered we cannot hope to possess even the rudiments of a title to look into the future of the Stock Exchange, or to form even a guess at the prospects of the leading securities.

The general notion of your true City man—a notion entertained and fostered by the average City journalist—is that cheap money depends upon abundance of gold. Now cheap money notoriously tends to raise the prices of securities; therefore it is obvious that the Stock Exchange ought to pray for a large production of gold. Here we have in a nutshell the argument which threw the City man into such a passion over Chinese labor. He thought that if the Chinamen were withdrawn the output of gold from the Rand must be diminished, and that if the gold output were diminished the prices of Consols and all investments must fall. Every hypothesis and every step in this argument were false. In fact, the year of the American crisis, when money was abnormally dear, and when extreme depression reigned on the Stock Exchanges of the world, was also a record year for the output of gold from the Rand. The world's production of gold had doubled in ten years; yet at the beginning of the decade money was a drug in the market—our Bank-rate actually fell to 2 per cent. in 1897—and in the last of the series it was so scarce that many great firms and companies in all parts of the world, and all the banks of the United States, had to fail or suspend payment, simply for want of ordinary cash facilities, or owing to a quite unusual and unforeseen curtailment of credit.

Thus we are driven from a false theory to the true explanation. Gold, silver, and paper are all used as money, but the fact that at any given time these three commodities are dear or cheap has little or nothing to do with the question whether money is cheap or dear. The purchasing power of gold may be high or low, but that has no direct connection with the rate of interest. Indeed, when the purchasing power of gold is low the rate of interest may be high and money dear. Cheap money means that traders can obtain accommodation easily and cheaply, that they can borrow money temporarily at low rates and discount commercial bills on favorable terms. In the course of the last six months we have seen a complete revolution in the conditions of the Money Market. Six months ago our Bank-rate rose to 7 per cent.—a height which it had not touched for more than a generation. Now it stands at 2½ per cent., lower (with one exception) than it has been since the Boer war. The result of this, taken in connection with the great profits that have been earned during the trade boom of the last two years and the slackness that has supervened, is obvious. There are enormous sums of money on deposit at the banks, which have been earning good rates of interest, but are now earning very small rates of interest. Until the trade boom evaporated this money could be remuneratively employed in business, and, as prices were very high, far more cash and credit were required than usual to move the crops and to finance international trade. At the same time, there had been a long and feverish period of speculation on the world's bourses and exchanges. Speculation, whether in shares or "futures," means the distension of credit. At last the strain became too great. The balloon was pricked in Japan, in Italy, in Egypt, in Holland, and, finally, in America. The financial collapse of New York was followed by a general commercial collapse all over the States, and at the present moment the business depression in America is still most acute, while even in Europe trade is comparatively dull.

There is, therefore, a superabundance of loanable capital. Large sums are lying idle and seeking investment, and there is not much employment for money in the ordinary trade channels. Nor is it at all certain that the commerce of the world has yet reached the bottom of the declivity. At any rate, the recovery must be slow. No upward movement of importance can be expected until the crops begin to move, and the question whether the recovery will then be substantial will depend as much as anything upon the abundance of the crops. If nature is bountiful and food becomes cheap, we may look for a revival of trade, and a rise in the price of metals and the raw materials of industry. Then more and more money will go back into trade, more accommodation will be needed by merchants and manufacturers and shippers, increasing demand will raise the money and discount rates, and people will begin to sell stocks they bought during the period of cheap money.

Thus, apart from the chapter of accidents—supposing the world to remain at peace and no terrible losses to occur through earthquakes, famines, or other unforeseeable catastrophes—there is nothing artificial or surprising in the upward movement of stocks and shares. In which market it will be most conspicuous, how far it will go, whether it will be slow and sure, or rapid, feverish, and jerky, only the event can prove. The stock markets are almost as uncertain as the racecourses. All we really know is that, other things being equal, cheap money is a powerful factor in a Stock Exchange revival, and that the steady fall in the rates of money and discount has been giving a great impetus to the business of buying and selling securities. From this point of view London is in a much better position than Wall Street or Berlin or Paris, simply because our Government has been for three years pursuing a sound and marvellously successful financial policy. We have been reducing taxes and paying off debt at an unprecedented rate, and consequently, when the demand for investments expands, the way is led by Government stocks, of which the supply has been greatly curtailed during the last three years. Although the City as a whole detests Radicals, it has learned to appreciate the value of the Sinking Fund, and there are many hardened Tories in financial houses who would view with considerable apprehension the prospect of a spendthrift administration taking the place of the present Government. The weakness of industrial shares in Germany reflects the inconvenience caused by the Government's borrowing and the unsatisfactory conditions consequently prevailing in the money market. Similarly French Rentes have been suffering by the new taxation which increasing expenditure and the war in Morocco have made necessary. The American revival is so far wholly speculative, and represents the efforts of Wall Street to discount a bumper crop. Neither manufactures nor business generally in the United States have made any real recovery from the autumn panic, and the deficit at the Treasury is likely to prove an extremely awkward factor, even if, as we hope, the crops should fulfil all expectations. Perhaps the most curious feature of what we may call the speculative revival is the increased popularity of South African mining shares, for which well-informed brokers state that they are receiving more inquiries than at any time since the South African War.

THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD.

The popular attack in the East End on a motor-'bus which had reduced a child to shapeless pulp is, of course, in every way reprehensible. But we cannot affect surprise at this outburst in Mile End. What astonishes us rather is the long-suffering patience with which people endure the hourly danger and annoyances to which the bad regulations of the new form of fast road traffic subject them. The death-roll, as the Registrar-General's return has lately shown, mounts rapidly. The dust nuisance is unabated. The horse vehicle, the cyclist, and the pedestrian are almost driven off some of the main roads, which as ratepayers they have still to maintain. Property is depreciated, the amenities of the country—the great source of refreshment to the jaded townsman—are more and more destroyed, and in large measure streets and some country roads have ceased to be safe for children or for the infirm. Some compunction has indeed been aroused among the better class of motorists, and it is less rare than it was to see a car driven with some consideration for the safety and comfort of others. But a large number of motorists continue to treat the roads as the exclusive property of the fastest vehicle. The attitude of mind is amusingly illustrated by Mr. W. Reynolds in a letter to which the "Daily News" gives a cruel prominence, which puts the blame for accidents to children on the mothers, who let the children run about unguarded. How a poor woman is to keep her family within doors all day long, or how she is to provide for their constant supervision outside, the writer does not explain. It is enough for the motorist that the street is his. The children must be shut up. The halt and maimed must stay in bed. The motorist must have his rush, and if he does not kill anyone he claims positive moral credit for life-saving. This is no jest. Lord Russell, writing to support Mr. Reynolds, declares that every time he goes out in his motor-car in London he saves some half-dozen people. Everyone that he or his chauffeur does not kill is a life to his credit. Lord Russell thinks it "actually criminal" for children to play in the streets, just as it is actually virtuous for a motorist to avoid running over them. The toddling child and the whistling errand-boy are justly condemned criminals to whom the noble motorist graciously extends mercy. Lord Russell argues that public highways are provided at great expense and by the ratepayers for purposes of traffic. They were certainly not provided for traffic moving at railway speed, but for the convenience of the whole public. Children have run about them freely and safely in the less frequented spots for generations before the motor-car was heard of. They were sometimes troublesome, as children will be, but in the most barbarous days of the criminal law the death penalty for running across the road would have seemed excessive. It was agreed that the road being made by the public as a whole for the public as a whole, there must be fair give and take among all who used it. People were not allowed to drive recklessly, and the butcher's boy who shaved corners at half the speed of an ordinary motor was punished for furious driving, and condemned by the public as a hooligan. We have changed all that. The public road is no longer regarded as a place where every vehicle is alike bound to consider the safety of the public. The children are to be kept off it by their parents. The pedestrian and cyclist venture on it at their peril.

This thing is a growing scandal which is not exposed because all means of expression are closed to the sufferers. The Press is in the hands of motorists. In many cases the magisterial bench and the county councils are filled by the motor-owning class. The Local Government Board is utterly indifferent, though in Mr. Burns's hands it ought to have stood for the common rights of the people. Yet nothing is clearer than the complete breakdown of the present law. The police traps are useless, and do not touch the principal offence, which is that of reckless driving in towns and villages. Yet the continued growth of motor traction is certain, and, if properly controlled, has its advantages. The complete supersession of the horse by the mechanical vehicle is within measurable distance for urban traffic. We cannot, if we would, stop the development of motor traction. But control it we must, unless we are to allow the roads to become the monopoly of the rich and of certain great corporations.

How is this to be done? The existing speed limit is worse than useless. Its practical effect has been to abolish prosecutions for furious driving as judged by the common sense of a policeman and bystanders, and to substitute a mechanical test, which can only be proved by the mechanism of stop watches and preconcerted "traps." If the police and the magistrates could be trusted, the bold course of abolishing the limit altogether and relying on ordinary evidence of furious driving might be best. The practical effect of a twenty-mile limit has been to make any speed within that limit appear permissible, though there are places and times when ten, eight, or even six miles an hour may be an improper speed. It is monstrous that the same limit should be applicable to London and to a country road, and that localities should have no power to act freely for the protection of their own inhabitants in crowded streets and at dangerous corners. But the new system has grown up by favor of the authorities, and nothing but sharp and clear-cut legislation will now keep in order the guardians of order. How deliberately breaches of the law are permitted is to be seen in the statement that the police do not intend to prosecute in connection with their new system of long-distance timing, unless the average speed exceeds twenty-five miles an hour. The "Westminster Gazette" complains of the system as too hard, since over a long distance a motorist would often have to slow down to ten miles an hour, and should therefore be allowed to make it up by fast driving elsewhere. This is a neat exposition of the motorist's claim to take the legal maximum of speed as an indication of a fair average. But the police, it seems, accept this view, with something to the good. They allow an average breach of the law to the extent of five miles an hour, well knowing that to maintain this average the motor must often travel thirty or forty.

The matter, then, cannot be left to the discretion of magistrates and police. We have to work out a new code of highway regulations to deal with a new form of anti-social amusement. The first object of the legislation should be to save the towns and villages, and the first step should be a real speed limit of ten, or at most, twelve miles an hour in all populated districts. Such a speed can be approximately judged in relation to the speed of a hansom or a carriage, which is generally from eight to ten miles an hour, and a vehicle which is rapidly passing these is certainly going more than twelve. The independent opinion of two witnesses that a car is exceeding this speed is evidence of furious driving, which in the old days would have been thought ample for the condemnation of the butcher's boy; and, in point of fact, twelve miles an hour is the utmost limit of pace for a heavy vehicle in town or village that is consistent with the comfort and safety of the public. Another simple but most necessary change is to make the owner of the car when riding in it jointly responsible with the chauffeur for furious driving, and to substitute imprisonment for a fine at the third offence. The history of motoring has revealed that the class who dispose of the greater part of the national wealth are no more law-abiding, no more public-spirited, no more guided by a sense of courtesy and of what is due to the public than any other. Given a form of sport which involves breaches of the law and a nuisance to the public, they will for its sake habitually break the law and commit the nuisance. Motoring, if it has done nothing else, has dissipated the myth that we are governed by a natural aristocracy, who adorn with the graces of life the wealth which they deservedly enjoy, and scrupulously observe in their own conduct the laws which they pass and administer. It has familiarised us with the type of the hooligan "road-hog," flying about the country in a cloud of dust and stench, more objectionable as a neighbour than a dozen 'Arrys and 'Arriets of the kind which used to serve as the type of vulgarity. Considerations of seemliness are lost on such a man. Only the law can deal with him, and as the making and administration of the law is very largely in his hand, it will be a long and uphill fight to regain the liberty of the road.

Life and Letters.

ENGLISHMAN BORN.

The most significant scene in General Buller's career was that 29th of January, eight years ago, when his army was drawn up in hollow squares to hear him speak. Only three days before, a week of the hardest and most terrible fighting of the war had ended in complete failure. A series of checks and reverses had culminated in the bloody disaster of Spion Kop. Nor was this the General's first disaster. Colenso lay only some six weeks behind him, and there his men had for the first time learnt the bitter truth that a great and fully-organised British Army, with Irish, Scottish, and English infantry, the best of cavalry, batteries, naval guns, army service corps, ambulance, transport, kitchens, camps and all, could be defeated. Revived by sports, food, and rest, they had swung far westward, crossed the Tugela at two main drifts and stormed the heights from which their goal of Ladysmith was actually visible only twelve to fifteen miles away. There lay the starving and hard-pressed comrades, to whose rescue they had been sent—linked battalions, well-known officers and men, whose signals for assistance they could plainly see flashing from a little hill. They were almost within touch, the great exploit had been almost accomplished. And now the army was back again, across the river on the wrong side, the heights still held by the enemy, the task still to do, the goal as far off as ever, and nothing to show for all that labor but the loss of 1,700 men. It was "As You Were"—always an irritating order, and in wartime you never are as you were.

Into the hollow squares the General rode, heavy, impenetrable, his face revealing no sign of emotion or thought of any kind, his back like a mountain side. Certainly he had reputation to support him. China had known him, and Ashanti, the Red River, Egypt, and the Soudan. Within three days' ride of this very place he had won his V.C., warring against Zulu assegais, twenty years before. But it is not past exploits that men think of at such a moment. That very day he was preparing to move them against the enemy again; they did not know where or with what design. And there he sat, impassive and unstirred, with all his failures thick upon him, probably at the moment the most criticised man in the world, and the most decried.

He began to speak. The sentences came blundering out, abrupt, disconnected, ungrammatical. He said something about thanks, and then he said something about the discovery of a key. Yes, his men had helped him to the discovery of a key! Not a soul present knew what he meant. Not a soul since has interpreted his meaning. To the whole of his army his speech was unintelligible; he might as well have been speaking in Zulu. But, unintelligible or not, that made no difference to his men. They received those halting, meaningless words with an outburst of applause such as has rewarded no orator since the world's creation. Cheer succeeded cheer: it seemed as though the cheering could never stop, and inspired with an enthusiasm of devotion unreasoning as a lover's, off the army set to lay down their lives for their General in his next great failure, which began next day.

It is impossible to make light of so amazing an influence. It is the miracle of personality, not to be explained by any catalogue of qualities. The kind of spirit upon which it acted is almost as difficult to analyse as the power itself. What is there in the British nature which induced those men to retain a confidence and affection that only increased with each disaster? We cannot recall a similar instance in the history of other peoples, yet no one who was present in Natal thought it in the least peculiar. Certainly there was the British sympathy with the man who plays a losing game—the same feeling which greets a breakdown at a concert or in a speech with round after round of applause. Buller was also assisted by the mere sound of his name, unconsciously suggesting dogged tenacity and power to all who heard it. All great leaders of men should bear characteristic and uncommon names, and most have borne them. "The Red Bull" the Boers called him, and if they pictured him moving backwards and forwards on the Tugela like a rat trying to get into a barn, it was always as "a big rat."

His mere size counted for something, and it is doubtful if an insignificant-looking man could have so well maintained the confidence of a British force under misfortune. As "Linesman" said of him, he conveyed to the imagination something of the comfort to be derived from the sight of a big gun or a strong entrenchment. A six-inch "cow-gun"—how slowly it moves, how impassive it looks! But what impression, what moral effect, especially on its own side! In Buller his soldiers appeared to have found the very type and ideal of their nation—the kind of man that every Englishman would wish to be if fortune allowed—large, powerful, and solid of form, brave above suspicion, silent and indifferent to eloquence, undemonstrative and unemotional, cold as ice in danger, unyielding in disaster, but under that imperturbable exterior bearing a kindly heart; always careful of his army's comfort; a model landlord, and treating his soldiers as he treated tenants; "a farmer by profession," as he used to say of himself, but converted into a general by the Providence which is always on the side of the good old English gentleman. He was a true sportsman, too, and, writing like a Master of Foxhounds, in his despatch to the War Office after the disaster at Colenso, he added the significant sentence: "My men are dispirited because they have not seen a dead Boer."

Such was the ideal that his men formed of Buller—an ideal of the Englishman in the highest. Such was the secret of his influence, and by common consent his career would have been called a triumph of character, if he had triumphed. What, then is the meaning of the dispassionate verdict in the German Staff's Official History of the South African War? Writing of Colenso, they say the defeat was caused by the lack of sufficient force of character in the General in Command. They go on to say that after the threatened loss of Long's batteries:

> "Buller was no longer a leader but merely a fellow-combatant; no longer the General but only a battery-commander. The physically brave man had succumbed morally to the impressions of the battlefield. It was the General and not his gallant force that was defeated."

One of Napoleon's Maxims of War bears precisely on a kindred point:—

> "The first qualification in a general-in-chief," he writes, "is a cool head—a head which receives just impressions and estimates things and objects at their real value. He must not allow himself to be elated by good news or depressed by bad."

That was exactly where Buller failed. The temporary or even permanent loss of two batteries should not have involved retirement and disaster. His impressions were not just; he did not estimate things at their real value; he allowed himself to be depressed by bad news; he was no longer a General, but became a fellow-combatant. He failed for want of sufficient force of character; and the fatal muddle of Spion Kop, when he refused to take over the command from Sir Charles Warren, was due to just the same two causes—to lack of character and lack of coolness. The same deficiencies were revealed in that helio message to Sir George White suggesting that he should fire away his ammunition in Ladysmith and makes the best terms he could—a message which might have involved the whole Empire in irretrievable disaster. Finally, the same deficiencies were seen in that unhappy speech in Westminster, which led to his removal from the army.

Was, then, Buller's reputation a myth? Was he only an imposing mask, built like a typical Englishman, but devoid of just those qualities of coolness and character which we delight to regard as typically English? The record of his previous career, the testimony of the Boers that no other General in the war had so tough a task as that which he ultimately performed, the assurance and success of his subsequent movement through Northern Natal and the Transvaal to Spitz Kop, forbid us to think so. Now that he is dead, and has left a name, we would only notice that many Englishmen suffer from similar weaknesses, seeming to thwart just those very qualities which we like to claim. We are perhaps rightly called the best captains in the world; but why is it that our generals so often fail? At the moment of crisis they break down; they have not enough character to grasp the splendid resolve called for by supreme command. May it be due to the worship of tradition and "good form" in our public schools, the horror with which all English boys and English society regard anything unusual or extraordinary, their contempt for intellect and work, their repugnance towards ideas? We all feel it. Our word "egregious" only means "distinguished from a flock of sheep"; but we love the sheep, and hate the distinction, and so we talk of an egregious fool, but never of an egregious hero. Yet it is exactly the egregious hero whom we want as general in a moment of stress.

So it is with coolness. We are naturally an emotional, a rather impressionable race, but we are trained to die rather than show our feelings. Joy, sorrow, pain, affection must never be expressed; they fade in atrophy or remain secretly boiling like underground geysers. We suffer from suppressed emotionalism, and so it happens that in many natures like Buller's we are deceived. We trust ourselves to that solid and chilly surface. The crisis comes, and where is solidity, where is coolness? Disconcerting as an earthquake, incalculable as a spout of molten lava, is the change.

THE TONGUES OF PENTECOST.

The event which we celebrate at Whitsuntide has rather gained than lost in credibility from modern research. Historically, the Day of Pentecost, on which the rushing mighty wind foreshadowed the tongues of fire and the gift of utterance, is doubtless the foundation day of the Christian Church as an organised body. But, viewed as a time of miracle, it has fallen greatly into forgetfulness, and into that quiet winter of neglect which changes finally into the spring-time of absolute unbelief. The idea that we have to do in the gift of tongues with the miraculous imparting of a knowledge of unknown languages, will not bear comparison with the description of the phenomenon given by St. Paul, who says that a stranger coming into the meeting would think that the speaker with tongues was mad, just as on the day of Pentecost those who were not impressed thought that the preachers were drunk. The speaker with tongues uttered nothing edifying. He was said to be the vehicle of "grace" to himself alone, unless either he or somebody else could expound his meaning. Such utterance is distinguished sharply from intelligent speech; it is like a trumpet call sounded without a meaning. It is even discouraged by Paul, to the extent of saying that five words spoken with understanding are better than ten thousand words spoken in a tongue. It is, in fact, clearly a manifestation of the speech which is called automatic, because it is not done under the will of the speaker. Students of the subject, unless they are spiritualists, now generally describe it as coming from a "subliminal" source.

In any case the supposed gift of languages was a slender one, for all the long list of districts from which the strangers came only represents two languages—Greek and Aramaic. The Jews and proselytes who were then in Jerusalem from the Euphrates Valley, or from Egypt, or from Asia Minor, or from the Greek colonies in North Africa, or from the Mediterranean islands, all spoke one, or more probably both, of these languages; and from the hundred and twenty disciples, some—or all—of whom spoke with tongues, it is to be expected that both Greek and Aramaic would be heard. When the author of the Acts is describing the conversion of the family of Cornelius and the giving of the Holy Spirit to the twelve men at Ephesus, he only speaks of tongues, not of "new" tongues, or "unknown" tongues, and yet he likens these phenomena to those of the Day of Pentecost. There are also incidental narratives, such as the Apostles' ignorance of the speech of Lycaonia, which show that the early Apostles had no miraculous relief from the necessity of learning a foreign language, even though Paul himself was said to be a frequent speaker with tongues.

But we find a place for this strange involuntary ecstatic utterance in a well known family of phenomena, ranging from the delirious harangues and endless volubility of madness, to messages of authentic inspiration. In London in the early nineteenth century, the church of Edward Irving became, as is well known, the scene of congregational manifestations, which there is every reason to regard as sincere and spontaneous, reproducing, so far as we can tell at this distance of time the sensational, but meaningless, glossolaly of Corinth. One hears of similar phenomena occurring among humble revivalists since. Parallel to these utterances we may place the experiences of the literary friend of Professor William James, who prefers to go under the pseudonym of Albert le Baron. He was made to utter streams of vocables which make no words in any language, with interpretations claiming to be divine messages, but quite devoid of significance. These happened so recently as 1894, and were critically examined both by their subject and by Professor James. It would appear easier to account for them by the activity of the man's hidden mind, thus romancing, than to assume a quasi-divine origin for them. Then we have the large instalments of what purports to be the language of people on the planet Mars, given in trance through Mlle. Hélène Smith—a pseudonym of Professor Flournoy's medium, who is the head of a large drapery department at Geneva. But this Martian language is built like French, and so is a kind of adapted variety of the native language of the medium, much as Esperanto is built on the Latin languages, or as cunning children invent a little tongue of their own which nurse does not know. Here we have speaking with tongues and an interpreter present also; but, again, nothing very new or striking in the contents of the message.

Above these come phenomena containing excellent sense, the outpouring of a mind not certainly the ordinary mind of the speaker, and to be ascribed either to the underlying man below the threshold—the "subliminal" man—or to the influence of some outside entity. Such are the sermons that Rachel Baker delivered in her sleep; such are the prodigies of preaching children of three years old and upwards among the persecuted Camisards of the Cevennes. Trance addresses of varying quality are common features of modern spiritualist gatherings, and present more questions to the student than there are answers ready. This strange fact of "automatism" or "possession," if it has reality, should also be found in many ages and places, and not be confined to any one religion, and this is the case. The early "prophets" who prophesied in companies in the time of Samuel, and infected Saul with their excitement, might have told us something about it, as could their modern successors, the Dervishes. In the early honest days of the Greek oracles, the priestesses were mouthpieces only of dark sayings whose application left much to be explored; and Plato speaks in the Ion of soothsayers who need interpreters. In Christian times we have the Montanists, who are described as "the lyre on which God plays as with a plectron. The man sleeps and God wakes and imparts another soul." The same type of preaching occurred among the later Jansenists, and in the "preaching sickness" in Sweden in the 'forties.

In a higher class than these we must put the volumes of teaching—sometimes reasonable and beautiful, and, at least, never degrading—which have been given through such honest automatic writers as Mr. W. Stainton Moses, whose "Spirit Teachings" are fairly well known, or in less valuable books such as "The Perfect Way, or The Finding of Christ," by Dr. Anna Kingsford. Whether "Imperator," who purports to be the real author of "Spirit Teachings," exists or not is still matter for controversy: whether Mr. Edward Maitland and Dr. Anna Kingsford are right in considering themselves incarnations of St. John the Divine and the Virgin Mary, is, perhaps, more easily settled. At every point in such an inquiry we are stopped by out-and-out frauds like Madame Blavatsky's heaven-given volume "Isis Unveiled," and the other writings of the imaginary Koot Hoomi. Happily, however, this automatism or inspiration may produce also some of the most beautiful possessions of mankind. Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar," than which no more perfect lyric exists in our language, was written in a quarter of an hour; that is, it was given to him straight off, finished, and without effort of his own. "It came in a moment," he said. The much longer poem, "Come into the garden, Maud," was similarly the result of forty minutes' writing. Tennyson has himself described in "In Memoriam" and in "The Ancient Sage" how the trance would come upon him in which he seemed to leave his body and move in a larger sphere, with the sense of freedom and exultation. But Tennyson's case is worthy of longer treatment than can be given to it as a passing illustration.

On the whole, then, we may celebrate our Pentecost, not perhaps in memory of a miracle erroneously imagined, but as an earnest of a far greater hope, of a hope that the race of man is open on the spiritual side, not only to meaningless rhetoric, but to an ecstasy which is in heavenly places, a power of beautiful production of which Pentecostal power and modern poetic genius are foretastes.

THE UNNECESSARY BROCK.

Let it be brock, because that was its undoubted name to our Celtic stock, and because of the great uncertainty as to the origin of the name badger—some seeing in it the badged or striped one, others the corn stealer, and others no more than the animal that is caught in a bag. Moreover, the brocks we speak of lived in the Doomsday parish of Brockawardynge, which thus proclaims itself their very ancient home. There are many other parishes in Badge and Brock within a ten-mile radius, though some of them have ceased to give doubtful sanctuary to the persecuted animal.

For a year or two past the brocks had held their sett in the brake above the first field from the house. There seemed to be no reason why they should not. It was a pleasure to catch very occasional glimpses of their shy forms stealing about bear-like in the summer dusk, and we never saw signs of their occupation of which we had much reason to disapprove. An occasional rabbit stop opened from above and emptied of its young did not matter much, for rabbits were still more than plenty when there was mowing grass to be nibbled and abundant enough when ferreting time came round. And when the "bears" found a wasp nest, as they often did before it had come to our notice, we had nothing but approval for the scientific way in which they cleaned it out with the minimum of damage to the fair rotundity of the cave that had held it. We never knew that they had taken a partridge's nest, and perhaps, if we had, we should not have allowed the glamour of the word "game" to make a few pounds of bird's flesh outweigh a badger's right to live. Honoring, for peace' sake, the convention that bids us preserve the far more destructive fox, we did not see why the less fashionable brock should not also have asylum.

In the spring of 1907 our badgers in the brake produced cubs, an event that added to the interest of their occupation, and only slightly hinted at the time when there might be too many of the species on the farm. When last winter's bedding had been thrown out and spring cleaning accomplished by removal with it of the whole floor of the den, a new way was trampled through the young bluebells, and the beginning made of a new sett about two hundred yards away. But soon the work was stopped, and, as all the badgers returned to the old sett, we knew that there would be no young this year. It seems, indeed, to be a rule with the badgers to have young every second year, and, in spite of some authorities to the contrary, until a new family is expected the yearling cubs frequently inhabit the parental cave. Four or five brocks, the farmer decided, were no great matter. Let them stay. When another litter should come, he would reconsider the question.

The farmer has not reckoned with the claims of "sport." He has not made allowance for those who like to kill badgers, in the words of Mr. W. T. Dymond, "for no earthly reason but the unreasoning love of destruction, which classes us as a race on a level of the worst type of negro." To-day a party of sportsmen, mainly hailing from the town, have come out to celebrate beautiful weather by killing badgers—not ours, but the inhabitants of a big sett at the edge of the wood on the neighboring farm. It is an ideal badgers' home—a sett that may have been occupied with few breaks since the time of the Conqueror, or longer. Under the oolitic brash of the district is a bed of soft sand, in which, as one of the hunters says, with slight exaggeration, the badgers can move as easily as a fish through water. Only a good terrier can hold them while the men with spades dig down. But the best of terriers are here. The foxhound officials take more than a sporting interest in the extermination of badgers, for, though Meles and Vulpes generally agree pretty well, when they do fall out there are apt to be some fox cubs the fewer. The huntsman likes to kill off the cleanly, industrious brocks, and give their habitations to some vixen that, after her kind, has fouled her own earth. So he joins the digging-out party with his terriers, the disreputable, smooth-haired one whose face is all scars and the dandified, long-coated one that does not look half so good a dog as he is.

The main entrance to the sett enters the lower part of a mound on the hillside that looks like an ancient barrow. The hole dips and the mound rises so that in a few steps the terrier is far below the surface, baying the invisible inmate. We listen with the ear pressed to the ground, and then the spademen drive a shaft straight at the noise of the barking. We find the hole, but the badger has moved further in. There are galleries one below the other, the lower at a most uncomfortable distance. As soon as the brash is pierced, digging is as easy for us as for the badger, who, moreover, cannot dig for fear of leaving his rear exposed to the dog. But the depth beats us, and we have to give the matter up. As we depart, the mound presents the appearance of a giant fist thrust from the hillside, clenched palm downwards, and guarding the aborigines of the district within its grasp. We have gashed its knuckles, deeply torn the hand, but it still shields its guests.

And now the clearest claims of country courtesy ordain that the badgers in the brake must be delivered up. Here are all these poor sportsmen gathered to celebrate a fine day by killing something. Here is the official of the sacred foxhounds out after the enemies of the fox, his terriers with bloody faces to avenge, spademen with cider to earn. Where is the true country gentleman who, having badgers, will fail to let us have at them? The badgers in the brake are sure prey. They have foolishly dug in hard clay wherein the spade is greatly superior to the claw. The sand they love is not there, only a sort of ironstone sand that is little softer than stone. If the farmer gives the invitation—and let anyone who knows the country dare to say that he will refuse it—the fate of his brocks is sealed.

The rough-haired terrier, his dandified look long since gone, runs excitedly into the hole. He wakes a badger scarcely a yard within, and bays him almost under a hazel stool. The place to dig is soon found, but the shaft not so quickly sunk. It is tremendously hard work, with the May sun streaming down on the diggers' necks. We have all, more or less, to take a hand, and even the watchers are beset with a prickly heat. Through the thin screen of hazel stems can be seen, a few fields away, the smooth gleam of a lake to tantalise us with its offer of a cool swim. Yet the men like this hard digging best, for it makes them certain that the badgers cannot have gone far. In four or five hours we catch sight of the tail of the terrier signalling every move of the fight that is engaging him. The musky smell of his angry antagonist fills the spinney, and everyone knows that blood is about to reward our exertions. Soon the tongs close on the victim and drag him forth. He is proclaimed to be "a nice little brock of twenty pounds." Was, no doubt, a nice little brock when, in tune with his surroundings, he gambolled through such an evening as is now coming on. But there is nothing very nice about the tumbled, shaggy pelt hanging on a limp, dead body. It begins to strike one or two of us that a live brock may be, after all, better than a dead one.

But "sport" drives us on. There are obviously more brocks in the hole. The terrier, disdaining a dead enemy, has gone back to earth, and is furiously engaged in a new fight. The digging is renewed with fresh vigour. Soon another of the cubs comes to light—dead. The narrowness of the clay sett and its own defensive effluvia have slain it, for no dog could harm it at bay in its native atrium. One of the grown brocks, weighing half as much again as the cubs, has also escaped the indignity of being caught alive. The sow and two other cubs come to light fighting. The last one breaks out and makes a bid for life, running off backwards almost as fast as the dogs can go forwards. But they catch him and pin him. He turns in his skin with consummate ease, and cleanly nips a piece from the rough-haired one's shoulder, marring his dandy beauty for life. But the last of our brocks is slain, leaving, now that we think of it too late, a sad gap in the fauna of the farm. The master of the brake says little, but perhaps thinks hard. The hunters think he should be consoled for any injured sentiment by the honor of having provided the record of five grown badgers drawn from one hole.

Letters from Abroad.

THE PRUSSIAN "URWAHLEN."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—On Wednesday, June 3rd, the Urwahlen—the first elections—for the Prussian Diet will take place. This means to say that the voters of the three classes will on that day nominate their Wahlmaenner—electoral college—who thirteen days afterwards, on June 16th, will in separate divisions as a combined body elect the member or members allotted to these divisions. Since the nomination of the Wahlmaenner is generally done on party lines the first elections already will reveal the composition of the new Parliament.

It is not expected that the elections of Wednesday next will produce a notable change in the Parliamentary strength of the parties. As a matter of fact there is not much of a refreshing and genuine electoral fight at all. The three-class system, the indirect suffrage, and the open and registered voting takes the spirit away from the whole business. In a good many divisions most of the parties lead only a sham fight, and sometimes even this in a half-hearted manner. The seats are bartered away beforehand instead of being honestly competed for. This is particularly the case where a strong Socialist vote is expected. Where this happens the other parties who command the mass of the first and second class voters share the seats up between themselves in small committee. Freisinnige will go with Conservatives, Nationalliberale with Ultramontanes, just as the case may be. No wonder if, even amongst the workers, there is comparatively little of that fighting enthusiasm which prevails at the elections for the Reichstag. With the exception of a few divisions the defeat of the Socialists is a foregone conclusion, and it requires the whole sense of duty of the Socialist workers to take upon themselves under these circumstances the great amount of clerical and canvassing work which this artificially intricate system of voting involves.

Of the few divisions where a Socialist victory is not quite out of question Berlin has about four or five. The voters are divided into the three classes not by whole divisions but by comparatively small districts into which the electoral divisions are partitioned. And since the districts differ in regard to the wealth of their inhabitants a man may in some district be a first-class voter though paying a tax ten times or even several hundred times smaller than the tax paid by another man who, in his district, is only a third-class voter. In some of the Berlin districts millionaires are third-class voters, in others engineers, bricklayers, &c., are first-class voters. The most contradictory differentiations have come to pass. Even in one and the same district it often happens that a man who pays a certain tax is a voter of a higher class than another man who pays as much as he. He is privileged because his name begins with, say, a B, and that of the other with a C, or a D, and so on. Of logic and principles there is nothing in this electoral system. But just for that reason it may occasionally turn out favorably for the working classes. In the north and the east of Berlin, where whole districts are inhabited by almost nobody but workers, minor clerks and small shopkeepers, Socialist victories are not impossible. In the fifth, the ninth, the eleventh, and the twelfth division of the capital a very close fight between the Freisinnige and the Socialists is a certainty. And yet the result even there is everywhere doubtful. A few of the bigger taxpayers in some of the better streets or thoroughfares can cause a shifting of the electoral classes which may reduce a Socialist majority into a minority.

It would be too tiresome for your readers to have these and other infamies of the system explained in detail. Sometimes privileged voters turn it themselves to ridicule. It has repeatedly happened that the following scene was being played before the electoral officer. After the third and the second-class voters have nominated their electors the officer calls up the first-class voters. But there is only one specimen of that class—let us call him Lehmann—and the officer puts him the prescribed question.

The Officer: Whom do you nominate, Herr Lehmann?

Herr Lehmann: I nominate myself, Friedrich Gottlieb Lehmann.

The Officer: As there are no more voters the nomination is closed. Herr Lehmann, you are nominated. You have now to declare whether you accept the nomination or not.

Herr Lehmann: I am not in the position to accept it.

The Officer: Then we must proceed to a new nomination.

The same thing is gone through again, Herr Lehmann nominates again Herr Lehmann, declines again to accept, and the officer has to proceed a third time to the nomination game. This time, however, with a different result. Herr Lehmann, asked whether he accepts, replies with dignity:

"After my fellow-citizens having three times honored me with their confidence, I have overcome my previous scruples and do now accept."

At another poll two or three first-class voters play the joke of nominating one another, refusing their nominations and then each turning to nominate himself, or whatever may amuse them. The jokes are always greatly relished by the audience, but they do not make the system more palatable. It falsifies popular opinion to such an extent that nobody but the extreme Conservatives dare defend it in public. Yet it is still rather doubtful whether the new Diet will agree on a new and better system.

Two events only could have altered this state of things: an extra Parliamentary action of the masses much more vigorous and imposing than any previous demonstration, or an electoral co-operation of all the Liberal and democratic elements of the country. Both things are to-day quite out of the question. The Socialist workers do not feel themselves strong enough to measure forces in the streets with the most centralised military power of the world, and the Liberal parties have at this election broken their record in doing henchmen's service to the reactionaries and repelling not only the Socialists but even their own more democratic adherents.

The most notorious of these actions has come to pass in the monster division "Ober-und Niederbarnim," which embraces in a wide circle the suburbs north and east of Berlin with together more than half-a-million of inhabitants. At the last election for the Diet, in 1903, 14,300 voters have voted there for the Socialists, 8,100 for the Conservatives, and 2,200 for the Freisinnige and other Liberals; but owing to the three-class system the Conservatives got 719 electoral men, the Socialists only 327, and the Freisinnige 316. Consequently the Conservatives have got for themselves all the three members the division is entitled to. This time it is already a certainty that the Socialist vote will be much stronger than the last time, so that even amongst the electoral men Socialists and Freisinnige together could have a clear majority over the Conservatives. But not for one moment did the wirepullers of the Freisinnige entertain the idea of an understanding with the Socialists—an understanding, to wit, by which three seats might have been taken from the party of reaction in every respect—political, fiscal, and clerical reaction—and won for Liberal and Progressive reform. They took the first opportunity of compromising with the Conservatives and have come to an agreement with them on the basis of two seats for the Conservatives and one for the Freisinnige, whose candidate is himself a man of an extremely doubtful Liberalism.

It is an encouraging fact that in the ranks and file of the Freisinnige at last some serious opposition is being offered to this degrading transaction. Protestation meetings have been held at which sharp criticisms of the present policy of the leaders have been uttered and resolutions to this effect have been accepted. But the opposition is not yet strong enough to counteract the policy. Things go very slowly in the land of "Marshall Vorwärts."

Anyhow, the discontent is there and seems to spread. The radical secessionists, led by Herren Dr. Theodore Barth, Dr. R. Breitscheid, and H. von Gerlach, have held surprisingly successful meetings. They have constituted themselves into a "Democratic Union," and adherents join them in great numbers, although—or, perhaps, just because—they have declared it their policy not to try to supersede social democracy but to agitate and act beside it and, wherever possible, in a friendly understanding with it. Too young to take up an electoral fight in many places, this new group has only put candidates in one division, and it is the privilege of your correspondent, as one of the Socialist candidates there, to be a sort of rival of these democrats. But the brunt of the fight goes in another direction. The division is almost as large as the aforementioned one, it embraces several hundred suburbs and villages south and west of Berlin, amongst others the town of Koepenick, which has come to such fame through the ingenious stroke of poor "captain" Voigt, and the strength of the parties is almost the same. The Socialists head the list of voters, the Conservatives will head that of the electoral men. And since, besides these parties and the democrats, the Freisinnige, allied to the Nationalliberale, are also in the field and will, at the second ballot, vote rather for the Conservatives than even for the democrats, the seats of the division will go to the open reactionists. Socialists and democrats alike fight only in order to exercise and muster their respective forces. Trifling as this may appear to the English reader, it is at the time the only practical work to be done, if the reactionaries and the present wirepullers of the Freisinnige are not to have it all their own way. And as things are, a demonstrative value of the counting of the forces is not to be denied.

Apart from Berlin, social democratic candidates have some chance in a few of the Westphalian divisions. The Catholics there are very irritated against the parties of the Bülow bloc and would rather see a Socialist elected than a Liberal. Transactions between the two parties are in the air and may lead to electoral compacts. The Catholic party of Prussia is, in the western provinces, tinged with democratic tendencies and politically more reliable than the Freisinnige.

As to the new candidates in the field some interest may be claimed for Karl Liebknecht, the condemned "traitor." The son of the late Wilhelm Liebknecht has, because of his oratorial parts and his great gifts as a lawyer, been very popular already before the Government choose to prosecute him. But for some reason or other he was not so unanimously looked upon as a practical politician. Now the Berlin Socialists have put him as the first upon their list of candidates, and if seats are won by them at all, Karl Liebknecht, the "traitor," will be one of the first Social Democrats—he may even be the first Social Democrat to enter the triple walled fortress of the Prussian Squirearchy.

—Yours, &c.,

Open Questions.

THE PROBLEM OF RURAL HOUSING.

By Philip Morrell, M.P.

In the Housing and Town Planning Bill which is now before Parliament, and was introduced, Mr. Burns tells us, "mainly to meet the rural difficulties," the Government had the opportunity of making a real advance in their policy of rural reform. It has been the main defect of previous legislation, so far as the villages are concerned, that the problem of housing has been treated as if it were really analogous to the housing problem in the towns. As a fact, the conditions are almost entirely different. Whereas the worker in the town has at least some choice as to the house he will occupy, the inhabitant of the village must take what he finds. If he does not like it, his only remedy is to give up his work and go away. In the towns there are thousands of empty houses. In most villages there is hardly a spare cottage to be found. The worker in the village is, therefore, far more dependent than his brother in the town on a really efficient administration of the public health and housing law. And yet, in this respect also, he is apt to be worse off. In the average rural district, with its strong local influences, discouraging always to the active official, with its poor but widely scattered area, the administration is certainly not likely to be more vigorous than the corresponding administration in the towns.

The problem of rural housing, indeed, so far from being analogous to the problem of the towns, is really another aspect of the general problem of rural depopulation and decay, as to which so many inquiries and reports have been made. To treat the administration of the law relating to the cottage, as distinct from that of the law relating to the allotment and small holding, and the administration of the Public Health Acts, comprising such subjects as drainage and water supply, as distinct from both, is to disregard all the experience of rural life. It is one of the merits of the Report of the Select Committee on Housing of 1906, on which the present Bill is presumably based, that this aspect of rural housing as part of a wider problem is there fully recognised, and it might have been expected that the Government, who appointed that Committee, and who in the Small Holdings Act of last year have already shown themselves in agreement with the main ideas of their report, would have dealt with the problem of housing in the same comprehensive way.

Unfortunately, these hopes have not been realised. Mr. Burns's Bill contains many excellent provisions. The simplification of the procedure of acquiring land on the model of last year's Act, the improvement of the terms upon which loans may be obtained for the building of cottages, the strengthening of the Local Government Board as the central housing authority—all these, no doubt, are considerable reforms. But of any fresh scheme of housing administration, of any recognition of the alterations in the other branches of the rural problem, as affected by last year's Act, there is hardly a trace. The Bill, which in form is extremely complicated, proceeds mainly by way of "reference," and follows almost exactly the lines of existing legislation. As far as the rural problem is concerned, it does not touch the real difficulty.

For the failure of rural housing, as has been often pointed out, and nowhere more strongly than in the Report of the Select Committee, is due not so much to the want of powers as to the want of proper administration. The fault has been the fault not of measures but of men, or rather, of the system which appointed them. For the last eighteen years the rural district councils have had wide powers; but except here and there, in a few isolated cases, they have hardly attempted to put them into force. Not only have new cottages not been built, or any attempt made in the vast majority of cases to get building schemes sanctioned, but the ordinary duties of inspection and administration placed upon local authorities by Part II. of the Act of 1890 have been almost wholly neglected. The result is only too well known. Except in a few "close" villages—which, perhaps, have other disadvantages of their own—the rural population is deplorably ill-housed: cottages have gone from bad to worse; the sanitary condition, especially as regards water supply, is in many parts utterly indefensible; and in spite of the enormous decline of the rural population, people are still driven from the villages into the town for lack of decent houses to live in.

How far the rural councils are solely responsible for this state of things it is not now necessary to inquire. Other causes have, no doubt, contributed. But it is important to consider whether these councils, even with the additional powers which this Bill gives them, are likely to assist in any effective way in that rehabilitation of the rural districts to which the Government have set their hands.

That the rural district councils should have failed in the past is, indeed, no matter for surprise. With their narrow experience, with their poorly-paid officials, with their system of "part time" medical officers—expected to make the main portion of their living by private practice, so that private interest and public duty must almost inevitably collide—it was not to be expected that they would do very much, even in the way of inspection, which, indeed, almost presupposes a stronger and more centralised body. Still less were they likely to embark on difficult schemes of building which even the great urban authorities are generally reluctant to undertake. But under the new Bill all these difficulties still remain. The system of part-time officers, which is probably most of all responsible for the present state of affairs, is not altered. A proper system of inspection, through the formation of a register of cottage property—one of the most important recommendations made by the Select Committee—is not secured. The small district councils, from whom powers were taken by last year's Act in the matter of allotments, are still to remain the authority for housing both under Parts II. and III.; while the great county councils, who are now responsible for small holdings and allotments, are left practically outside the scheme of the Bill.

The Local Government Board, with their increased powers, may indeed do much, and it is only fair to assume that the new Housing Department, promised by Mr. Burns, though at present there is no provision for it in the Bill, will speedily alter the somewhat unfortunate traditions of that office. But even a Housing Department cannot act alone. It is, after all, the daily and regular administration of the law in the locality that in the long run chiefly counts; and it will indeed be a matter for regret if the Government, in a Bill which in its other parts has been well received, should commit themselves once more to a system of rural administration which hitherto has worked so badly.

It is possible, of course, that the Government will consent to such alterations in Committee as will make this Bill on its rural side a simple and effective measure. Failing this, it would be better that they should withdraw all the rural clauses, which constitute only about one-third of the whole, with a view to introducing next year a larger and more comprehensive Bill. A wrong step taken now will set back all those hopes of rural amelioration to which the advent of a Liberal Government gave rise, and which the passing of the Small Holdings Act of last year has already done something to justify.

The Drama.

THE STAGE AND MODERN LIFE.

It is clear that a great change is coming over the British drama—a change of spirit and of form. That this change is as yet unappreciated by the amusement-loving crowd is of no consequence. What is of importance is that the men and women who study life, or have serious ideas about it, will no longer tolerate the kind of theatre which for many years has dominated the capital, and through it the provinces. When such a movement starts it is bound to succeed. Dramatic authors, even the authors of our time, seduced and pressed into the service of the commercial drama, begin to acknowledge it. And then the managers have to follow suit. The material depression of their business is in itself enough to convince them that something is wrong. They have tried to meet this depression by declining more and more to the music-hall entertainment, not on its strong side, where it really reflects the life of our times, but in its common appeal to feeble minds, unable to see anything in sequence, to go behind the show, and try to discover what it all means. But the drama, with its mighty traditions, its immortal purpose, can never become a mere beauty exhibition, or an idle embellishment of the vanities of fashionable existence. It cannot, with all the pressure from vulgarity or Philistinism, served as they are by weak men, with talent and without character, get rid of the incessant craving of society to see itself in the looking-glass that the sincere dramatist holds up to it. Sooner or later the conventions will yield here, as they have yielded in almost every centre of civilised activity but our own. The drama will find its true vocation, and able servants will press forward to do its work.

Moreover, this great business of looking within is one which the dramatist, if he is the right kind of thinker, is well able to perform, better, perhaps, than the organised churches. For the churches, which are always concerning themselves about organisation, are almost too well organised already. The Anglican Church has organised itself in the main on lines of artistic refinement and respectability; the Free Churches on lines of social and political activity; the deep search for reality seems to have been somewhat lost sight of. That, indeed, is open to perpetual question by the active, restless spirit that sees it in all its phases, reputable and disreputable, and yet is inspired by the Christian motive of pity, expressed in the way of indignation, irony, scorn, the sense of justice, as, for example, Voltaire expressed it. If such a man has the dramatic gift, it is clear that a wide field is open to him. He can express "the very age and body of the time, his form and pressure," with a suggestion of reality, a power of holding the conscience and awakening the imagination, to which the pulpit, limited in subject and in form, and unable to exhibit the speech, and acts, and thoughts of men as the stage exhibits them, cannot attain. Is not the Oberammergau play, for example, more powerful as a means of realising the Christian drama than most pulpit expositions of it?

It is clear that modern playwrights are beginning to wake up to the tremendous power that resides in the dramatic medium. First they are showing it, after the fashion of the modern masters of imaginative literature, in an extreme simplicity of style. If you are to impress your audience with the idea that the figures on your stage represent men and women, engaged in the actual business of living, you must make them use the forms of speech, or something like them, in which they clothe their thoughts and desires. Literary traditions must go where they conflict with this movement towards truth. I was struck with this effort to attain vraisemblance in the play "Links," by the Dutch dramatist, Herman Heijermans, represented by the Stage Society at the beautiful Scala Theatre. "Links" violates many of the accustomed dramatic forms and usages. Thus its author introduces more than one personage who seems to have very little relation to the development of the play. They pop in and out—a casual caller, an old friend—and no more is heard of them. This is, of course, a feature of life. Everything really matters, but thousands of streamlets of influence are lost, or seem to be lost, as the character is being formed, and only in looking back, when life is at the flood, do we see their importance. Then, again, no one talks in epigrams. The characters often seem to speak diffusely, or trivially. But as the best or the only art is that which conceals art, so the writer of "Links" shows all sorts of tragic issues involved in details that, in their simplicity, give a true impression of the stuff of which existence is made.

But if the setting of "Links" is purposely contrived so as to exhibit modern industrial and family life on its common, domestic, workaday side, it is also made to illustrate some deep-lying facts in it. The plot is not remarkable. It is the story of a man, rich, elderly, failing a little, but still vigorous and able enough, who desires a second marriage with a woman well fitted by character to give him what his first union failed to secure—mainly because life was then absorbed in a dreadful, embittered, seemingly hopeless, struggle for bread, in which the exhausted wife went down. The man looks for happiness—a companion at last after many years of solitude, a quiet end to the long-troubled voyage. He has built up a great business; clearly all the power and genius that have gone into it are his. But he has a brief illness. And when he recovers, all the influences that forbid this pleasant ending rise up against him. The business is modernised. From the personal director and superintendent of everything he has become a mere president of a company. The new generation knock imperiously at the door. And this generation is of coarser fibre and of narrower soul than he. Old ties are nothing. All is business with them—narrow, mechanical, soulless "efficiency." The competent son uses him, the incompetents sponge on him. They have, indeed, no longer any human interest in him. The idea of a second marriage unites the family in an opposition, purely mercenary, based on fraud, and divested of every touch of compunction. This ferocious family instinct is perhaps a little exaggerated, though it is largely the vital point to the drama. It is hard to imagine that a man, rough, and even a little cruel, but sincere and just, should rear a brood unredeemed by a single virtue or grace. But these exaggerations do enable you to realise the essential hardness of modern industrial life as it passes on from father to son; how material interest controls it, and how a more primitive type, more human, because closer to the elementary facts of existence, may excel the new generation in depth and fineness of perception and feeling. Many touches illustrate this satire, which is apparent in the brutal quarrels of the family schemers, united only against their father, but fiercely impatient and contemptuous of each other, and also in the more murderous subtlety of the "specialist" doctor, who makes himself the agent of the family plot to have their father declared a madman, and who mixes science and blackmailing in adroit proportions. This character was very ably played; its appearance was a notable feature of the play.

This conflict of sordid emotions is not without poetry. Pancras Duif, the old manufacturer, very finely played by Mr. Fisher White, is a tragic figure in the complete isolation that befalls him, and leaves him whelmed in even deeper gulfs than the miseries and struggles of his early years. These are revealed in a speech full of power and truthfulness. But for the average playgoer the revelation of "Links" is the complete abandonment of the old romantic drapery. Here is life, stark and grim. Here are its problems, the forces that actually move or restrain, even though they be crudely and hardly posed. It is easy to see how far this giant of the modern drama will go now that he is beginning to move his mighty limbs, and to realise what a world-shaking power resides in them.

THE CRISIS IN THE PUBLISHING TRADE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The spring publishing season is over, and there is hardly a publisher who is not dissatisfied. The very long winter might have been held to make for reading; but no one seems to have had any money. Now that money is more easily come by, the unhappy publisher and bookseller are faced by glorious sunshine. No one who can get on to a meadow or the open road cares to be bothered with a book. And, apart from general trade conditions, there is serious dissatisfaction in publishers' offices over certain aspects of their business. In the current "Fortnightly," Mr. Eveleigh Nash, one of the ablest and most successful of the younger generation, complains of the terms that certain authors are, through the competition of the different publishing houses, able to secure. He brings, too, charges of a grave kind against authors' agents—"certain individuals who are not in the least scrupulous." Mr. Nash is a competent man of business, and, in his next sentences, advocates a remedy, which, if things are really as bad as he maintains, should clearly have been adopted long since.

Mr. Nash writes, avowedly and naturally, from the publisher's standpoint; and, as might be expected, overlooks some considerations that authors may fairly urge. The six-shilling novel is the storm centre of the trade. Unquestionably, it has not brought so much grist to the publisher's mill as was anticipated at the time the old three-decker was abolished. But to the great majority of writers of fiction it has been a boon. The publisher is, broadly speaking, seen at his least useful when he publishes fiction. He originates nothing; the method of production is fixed, and, in the case of the established writer, his task is the easiest imaginable. The popular author is the Consols of the publishing market; and no one expects to get from Consols what he looks to receive from Kaffirs. The publisher bets on a certain sale; he knows exactly what that sale will bring in to him, and, within the four corners of his gross returns, he has to get cost of production, author's royalties, advertising, and the book's share of office charges. True, he has to find money in advance of sales for the author; but the greater proportion of his sales is made to the circulating libraries, who pay promptly; and thus he does not stand out of his money for long. It is the finding of the money for the advance, and the care that the sum advanced should not be too large, that are the difficulty. Not, one would imagine, an insuperable difficulty for an experienced man of affairs. Otherwise, the work is the easiest that falls to a publisher's share. It is consequently eagerly sought for, and no conceivable combination amongst the publishing houses will make this particularly easy branch of publishing as lucrative as others which demand greater care, skill, and judgment from the publisher. For, given an arrangement—which would have to be in essence a self-denying ordinance—among the half-dozen or so houses who are in the running for the big seller, there is nothing to prevent other firms from invading this side of publishing, or newer men from starting with the express object of competing for a class of business grown more lucrative than commercial conditions warrant.

At least one shrewd judge maintains that the six-shilling novel is too cheap. It is practically never bought outright; in most cases, it is not worth buying. It is borrowed, and is, in fact, only one of many competing forms of amusement. In the three hours or so after dinner and before bed-time, a man may read a full dress story—and for twopence. His theatre, his golf, his little dinner in town—all his other ways of passing his leisure—are costlier than they used to be; why should not his novel cost him threepence a reading, instead of twopence? The first issue of the novel should be in handsome, readable octavo form and be issued at about half-a-guinea. That would give more for division between author and publisher, and, when an author has found enough persons who are ready to buy and keep his books, they can well be re-issued in a smaller form, at, say, a shilling. But it may be taken as fixed that the average novel will not be bought; the few people who have the necessary money will buy, and, as they do now, throw away; the great majority have not the money or the space on their bookshelves.

But publishing is not entirely concerned with novels, and, while novels may be too cheap, the majority of other books are too dear. Here should be excepted books which, like novels, are simply amusement books—the light historical biographies that are, for the moment, so popular. Many of them are only worth one hurried reading; there is no intellectual difference between them and novels. Publishers have made money out of them; just because they have asked, and obtained, more money for them than for works of fiction. It is the better book, of more enduring value, that should be issued at a cheaper price. Take a case at random—Olivier's "White Capital and Colored Labor," which appeared, under the auspices of the Labor Party, at a shilling. Had that been published through the regular channels—and probably at seven-and-six, or thereabouts—at least one reader would have been unable to purchase and keep it. And another—Kropotkin's "Fields, Factories, and Workshops"—went through a limited edition at about twelve shillings. After re-issue, first at a shilling and afterwards at sixpence, its sales have reached thousands. There is a public demand for the interesting, thoughtful books at a popular price; too often the publisher buries it under a handsome half-guinea tombstone. An agent remarked recently to the writer that he had offered a small book, appealing to a large section of the public, to several members of the Publishers' Association. The best offer was an advance of twenty pounds on a small royalty. Finally, it was issued by one of the big newspaper firms, which disposed of about a hundred thousand copies—and earned for itself some hundreds of pounds profit.

One of Mr. Nash's suggestions is worth considering, though it deals with a point rather of internal economy than of general public interest. The Publishers' Association is inert, and, until it decides to employ an able permanent official, it will continue to be useless. Such sharp practices on the part of authors or their agents as Mr. Nash rightly reprehends, could best be combated if publishers had a central bureau of information in the charge of a competent highly paid secretary; and an official, deriving his salary proportionately from all the members of the association, should in a number of ways justify his existence. He would find ample scope for his energies in reorganising the retail side of the book trade. This is lamentably inefficient, and, it is inefficient just because it is too poorly remunerated. The present economic tendency is to eliminate the retail tradesman; goods are prepared in bulk, advertised under mark, and the demand created by the manufacturer requires, for its filling, but little intelligence on the part of the shopman. So far, and leaving out the shopman's intelligence, trade generally has only followed the precedent of the publishing industry. But the difference lies just with the shopman. The ordinarily comely young woman can, and does, sell cigarettes quite efficiently; when a man buys books, he wants something more than ordinary intelligence, and can dispense with comeliness. A halfpenny a packet is probably a sufficient remuneration for the vendor of cigarettes; the man who likes to browse round a bookseller's shop and looks to receive advice as to the book he buys must recognise the fact that the bookseller, who has sufficient capital to run the shop and at least a fair acquaintance with the books new and old, should receive a profit of a third of his turnover. He receives now about half that. Not all booksellers are ill-equipped; anyone who has dealt with men like Quaritch, Sotheran, Maggs, or Edwards, must have been struck by their knowledge of their work. These men will not sell new books; they prefer the second-hand book, which is not sold under mark, and on which a living profit is to be earned.

Mr. Nash and his fellows may well find for themselves a way past the nets that the agent spreads for their feet. They may be—it would seem they think they are—underpaid for the very useful work they do. The remedy lies in their own hands. The entertainment book, which no one will buy, is too cheap; the solider book, for which there is an unsatisfied demand, is too dear. And they have been guilty of short-sightedness in permitting the retail branch of their business to become as disorganised as at present it unquestionably is.—Yours, &c.,

Letters to the Editor.

THE JUSTICE OF THE LICENSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Country Brewer" says that I assume that "the re-assessment of licensed property on a new principle is contained in the Bill"; and, later, says that I give "the assessment consequent on the passing of the Bill" at £100. I made no such assumption, nor did I give an assessment that was consequent upon the passing of the Bill. What I said was that, assuming the accuracy of the figures given by "Country Brewer," the figure at which the "Black Horse" should be assessed at the present time is £100. "Country Brewer" now seeks to evade that conclusion by saying that I have mistaken the figures he gave, and that the 10s. a barrel profit which he had in mind is not merely the profit which the brewer obtains in his capacity of tied-house owner, but includes also the profit obtained by the brewer in his capacity of manufacturer of beer. He says that "the value of the tie would more fairly be taken at 4s. or 5s. a barrel on the trade of houses like the 'Black Horse'." He abstains from giving the actual figures, and the figures now suggested seem to me to be put forward after consideration of the fact that the figures as previously stated might attract the attention of the local assessment committee.

If, however, the suggested figure of 4s. or 5s. a barrel profit to the brewer in his capacity of tied-house owner be accepted, then not only does the case of the "Black Horse" cease to be a typical case, but the selling value of the licence before the introduction of the present Bill was certainly not £1,200. In a typical case, the figures would be something like the following: Price of a barrel of beer to tied-house tenant, 35s., less 5 per cent., = 33s. 3d.; price of a barrel of the same beer to tenant of a free house, 35s., less 33 per cent., = 23s. 6d.; profit to brewer in his capacity as tied-house owner, 9s. 9d. (being the difference between 23s. 6d. and 33s. 3d.). Beyond this profit, the brewer, of course, makes a manufacturing profit, as he does not supply beer to a free-house for philanthropic purposes.

But let us assume for a moment that "Country Brewer" is correct that (taking the middle figure between 4s. and 5s.), 4s. 6d. profit on a barrel is attributable to the licensed house, and 5s. 6d. (the remainder of the 10s. profit) is attributable as manufacturing profits to the brewery. What becomes of his contention that he will be worse off under the present Bill than he is under the Act of 1904? The amount of compensation under the Act of 1904 is "the difference between the value of the licensed premises and the value which those premises would bear if they were not licensed premises." Now, if a profit of only 4s. 6d. a barrel is to be attributed to the licensed premises, then, on the trade of 200 barrels a year, the total value attributable to the licensed premises is only £45, and the compensation under the Act of 1904 ought to be practically nothing at all, whereas under the present Bill the compensation would be £80 in the first year, together with additional compensation to the licence-holder (the tenant).

"Country Brewer" is, in fact, on the horns of a dilemma. Either the profits are attributable to the licensed premises or they are not. If they are, then they ought to be regarded in the assessment of the premises. If they are not, then they ought to be disregarded in arriving at the amount of compensation under the Act of 1904.

More than this, when a licence ceases the brewery manufacturing profits are not entirely lost. Some two-thirds, probably, of the trade of the house continues in some other direction. Therefore, in respect of two-thirds of the manufacturing profits there is no loss. As to the manufacturing profit on the remaining third of the trade (which is lost), a claim to be compensated for this is simply a claim to be compensated for any legislation which tends to reduce the amount of drink consumed in this country. Such a claim is really a claim by brewers to a vested interest in drunkenness.

As to the two-thirds of the trade which still remains, "Country Brewer" might possibly reply that he is not really asking for compensation, but is merely asking to be paid, under a mutual insurance scheme to which he contributes, for the trade which might be lost to him by going to some other brewer. But such a claim cannot be made with any show of reason or justice under the Act of 1904, because so far as manufacturing profits are concerned the contributors to a mutual insurance scheme should be brewers and no one except brewers. Whereas the contributors to the compensation fund are not brewers in their capacity of brewers at all, but are all persons interested in licensed premises, many being merely landowners. Why should a landowner contribute to a scheme of mutual insurance against loss of manufacturing profits at breweries? A landowner has no such profits to lose.

It is not, however, to be thought that because I have dealt with the case of the Black Horse on the assumption of a tied house profit of 4s. or 5s. a barrel, that I accept these figures as likely to be accurate.

Finally, let me say that if the probable effect of the present Bill will be, as "Country Brewer" argues, to make it more profitable to let licensed houses as free houses than as tied houses, "Country Brewer" is welcome, so far as I am concerned, to make the fact widely known throughout the country.—Yours, &c.,

DOES THE SUGAR CONVENTION BETRAY FREE TRADE?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Villiers states with force the arguments against the Sugar Convention. He does not deal with the terms on which the Government has renewed it. The arguments in favor of such renewal I take to be two:—

(1) Our refusal to renew would not have modified the policy of the other contracting Powers; Germany could equally have put pressure on Russia.

(2) By the new clause we provide a simple machinery for the admission of our refined sugar goods into the territories of the other contracting Powers if those goods are not made from bounty-fed raw material.

Thus we lose nothing, and, by the new clause, we secure that no measures be taken by the signatories of the Convention to exclude one class of our refined sugar goods. Until this position is refuted, Free Trade cannot be held to have been betrayed.—Yours, &c.,

THE BASIS OF EDUCATIONAL PEACE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I agree with so much of your article of May 23rd that it may seem ungracious to cavil at one or two statements. But as it is important to remove misunderstanding if there is to be any settlement I venture to draw attention to a portion of your remarks. You say "The mass of English parents concern themselves very little about the niceties of dogmatic teaching. These are mysteries which the average man leaves to his spiritual guides when he has any." If large numbers of parents are content to trust their spiritual guides and accept the religious instruction for which the Church has been responsible, why should there be this determination to restrict Church teaching so that it can only be obtained under certain conditions, and then not from the regular teachers. The average man, as you suggest, is not at all dissatisfied. The outcry really proceeds from other spiritual guides who will welcome undenominationalism, or anything else, so long as Church teaching is removed or fenced round with difficulties. But with regard to the recognition of undenominationalism as the standard form of instruction you add, "It is the new Anglican theology . . . . that has largely caused the set against 'simple Bible teaching.'" You forget that new theology has stiffened the opponents of undenominationalism more than anything else. It is one of the errors of Liberal reckoning that it ascribes too much of the opposition to the high Anglicans. On the contrary, the high Anglican party is stronger in the South than in the North. In the North Ritualism is not very pronounced, but the resistance to any imposition of undenominationalism will be found both resolute and unyielding. In the "Manchester Guardian" "Quarters" (whose genuine and faithful Liberalism is unquestioned) warns the Government of the resentment that will be inflamed by any proposals of this nature.

If the suggested compromise is to be based on the principles of the Government Bill, and it must be remembered that it takes the buildings, curbs the teacher's liberty out of school hours, establishes an undenominational basis of religious instruction, then there is, I fear, little hope of settlement by consent.—Yours, &c.,

CHESHIRE INCUMBENT.

May 26th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Would not the most practical step towards a settlement of the Education controversy be for the Government, after the autumn recess, so to remodel the present Bill as to make it practically Mr. Birrell's Bill in the form in which it only just failed to pass the House of Lords? That Bill was sent up from the Commons backed by very large majorities, and presumably it would be sent up again with the same backing. It is an open secret that the Archbishop deeply regretted its failure to become law in 1906; and presumably it would now receive his firm support. So that its passage would be practically secure, if only by next autumn Mr. Balfour has been persuaded that the next General Election, if it is to give the Unionists a permanent majority, must not be fought on a confused issue.

May I say a word on another point? The cry of "no tests for teachers" needs safeguarding. What is meant, of course, is that no teacher, when he applies for an appointment, is to be questioned as to whether he belongs to any particular religious denomination or to none. But the opponents of this most necessary freedom sometimes take it, or profess to take it, to mean, that there is to be no enquiry into their fitness to give the simple religious teaching which the Government policy in either Bill has in view. This position is not tenable. Some test of competence there must be; and perhaps the simplest way to secure it would be, after assuming the competence of the present teachers who have been accustomed to give that teaching, to grant to new teachers a certificate during the college training, after an examination in the conduct of which a Board appointed by the Universities should be the ultimate authority.

And the mention of college training reminds me of the Dean of Lincoln's earnest appeal to the Government to revert to Mr. Birrell's proposals in this matter also, and so to preserve the religious tone that has hitherto prevailed in the colleges. I trust the Government will give heed to this appeal, and so do much to conciliate those many Churchmen who have every claim to be fairly treated.—Yours, &c.,

THE POLE TRAP.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Evidence received from different parts of the kingdom shows that, in spite of the Act of 1904, the Pole Trap continues to be used in many districts. Consequently, a personal appeal, signed by the President, Chairman, and Hon. Secretary of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, has been addressed to over two thousand landowners and tenants of shootings, asking for their assistance in suppressing the use of this illegal and brutal instrument, and for the issue of explicit orders on the subject to keepers. With this letter, a copy of which I beg to enclose, was sent a copy of the Act.

We venture to ask the aid of your readers, both those who own or rent shootings and those who may have knowledge of the existence of Pole Traps, in the effort that the Society has determined to undertake—to be supported where necessary by legal action—for the total suppression of this peculiarly useless form of cruelty, the chief victims of which are owls, kestrels, and other useful birds.—Yours, &c.,

EXPERIMENTS ON ANIMALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Dr. Greville Macdonald, in his second letter, has raised many questions which lie outside the work of the Research Defence Society. I will not take up room with a long letter. I will only call the attention of your readers to three of Dr. Macdonald's statements:—

1. He says that the "Anti-vivisectionists" adopt dishonest tactics.

2. He bids them "be true to fact, and not distort statistics."

3. He speaks with contempt of the "methods of Mr. Stephen Coleridge, who would have us believe that an increasing mortality from diphtheria proves the uselessness of its antitoxin, though he should know that the death rate per 100 cases attacked has decreased enormously wherever it is used."

These three statements give, in half a dozen lines, a sufficient reason why the public ought to support the Research Defence Society. For thirty years, the whole country has been flooded with leaflets and pamphlets by the Anti-vivisection Societies. I think that very few of your readers have any idea of the falseness and brutality of many of these leaflets. Or we may take one instance only, the use which is made of the confusion between general mortality and case mortality. I am told that, a few Sundays ago, they were distributing leaflets outside the Queen's Hall, which asserted that diphtheria antitoxin is useless. I have read also, that one of the doctors of the "National Anti-vivisection Hospital," at a recent mass-meeting in Battersea, told an ignorant audience that the antitoxin was "animal filth." I have before me a huge volume of press cuttings, with accounts of all Anti-vivisectionist lectures, meetings, &c. Nearly all of them contain some approval of this gross and mischievous nonsense. It is impossible to estimate the harm which it has already done. Nothing could be more opportune, for the advancement of the Research Defence Society, than this open declaration, by Mr. Macdonald, that the Anti-vivisectionist Societies are dishonest and untruthful.

It will be a great pleasure to me to supply to any of your readers, who will take the trouble to make application, a supply of sound literature, giving the facts about experiments on animals in this country under the restrictions of the Act.—Yours, &c.,

STEPHEN PAGET,
Hon. Sec. Research Defence Society.

DR. VERRALLS'S EURIPIDEAN THEORY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am sincerely grieved to find that I have in any way misrepresented my friend and teacher Dr. Verrall, and must thank him (and Mr. Norwood deserves similar thanks) for the courteous and kindly tone of his correction. But in one respect I think he has misunderstood my rather ill-phrased sentence.

My words, "Euripides was a sceptic; therefore he cannot seriously have introduced gods and miracles into his plays," &c., were never meant to describe the process of reasoning by which Dr. Verrall reached his theory, but only to describe that theory itself, or the relevant part of it. My object was to make my criticism of Mr. Norwood's book intelligible; and for that I had to make, in passing, a rough statement of the point of view from which Mr. Norwood started, and which he had taken from Dr. Verrall. I do not suggest that my statement was very good; I see that I used the word "therefore" in reference first to a causa essendi and then to a causa cognoscendi, which was, perhaps, confusing. But, if I may paraphrase my own sentence, what I meant was something like this: "The author of these plays must, from the evidence, both analytical and inductive, given in the foregoing essays, be conceived of as a sceptic; therefore we possess a key to the difficulties involved in those scenes where he represents gods and miracles; such scenes either bear a hidden meaning of a sceptical character, or else are not integral parts of the plays at all, but mere extraneous additions intended to give the plays an appearance of orthodoxy."

I do not suppose that Dr. Verrall would accept this statement either. He would prefer to put the matter in his own way. I was conscious of this difficulty in my review, and warned the reader that I was probably not stating Mr. Norwood's case quite as he would wish. I did not think of Dr. Verrall at the time, since my reference to him was only made in passing; but if I had, I should certainly have uttered a caution against supposing that I could in one compressed sentence give an adequate idea of the argument, or, for that matter, even of the results, contained in two volumes of most subtle and masterly exposition.—Yours, &c.,

THE FOUNDATION OF CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I don't suppose you will publish a reply to your note of reply to my letter. But to yourself I may say that, so far as your point is true that Christianity, "as it exists to-day, founds itself on" a book instead of on a living Person, it is so poor a thing—so far degenerated from the faith which, as a historic fact, has influenced the world—that it certainly is not worthy of exclusive establishment and endowment in our schools. And that is the point which suggested your article.

There are some of us, who, in the name of Liberalism, will fight to the death against the erecting of undenominationalism to the rank of the exclusive State religion in our schools. Justice demands that those who like it—and they are many, of course—shall have it for their children. But justice equally demands something different for others who believe it saps religious vitality.—Yours, &c.,

THE "CRUX" IN "THE TEMPEST."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I venture a belated answer to the letter signed "Violet Churchill"? Your correspondent urges that "it is always worth while to make the best of the text as it stands"; but the text of the First Folio, whenever we can control it by good Quartos, is seen to be so erratic that we are compelled to suspect it in cases where (as here) it stands alone, and your correspondent seems to recognise this herself, at least so far as punctuation is concerned. Apart from that, the Folio text is not capable of the meaning she would give it, for the singular pronoun "it" cannot refer to the plural "labors." Moreover, the line—

"Most lazy, least when I do it. Alas, now, pray you" is, in my judgment, metrically improbable. I do not think it can be paralleled. But nothing is commoner than the straightforward hephthemimeral ending to a speech. (See I, ii, 13, 21, 33, 44, 59, 63, 116, 118, 168, [193], 208, 237, 244, 296, 298, 310, 365, 374, 417, 419, 430, 466, 468, 481, 485, 493, 501; twenty-seven cases in one scene of this play.) For these reasons, besides those already given,

"Most busiest when I do it" seems to me the more probable reading. On the other hand, the simplest way of obtaining the sense which your correspondent prefers is to read—

"Most busy, when least I do."

But this involves quite as much manipulation of the Folio text as my reading, and is, as already shown, open to other objections.—Yours, &c.,

E. W. LUMMIS (Pfarrer).

THE RUSSIAN AND SERVIAN CASES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The people of Servia shoot down their unarmed King and Queen under circumstances of peculiar atrocity, and England gives expression to her feelings by withdrawing from official diplomatic relations.

The Czar of Russia shoots down his unarmed people under circumstances of far greater atrocity, and England gives expression to her feelings by emphasising and renewing official diplomatic relations.

For a Sovereign to slay his people is one thing, but for a people to slay their Sovereign is a very different matter.—Yours, &c.,

TO RESTORE CONFIDENCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Drink, dearer food, and a little slack trade owing to the Boer war have contributed to depression at the polls. The condition of the Protectionist Party has improved in consequence of clever evasions concerning the effect of taxes on imports. But the Prime Minister might remember what were the forces which carried the late leader to power. Cannot we have the swollen, unearned increments, specially land monopoly rents, taxed for the relief of rates, without troubling the House of Lords? The proposal to tax drink licences might be carried into effect instead of talking about it. Why, in short, should not those forces which gave the great majority be placated instead of drifting through disgust into apathy? The Nonconformists see little chance of fair play in education through a conference. If all is to be decided by compromise the Liberal Party have a black future. The Tory Party will do anything to gain a working majority without regard to tariff difficulties. They would get one now, but if the appeal is to come in two years there must be less compromise, and a bold policy on the lines laid down by your valuable paper.—Yours, &c.,

EDWIN HILL.

THE LANDLESS MEN IN THE WEST.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your interesting article on the report of the Dudley Commission on Congestion, you mention that the most difficult problem of all is the divergence of interest between the landless men and the men with insufficient land. May I point out that the whole of the agitation for obtaining possession of the untenanted land, has been conducted by the landless men, laborers and farmers' sons, and they are confident that they are to be given it? The most influential Nationalist paper in Roscommon, the "Roscommon Herald," stated last week that it was ridiculous to think of giving land to the "congested" tenants, that they did not want it, and that the people who have long been looking at the land ought to get it. (This is a paraphrase, as I have not the paper with me.)

If, therefore, the Government attempt to carry out the recommendations of the Commission, they will find themselves face to face with a menacing agitation, created with the intention of preventing the congests from migrating, and intimidating the Executive into giving the land to the local landless men.

It is hoped that the Government will think seriously before giving further facilities for the repeal of the Crimes Act, as they are likely soon to require its powers.—Yours, &c.,

SIMPLE BIBLE TEACHING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If a teacher gives a Bible lesson on the subject of the expulsion of evil spirits out of men into swine, what explanation are the children to receive of this matter? Everyone knows that at our asylums we do not adopt the methods of the past in dealing with these disorders. And yet the writer has knowledge that young children are taught in a crude fashion, at the public expense, all the miraculous elements without any scientific explanation. Our teachers have been educated, and they have access freely to criticism such as the Encyclopædia Biblica. What are they expected to say on the story of the Garden of Eden, the serpent, and the miraculous element which runs through the Bible from beginning to end?

The Anglican, the Romanist, and even some orthodox Nonconformists build up a form of words called a creed. But the position of simple Bible teachers is one of the most complicated questions of this age of criticism and science. To force a settlement on the lines of undenominational Bible teaching for the majority of schools at the public expense will, perhaps, force the question of Biblical inspiration to the front in a way we have had no experience of as yet. Is there to be a distinction drawn in this matter between the rich boys' school and the poor boys' school in the method of Bible teaching? Is it too much to hope that the struggle may lead to a rational method of Bible teaching, if we are to have it in the mass of the schools?—Yours, &c.,

THE PROBLEM OF INDIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The review of Mr. J. D. Rees' book on India, which appears in to-day's Nation under the title of "The Anti-Indian Englishmen," will, I hope, give food for serious reflection to all those who have followed the recent developments of Indian politics with a sincere desire to understand their meaning. I do not know how great, or how small, a section of Anglo-Indian official thought Mr. Rees may rightly claim to represent. But, so far as three years' residence in India has enabled me to observe, I think I recognise in his utterances an expression—extreme and violent, may be, but none the less faithful—of the attitude of mind characteristic of the ordinary Anglo-Indian. Where Mr. Rees differs from the ordinary Anglo-Indian is in the candour and logic of his reasoning.

Now these are qualities entitled to respect, and the respect due to them is in this case enhanced by their rarity. I have often heard Anglo-Indians denouncing the Indian's demand for a share in the government of his own country. I have also often heard Anglo-Indians acknowledging that the demand in question is the normal result of the Western culture we have introduced into India. But I have never yet met an Anglo-Indian intelligent enough and courageous enough to draw from these premisses the natural conclusion which Mr. Rees, as reported by your reviewer, bravely draws—namely, that, if we wish to see the agitation suppressed, we must suppress English education, Western literature, freedom of speech, and the newspapers. Yet, given the premisses, what other conclusion is possible? Mr. Rees has the merit of seeing where his premisses lead and the courage to follow them.

Equally logical and equally courageous, however, is the advocate of Liberalism whom one, now and again, meets in India. He also recognises that the demand for self-government is the outcome of Western civilisation as represented in English education, freedom of speech, and newspapers. But, so far from denouncing that demand as mischievous, and recommending the suppression of the culture of which it is the offspring, he recommends that the Indians, in proportion to the degree to which they have absorbed Western ideas, should be granted Western institutions. And in so arguing, the Liberal Anglo-Indian is at one with the moderate Indian of Mr. Gokhale's type. How far Mr. Rees has misrepresented the views of Mr. Gokhale is shown by his suggestion that it would do Mr. Gokhale good to come under Russian methods. Personally, I have had on several occasions the advantage of discussing Mr. Gokhale's attitude with Mr. Gokhale himself, and I have found that attitude summed up in the one sentence "Give us a share in the administration, proportionate to our education." In other words, Mr. Gokhale asks for nothing more—he is perfectly justified in asking for nothing less—than the fulfilment of the promise so often and so solemnly made to India during the last sixty or seventy years by the most prominent of English Liberal statesmen. The Indians have been told again and again that England's mission is to instruct them in self-government. After two generations of such instruction, a large class of Indians has come forward to demand the prize for which they believe themselves to be qualified. It seems to me that whoever looks the facts in the face must, if he is logical and honest, come to one of two solutions of the difficulty. The first is Mr. Rees' solution—suppression of English instruction; that is, a deliberate destruction of the tree we have planted and spent some seventy years in tending. The second is the Liberal statesman's solution—admission of the Indians to the administration. There is no middle course possible.

The mischief, in my humble opinion, has hitherto been that few men interested in the problem have had the courage or the intelligence to recognise its factors. During my residence in India I was impressed again and again by the inconsistency displayed in the Europeans' attitude towards the native who has received a European education. While training him on Occidental ideas the Government and the European public of India have persisted in treating him as an Oriental unacquainted with the institutions of Europe, and untouched by the Western spirit. To this inconsistency I have no hesitation in tracing the present state of affairs. I will go farther and predict that, so long as this inconsistency continues, the state of affairs is bound to grow worse. The time has come for England to look the facts in the face, to realise the nature of the problem, and to choose between the two solutions already named. Let us hope, for the sake of England, of India, and of civilisation, that the majority of Englishmen, having seriously weighed the merits of "Russian methods," will anathematise them and seek a solution, not in the suppression of the English methods, but in a development of those methods. This does not mean, of course, a complete emancipation of India from English control. It only means—for many a long year to come—a gradual admission of the Indian to a share in that control. And this, unless I am the victim of a strange misapprehension, is precisely what Mr. Gokhale means—Mr. Gokhale and that moderate, sensible, and influential section of the Indian public of which he is the spokesman.—Yours, &c.,

WHAT DOES "VOTES FOR WOMEN" MEAN?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—You have inserted various letters from women Suffragists in The Nation. I therefore venture to hope that you may be willing to give publicity to the views of one, representative, I believe, of a large class, who does not desire the franchise. It would now appear that the only direct and practical way of achieving votes for women is by way of universal adult suffrage. Have the present electorate ever considered the matter from this aspect? Do they realise that it means that the Government of this ancient country, full of the complexities of past traditions and customs, and the ever-growing development of modern problems of infinite intricacy, is to be handed over to the guidance of a new body of voters, an immense majority of whom, being women, are absolutely inexperienced in these matters? I understand that the majority of women over men in the British Isles now approaches something like a million. Given adult suffrage, therefore, the votes of women must out-number those of men to an enormous extent. In the future, therefore, Great Britain will be governed by women; that is, by a large body of individuals who have no experience at all of the sterner side of life, nor of that side which is represented by physical force. Women who know nothing of finance, nor of the sources of the great trade of the country, will decide the momentous issue between Free Trade and Protection. Women who have never even served on a jury will make and reform our criminal legislation. Women of whom only a very small minority are now beginning to interest themselves in the higher issues of education and social reform, will settle the place of religion in the schools, the housing of our poor, the planning of our towns, and the regulation of our licensing laws. Women who have never been, nor are likely to be, soldiers, sailors, or policemen, will decide the vast questions of peace and war, the movements of armies and fleets, and the preservation of order in our midst. Have men realised any of these consequences which the much belauded universal adult suffrage must bring us? I can hardly think so.

As an ardent and lifelong Liberal, who will always gladly give my humble services to my party without hope of fee or reward, I would beg our leaders to pause and consider ere they commit themselves to the support of a measure whose consequences are so momentous and full of danger.—Yours, &c.,

HUMAN OR DIVINE?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Allow me to thank Dr. Greville Macdonald for his just and temperate reply to the sophistries of Mr. Stephen Paget. I would only take exception to one point—the use of the term "humanity" at the end of the third paragraph.

Is it not the divinity within us rather than the humanity that makes us higher than the animals?

Humane, humanity, humanitarian, are terms with which the cunning enemy of love misleads us. Sir Ray Lankester, in a recent book, tells us that the human man is the rebel of Nature—not the friend. It is the human mind that breaks laws and then tries to elude the consequences by victimising others. Does such action entitle "humanity" to a pedestal?

It is the divine within us that protests against the cunning and cowardice and interference of the human mind.

But this cunning human mind has persuaded us that it it "bad form" to mention the divine; and even the members of a humanitarian league would shirk the term divine! But it remains, and cannot be gainsaid, that every cunning cruelty, every device of the torture-chamber, every insane meddling with the sane laws of Nature, is the outcome of the human mind—against which the divine mind protests vainly.

"Under which mind?" is a question much more to the point than "Under which flag?" And to serve under the divine mind involves no resigned groans or psalm-singing; it involves only keeping step with your regiment; pulling all-together; in one word, co-operation: of which the human mind is absolutely incapable.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

THE PAUPER.

It dawned a morn to make a heart despair,
East was the wind and chill the April air.
No beast was out save one poor starveling hound,
Who for his supper nosed the muddy ground.

Beside the river, where its sluggish length
Did darkly coil and twist in wat'ry strength
Beneath the Minster Bridge, then smoothly ran
In unobstructed course, there slept a man.

Forlorn and ragged, destitute and old,
Where gentle sleep had hushed him in her hold;
From his desire for the Thames' chill breast,
She drew him down and lulled him into rest.

The starveling hound in misery extreme,
Crept up to share the shadow of his dream,
And gave the cheek, low resting on a stone,
The only kiss that cheek had ever known.

Nor did sweet sleep forget for one brief span
To bless the hound as she had blessed the man,
For on each face there dwelt supreme content;
Perchance, to some Elysian fields they went.

The starveling hound did lie with twitching feet,
And tail slow wagging on the muddy street;
The outcast man flung forth a circling arm,
To hold the brute, or some sweet dream, from harm.

Some dream! Ah! See it here above his heart,
This tattered paper worn with tears apart,
"When will you come?" the faint inscription said.
"Our little child—she cries in vain for bread."

And so they lay, forgot by all save sleep,
Beside the river passing dumb and deep;
There by the bridge beneath the Minster towers
That held the mighty city's numbered hours.

Through fair Elysian fields they joyous ran,
The starveling hound beside the outcast man;
But came the Law, with rough, unkindly hand,
To thrust them forth from their dream fairyland.

It bid the man go forth in the chill night,
But kept the dog in pity for its plight.
Moved on once more, he went his weary round,
And in his soul desired to be the hound.

In endless tramp he did the day endure,
And came at eve before the workhouse door,
And there, in doubt and hesitation, stayed,
Like one who from his doom creeps back afraid.

From each broad window looked an aged face,
With longing eyes that held in dim embrace
The busy street from which they were apart,
Old men who looked and longed with aching heart.

Builders of cities these, well might they look,
As doth a writer who hath writ his book
And looks with love upon the printed page!
But these poor workers never shared the wage.

Those shaking hands, now raised their brow to shade,
A thousand lives oft leant to them for aid;
They set the city's pulse to throb and flow,
The ships upon the waters forth to go.

The wheels to turn, the churches' bells to sound,
They drew ripe corn from the reluctant ground.
Poor crippled hands, now raised their eyes to shade,
Those weary eyes that watched the man afraid,

Who stood reluctant by the workhouse gate,
Poor eyes, poor hands, they seem to him to wait—
For what save death: and then the pauper's grave?
More swift, more kind, the flow of Thames' dark wave.

Once more he stood by grey Westminster towers,
And heard the chime toll forth man's passing hours,
And here again he courted death, and went
With joyous speed to that chill element.

His weary head, ah! never did it rest
Upon so soft or so belov'd a breast;
From it he drew a measure, long and deep,
The welcome draught to bring him rest and sleep.

He almost had forgot age, grief, and cold,
The numbing hunger that did him enfold,
When came the Law, with rough, unkindly hand,
And bore the wretched body back to land.

And chid him sore for daring to aspire
To end a life that no one did desire,
So let him go; it thought him well content
To be indulged with short imprisonment.

Left him reluctant by the workhouse gate,
It opens, clangs. He is within to wait,
For what, save death: and then the pauper's grave?
More swift, more kind, the flow of Thames' dark wave.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

MANY points of interest on the relations between authors, publishers, and the public are raised by Mr. Eveleigh Nash, in a letter headed "The Coming Crisis in the Publishing Trade," in the current number of the "Fortnightly Review." The past season has been a poor one for all but a very few publishing houses; and there is truth in Mr. Nash's statement that "the once-prosperous business of publishing has passed through stages of pressure which, if unrelieved, will eventually drive men who have made it their calling into other and more profitable fields of enterprise." Mr. Nash attributes the causes for this state of affairs to "the struggle between literary agents to obtain and retain good clients, the increasing demands of wholesale booksellers and circulating librarians for better terms, and, most important of all, the lack of a properly organised Publishers' Association, which should deal with all matters threatening the prosperity of the trade it represents." Everybody who knows anything about the book trade is ready to acknowledge that publishers lose considerable sums through the system of advancing money on account of royalties. A book is published on a royalty, the author receives a lump sum in excess of the royalties which the book earns, and the publisher is saddled with the loss. If this, to any great extent, is due to false statements made by agents regarding the circulation of former books by the authors for whom they are negotiating, the remedy suggested by Mr. Nash is a simple one, and should be applied without delay. It is only necessary for the Publishers' Association to establish an intelligence department or committee which would, under certain conditions, give members information about the sales of authors' works.

THIS, however, is but a minor point, and when Mr. Nash seems to deplore the general activities of literary agents we cannot help feeling that he does not make out his case. There are, of course, dishonest agents just as there are dishonest clergymen and dishonest publishers; but when the agent, by his expert knowledge, enables an author to get his book published by the most suitable firm, secures for him the full market value for his work, and sees that his interests are safeguarded by insisting on a proper agreement, he does a service to a literature which is quite as valuable as that of the publisher who issues the book. Publishers are, by their calling, business men, authors are not. Some exercise an undue secrecy in their dealings with authors, and it is only fair that the writer of a book should have the benefit of expert advice in making a bargain with a publisher.

MR. NASH is, we think, on much firmer ground when he speaks of the evil caused by "the present glut of pedestrian work." Whether it be due to the activity of agents or to the rivalry of publishers there is scarcely a doubt that the present over-production of inferior work is the main cause of the depression in the book trade. There never was a time when more worthless books were placed upon the market or when works of real value ran a greater risk of being swamped by the deluge of rubbish that pours from the press. No book, whatever its merits, can be a commercial success unless it is brought prominently into public notice. Save in the case of writers of established reputation this is difficult under the present system. Publishers, by competing with each other to issue the greatest possible number of new books, place it out of their power to do justice to the majority of them in their advertising lists. The work of real value appears for a week or two in these lists side by side with a crowd of ephemeral companions, it then passes out of notice, and is often never heard of again. It may be replied that it is the business of the critic to detect what is of value and bring it into public notice. This is true, but critics, like everyone else concerned, are unable to deal with the present amazing output. William Allingham relates in his Diary that Leigh Hunt once spoke of Moxon as "not a publisher but a secreter of books." This phrase might be applied to some publishers of to-day. We have good reason for our belief that the literary firms that have done best during the present season have achieved success through limiting their output to works of some real value and letting the public know what they were doing.

A PROMISING study of "British Imperialism in the Eighteenth Century," by Mr. Gerald Berkeley Hertz, is announced by Messrs. Constable. Mr. Hertz examines the forces that made for expansion during this period, and adopts the view that British foreign and colonial policy was mainly dictated by motives of commerce and trade. He, however, holds that one of the great characteristics of our colonial expansion at the time was a determination to give the fullest possible measure of freedom and self-government to all foreign settlers or foreign settlements that came under English rule. The eighteenth century was, he says, the seed-time of the Pax Britannica. It will be useful to have a study of the period when, although the word Imperialism was hardly ever used, the foundations of the British Empire were laid.

AT present novels form a great majority of the books issued or almost ready for publication, and several announcements of interest have been made. Mr. John Galsworthy has taken Austria as the scene of "Villa Ruben," a new book which he has just completed. Mr. John Masefield's first novel, "Captain Margaret," is to be published by Mr. Grant Richards. It is a romance founded on the love-story of a French soldier, who made a successful stand against the Spanish power in Darien. Mr. E. V. Lucas, to whose versatility there seems no bounds, has written a novel, which is to be issued under the title, "Over Bemerton's." Readers who enjoyed "Marotz" will be pleased to hear that the writer of that powerful psychological study is at work on a longer work, to be called "Dromina," which may be expected towards the autumn. They will scarcely be surprised to learn that the author is a Roman Catholic clergyman, who holds a high position in his Church.

AN important volume on "Scottish Painting, Past and Present, 1620-1908" will be issued in the autumn by Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack. The author is Mr. James L. Caw who, as Director of the National Galleries of Scotland, has had unusual facilities for studying this subject, on which he has been engaged for about twelve years. In his book on "The Scottish School of Painting," published a few years back, Mr. McKay dealt with the same subject from the critical and historical standpoint in a most able manner, but with this exception no comprehensive study of the development of Scottish art has appeared, and even Mr. McKay was prevented by space considerations from dealing with the pre-Raeburn painters or the modern school as exhaustively as many of them deserve. The coming work, which is divided into two parts, aims at being thoroughly comprehensive both as regards the earlier and the most recent developments, and is to be illustrated by seventy full-page plates from pictures, by the more interesting artists, in private and public collections.

ANGLICAN LIBERALISM.*

This little book is one more sign that the ascendency of Tractarianism is being felt as a sore burden within the Church of England. We say "Tractarianism" advisedly, for although it is the case that the leaders of the Oxford Movement would have repudiated with horror even the slender measure of intellectual liberty indulged in by some of their latest disciples, yet the parentage of the ruling faction is properly Tractarian, and reflects with accuracy that sectarian exclusiveness, alien to the earlier High Churchmen, who were Nationalists to a man, which marked the followers of Newman, Pusey, and Keble. It is to be regretted that the authors have attempted to give completeness to their account of "Anglican Liberalism" by stretching the term unwarrantably. There is nothing properly common to "Liberalism" in the theological and ecclesiastical senses, and in the political and economic. What justice or what advantage is there in suggesting the contrary? In point of fact, there are probably more political "Liberals" among theological Conservatives than among "liberal" Anglicans, and the congruity of socialistic opinions with sacerdotal convictions is notorious. "Nonconformity" is, in the main, politically liberal and theologically obscurantist. In spite of their interest, the two articles on "Political Liberalism" and "Social Liberalism" had best been omitted: they strike a note, new and irrelevant, which takes off from the general effect of the essays. The three concluding essays, which deal with "Liberalism" among the Nonconformists, the German Evangelicals, and the Roman Catholics, are very interesting, but plainly have but an indirect bearing on the main subject, and do not properly belong to its discussion. With these observations we have done with objections, and can profess a cordial approbation of the book.

The tone of the writers is certainly neither militant nor optimistic. They realise keenly the difficulties of the situation which they describe, the specific embarrassments of their own position, the isolation which has befallen them within the Communion which yet they would defend and represent. "The Christian Church to-day," writes Professor Burkitt sadly, "is in the position that Crosby Hall occupied a few years ago, and if it is to be preserved it must convince men that it provides what they cannot do without" (p. 24). His formula of Anglican policy is borrowed from the Tractarians, and it is more plausible than inspiring. The "via media," rightly understood, is the true note of "Liberal Anglicanism." "It represents not so much a compromise between ideals as an effort to render justice to them and to the facts on which they are based" (p. 33). There is much reason in this, but hardly any promise of enthusiasm. The "via media," indeed, is not a favorite phrase with the modern Sacerdotalist, who holds the name "Anglican" in hardly less contempt than the older name "Protestant." It is a thorough-going, exclusive "Catholicism" which he aspires to recover, and that is as little "Anglican" as "Protestant." Will the formula have a better fortune in its new application? Dr. Hastings Rashdall, with characteristic courage, attacks the practical problem. His essay on "Clerical Liberalism" is undoubtedly the core of the volume, and deserves the closest attention from all who care for the future of the Church of England. Starting from the postulate "that there has been no period in the history of the Church of England up to the days of the Oxford Movement at which there have not been thousands of the clergy who could only justify their position in its ranks by taking in a very loose and liberal sense some part or side of the authorised formulæ," he demonstrates that the later history of the Church has increased the difficulties of subscription, until at the present time no section of the clergy can escape from the necessity of reading into the official formularies senses which are not properly there. The method of interpretation advocated in Tract 90 with the view of "reconciling with the letter of the Thirty-nine Articles precisely those doctrines of the Roman Church against which it is admitted that they were, in the minds of their framers, intended to guard," has become the common property of all Anglican parties alike. Since, then, all clergymen stand on the same level of embarrassed sincerity, it lies with none to arrogate to himself the character of "honesty," and to question that of any other. Dr. Rashdall argues with justice that the relative importance of beliefs cannot be fairly urged against this position, for who but the individual can determine for himself the degree of importance to be attached to the mass of doctrines to which by the law of the Church he is required to give his assent?

> "There is no intelligible principle of interpretation according to which the belief in the everlasting punishment of heretics, in the descent into hell, in the future coming of Christ, in the Resurrection of the body, can be mitigated or spiritualised, which will not equally permit us to take the word "Virgin" to mean a young woman, or to understand by "He rose again from the dead" a vision of the risen and immortal Christ. . . . It is open, of course, to anyone to contend that the toleration of the one set of opinions is, in his private opinion, desirable in the best interests of the Church, while that of the other set is undesirable. What is not open to any man of common intellectual consistency or common moral honesty is to accuse the one kind of non-literal interpretation of dishonesty while he claims for himself, or concedes to his friends, the other instances of non-literal interpretation" (p. 98, 99).

Dr. Rashdall, however, sees as clearly as anyone that "the practical question is not now one of honesty, but of spiritual expediency," that there are "many opinions which would make it extremely undesirable for a man to become a clergyman of the Church of England in the interests of that Church itself, of his own religious life, and of the community generally" (p. 101). He says wisely and truly that "no man can profitably minister in a church in which there is not a large body of common belief, feeling, and aspiration between himself, and the religious community—at least some considerable part of the community—whose devotion he leads, whom he instructs from the pulpit, whose moral and religious life he endeavours to stimulate and to guide" (p. 103). To the inevitable question, Who shall determine in any given case whether or not this measure of agreement exists? Dr. Rashdall replies that "the responsibility must rest with the individual who applies for orders, and with the individual Bishop who ordains." It may fairly be objected to this that it shifts responsibility for the clergyman's orthodoxy from the Church to the Bishop, and introduces into the system a perilous element of uncertainty. Ought a Bishop to be free to substitute for the legal standards of faith some other demand which better satisfies his own notion of right clerical belief? Can he rightly go behind the individual's profession of assent, and insist on supplementing it with a series of doctrinal interrogations drafted by himself? Will it not follow that the terms of subscription will vary from diocese to diocese, and the highest function of the spiritual society be surrendered to the unchecked individualism of the Bishops? At least it must be admitted that if so vast a power is to be vested in the individual Bishop, the importance attaching to episcopal appointments is immensely enhanced.

It is here that the extreme peril of the Church of England really lies. Many causes combine to exalt episcopal authority. The decay of legal discipline has almost compelled recourse to the only available substitute for the obsolete law, viz., the spiritual authority regarded as inherent in the successor of the Apostles as such. The old causes from which historically have sprung the power of hierarchies and the claims of priesthoods are present and as potent as ever. Even latitudinarian Bishops incline to "magnify their office"; and every politician would be heartily pleased if he could simplify politics by submerging the Church in the Episcopal bench. Behind all lies the fascinating dream of medievalism, suggested at every turn by the archaic phrases and vestures of ancient office. There is a solidarity of professional interest which subtly leads the clergy to support the spiritual autocracy of Bishops. Denominational self-expression in the Church of England can hardly avoid an episcopalian form. The extension of Anglicanism is pictorially represented by the waxing number of Bishops, and it is hard not to carry back old senses into the old forms of "Catholic" order. Thus it has come to be the case that the future of "Anglican Liberalism" mainly turns on the type of men who are raised to Episcopal office. Dr. Rashdall, like Professor Burkitt, writes in a strain of depression. He complains that no help comes from the Bench, even when help might fairly be expected, that the supply of able candidates for orders is failing, that the training of such candidates as exist is to a great extent illiberal, that the Bishops encourage rather than restrain the narrow professionalism of the theological colleges, that the laity are rapidly going away from the Church. He does not doubt the ultimate and speedy triumph of "Liberalism," but whether that triumph will be compatible with any form of Christianity.

> "The eventual triumph of Liberalism—on its destructive side—in the world at large is certain: the triumph of Liberal Christianity, or even Liberal Religion, is, alas! not so well assured. Liberalism will triumph, whether the clergy become Liberal or not. That any form of religion can exercise a wide influence without a clergy to teach it, history supplies us with no reason for supposing. Liberal religion cannot prevail without a Liberal clergy. 'Like priest, like people'" (p. 133).

We have left ourselves no space to do more than refer to the excellent account of "Lay Liberalism" by Professor Percy Gardner, who may himself, perhaps, rather be reckoned with Liberal theologians, since, like Professor Burkitt, though not in orders, he is a notable religious teacher. The Master of the Temple's charming record of "Past Liberalism" is one of the best things in a book, which from cover to cover is pleasant and stimulating. Dr. Rashdall's Essay, however, stands by itself, and might with advantage be published separately, and sent to every member of the Lambeth Conference.

THE GORGEOUS ISLANDS.*

In the delightful "Gossip on Romance," Stevenson notes how the words "post-chaise," the "great North Road," "ostler," and "nag," sounded ever in his ears like poetry. Certain words immemorially linked with the region of the Spanish Main smite the ear as fondly. Such words, among many others, are: "Columbus," "buccaneer," "pieces of eight," and "El Dorado"—that splendid fiction of the sixteenth century.

In these romantic fields of ocean Sir Frederick Treves finds the beginnings of the "long sea story of England." For ourselves we would seek those beginnings rather in the cockle-boats of our own Cinque Ports, but we may readily concede that the West Indies—

> "became the nursery of the British Navy, the school where the thews were hardened and the sea lessons learned."

The history of our doings in this hemisphere is a chequered one, and has its unseemly pages. It is not, as the Spanish is, a history of sheer rapacity and the ruthless extermination of native peoples; but it is swollen with deeds of freebooting and piracy, of greedy and avaricious adventure, of high-handed seizure such as modern conventions would scarcely dare to wink at. In Jamaica it is blackened with all that is recorded against slavery. This history, nevertheless, when everything is told on the side where we can place little to our credit, enshrines for us memories of seamanship which we cannot choose but be glad of. If it is in the grey Cinque Ports that the British Navy starts into rude and feeble being, it is under tropic skies that it begins to achieve greatness.

After the "drums and tramplings" of four centuries some glory of romance has continued to envelop these islands of the Spanish Main, and to them attaches the dreadful fascination of the zones that live on sufferance. An earthquake shivers Kingston in ten seconds (which seemed of such infinite duration that the people thought their walls would never cease toppling); and in a space as brief, on a gay morning of May, "St. Pierre, the debonair, the adored city of Martinique," is inhumed, only less completely than Pompeii, beneath a fiery cloud of lava dust. De Quincey preserves Savannah-la-Mar in one of the matchless periods of the "Suspiria":—

> "God smote Savannah-la-Mar, and in one night, by earthquake, removed her, with all her towers standing and population sleeping, from the steadfast foundations of the shore to the coral floors of ocean."

Again, we have the contrast of luxuriant, fecund, and variegated nature, with the most tragical and loathsome of all the sicknesses of man. Sir Frederick shows us among the inmates of the lepers' pleasaunce in Barbados a young girl who has just been received there:—

> "Among the newcomers I saw a girl of seventeen. She had all the freshness of perfect health, but certain loathly spots had appeared on her skin, and then had come—the inquisition, the wrenching from home, the banishment to the house in the garden. She had, a week or so ago, such a life before her as is dreamed of by a girl of seventeen. . . . She will change to a thing as repulsive and gargoyle-like as that horror in the corner of the ward whose sightless eyes can happily no longer see the vileness of her own deformity. The fresh young face will become the Medusa's head . . . and she is but seventeen."

Care and investigation notwithstanding, the West Indian islands "still suffer very seriously from leprosy." In the white creole the disease is rare; it is practically limited to the colored sections of the creole population.

But the glory of the islands is still there. In these days, of course, it owes nothing to fables of a gold-gated and golden-paved Manoa, the apocalyptic capital of El Dorado, in which poor Raleigh so fatuously believed; nor to legends of the Land of Ophir whence King Solomon fetched his gold, the land that Columbus dreamed of. All the gold and silver and precious stones that ever were delved out of the fateful West did but help Spain to her financial ruin. The glory and romance of the West Indies in these days rest in sun and sky and sea, in crystal streams and deep primeval woods, in perpetual flower and foliage, in humming-birds and fireflies and strange fruits, in the witcheries of women of divers colors, ceaselessly yearning to be the mothers of white sons.

On his homeward journey, Sir Frederick Treves touched at Colon and travelled by the Trans-Isthmian Railway to Panama. The "puny strip of land which separates the two great oceans of the world" was a part of the Gold Road that Pizarro made and that Francis Drake haunted; a fever-stricken way where "the dead lie thicker than the trees." Gold-hunters, pirates, canal-makers, death has taken toll of all in this narrow passage:—

> "Enriquez de Guzman, who came into these parts in 1534, asserts that out of every hundred men who went to Peru for gold, eighty returned no more. In like manner, during the gold craze in California, the number who met with death on the Isthmus, within sight of the sea that was to carry them and their nuggets home, would have filled many a happy town. Last of all, during the construction of the canal by the French Company, men died yearly not in hundreds but in thousands."

The details of the great engineering work have often been set forth, but Sir Frederick Treves praises another enterprise "which is not less marvellous, but which attracts no attention." This task is the transformation of a land of pestilence into a clean and healthy settlement It well deserves mention:—

> "This enterprise, undertaken by the American sanitary authorities, has been accomplished by Colonel Gorgas (a surgeon in the United States Army) and his staff. Colonel Gorgas is responsible for the sanitation of the Canal Zone. He has under him no less than ninety-one medical men, and a personnel of over 3,000 subordinates. To his undying credit he has made this most unpromising strip of land a model of applied hygiene, and has shown, on a scale never before paralleled, what preventive medicine, under an enlightened and liberal direction, is capable of doing."

That is surely the best thing that has been written about Panama.

THE SHORT STORY OF CONVENTION.*

In his preface to "Raw Edges" Mr. Landon remarks, "If there is any good in these tales at all it is that they have been written from a point of view from which other men have looked." But we are inclined to believe that the "man of the world" attitude which is deliberately emphasised in the tales is the shoddy element in his artistic fabric. Artistic insight may, of course, be a gift distinguishing a clubman or a laborer, but there is, perhaps, no creed or code of life more antithetic to the artist than the "man of the world's." At the point where knowingness stops dead artistic insight begins, though the two may supplement one another, as in the genius of a Balzac or a Thackeray. But often the one checkmates the other, as in Mr. Landon's story "Overtried,' where we have the most unnecessary "window-dressing" of a touching and simple situation. The Rev. Richard Carteret, the Rector of Leigh Monachorum, has a "secret that paralysed his life"; he has had an intrigue in India with a friend's wife, Mrs. Charteris, who has become insane on account of it, and he is suddenly asked by her unsuspecting husband, now settled in the neighbourhood, to go and see her in a Norwich private asylum. A quiet analysis of this psychological situation, however, is not good enough for our author, and he must needs spoil its reality by smothering it with comme-il-faut accessories in which we do not believe. We not only have the ideal country house, where "the guests, scientists, pioneers, diplomats, refugees, come from the ends of the earth," where "dinner that evening was a meal as it is not understood by many," but we have De Bernard, the "well-known French Monseigneur," in the smoking-room, with his face looking "like an ivory carving," embarking on confidences to the repentant Carteret in a style of fashionable melodrama befitting a West End theatre:—

> "'One of your own Englishmen has used a strange phrase of haunting force. "I speak to you a dying man to dying men," to dying men a dying man. Like him, I speak to you a dying man. My name is on the list of those who will at the next Consistory be raised to the Cardinalate. Thereafter there lies a forked path. One way leads me on to all that many'—he paused—'all that most men deem best worth having. The other means that it will not be long before my work is over. Yet I have no choice. Others of us have failed. The "handful of silver" works with us, too, and men who are valiant enough in black are often cowards in scarlet. But your case is harder than mine. The Church kills me: you it bids live on. My friend, I pray you, live on yet. Whatever your sorrow——'
> "Carteret caught his breath twice.
> "'And I pray that though I speak to you a dying man, the other part of Baxter's great line may rest unfulfilled.'
> "Almost wearily the great ecclesiastic drew himself out of the chair, and raised himself to his full height beside the fireplace.
> "Then, as one in helpless despair, Carteret dropped from his seat, and knelt with his face in his hands, as Monseigneur's fingers were raised over him, and the hackneyed words of benediction passing slowly from his lips took on a new meaning for both." . . .
> "Sir James, however he came to know these things, was right enough in his unspoken prophecy, for within six months Cardinal de Bernard, whom the 'Times' described as the most liberal-minded of the College, and one whose elevation but three months before had been universally recognised as reflecting credit on both the Consistory and himself, died while on a visit to one of the small monasteries that shrink among the crannies of the Italian Alps. The Jesuits, with great alacrity, published the certificate of the doctors who had been called in from a neighbouring brotherhood, so the world now knows that His Eminence died of septic tonsilitis amid the inconsolable grief of all the faithful, but especially of the General of that powerful Order."

This seems childish stuff to come from the pen of a "man of the world," but the point is that even if it were true to life it is out of place, and so bad art. Commonplace surroundings and simple human feelings are good enough for a great artist, but a worldly, leisured audience must have a rich mise-en-scène, "the crucifix that hung from the heavy gold Venetian chain," "the carved amethyst on the prelate's hand," the little anecdote of a "certain distinguished princess," &c., before it condescends to be moved. Accordingly, by the time Carteret gets to the lunatic asylum and sees Mrs. Charteris, we have got so impatient of the spiritual falsities designed to impress us that any spiritual truth vouchsafed us seems out of place. The interview between the priest and the woman is clever, but it came too late to save the story. In "A Deathbed Comedy," Mr. Landon sins in a more provoking way. The situation here, one between a dying child, Miriam, her beloved friend, Dick, who has made her promise that she will pretend to be "nice to mother," and the hard woman, Mrs. Gilchrist, who has overheard their conversation, and, bitterly repentant, sees through "the lie and piece of acting designed to hoodwink her," is a strong one, and, treated less sentimentally, would hold the audience. But the author, who has probably studied Kipling to his detriment, is not able to get beyond the smart unrealities affected by the latter author in moments of emotional crisis. It is almost laughable that the conventions of "good form" should have so strong a hold on the untrained imagination, but, no doubt, even this travesty of art may impose on the plain man:—

> "But as Lestrange began to descend the stairs at the end of the corridor, he heard the swish of a woman's skirts. Mrs. Gilchrist staggered towards him, feeling her way by the wall. She muttered hoarsely, 'I can't! I heard it all. May God forgive you!'
> "Lestrange stood like a pillar. 'Go back at once.' He swore frankly and without apology. 'That dying child is playing the game; haven't you the pluck to do the same?' and Mrs. Gilchrist went back to her Gehenna like a whipped dog."
> "Three years afterwards there was a scuffle on a frontier, and Dick was released to keep his promise—if he were allowed to. He hesitated.
> "'Bless me!' said St. Peter at the gate, 'of course, your record is not much, but didn't you people on earth know that that was all that we asked for?'
> "For there was a small hand in Dick's by this time, and so they went walking together again."

The author has, indeed, obviously set out to "write from a point of view from which other men have looked," and he apparently does not grasp that deliberately to adopt glasses which are focussed for the conventional vision is fatal to artistic spontaneity. Proof of this is afforded by the highly conventional "man of the world" situation in which woman is privileged to play a part in his tales. In "The Recording Angel's Peerage" we have Mrs. Burleigh "pleading for mercy" before the clubman, Edgar Carney, who is threatening to include her name in a book of London scandals. And the thrill comes when her daughter, Noreen Leighton, to save her mother's "reputation," throws Carney headlong down the staircase in Eaton Place, and kills him, and Mrs. Burleigh gasps, "Noreen, Noreen, can't you understand?" the incredible Carney being, of course, Noreen's father!

We should not trouble to discuss the patent limitations of vision in "Raw Edges" if the stories were not very cleverly written, and if Mr. Landon did not show convincing evidence in "The Crusader's Mass" and "The Gyroscope" that he could do much finer work. In "Thurnley Abbey" and "Railhead" he shows great skill in thrilling us with the supernatural, and although the effect in the former story is got by a cheap trick, he undoubtedly has power and artistic range. Should he continue to mould his talent on third-rate models he may, of course, become popular, but if he can cut himself loose from the besetting temptation of "man of the world" standards, he may prove a valuable recruit in the sparse ranks of the artists who can handle the short story.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Much has been written about the beaux and dandies of the later Georgian era—only a few weeks ago M. Boutet de Monvel's biography of George Brummell was reviewed in these columns—but Mr. Lewis Melville's two bulky volumes, "The Beaux of the Regency" (Hutchinson, 2 vols., 24s. net), contains far the best account of these gorgeous eccentrics with which we are acquainted. Mr. Melville has ransacked the memoirs and diaries of the period to good purpose. His book abounds in good stories and throws many interesting side lights on the social history of the Regency. The book treats of more than the beaux, since such men as "Poodle" Byng, Captain Gronow, "Monk" Lewis, and even Sydney Smith and Rogers are included, and it extends beyond the Regency, but the reader will readily pardon Mr. Melville for having interpreted his title with some degree of elasticity. The persons introduced all lived under the Regency and make on the whole a thoroughly entertaining, witty, and disreputable company. Among the dandies proper, by far the most famous was Brummell, to whom the author devotes eight chapters. Two letters by Brummell are printed for the first time, one of them (of which a facsimile is given) being that written by the Beau to Lords Charles and Robert Manners when he fled to Calais in 1816. It bears out the view which Mr. Melville takes (and Mr. Street in his book on "The Ghosts of Piccadilly" inclines to the same attitude) of Brummell's character as against M. de Monvel's depreciatory verdict. He abandons "legally and willingly" to his sureties "the reversion of a considerable sum of money now vested in the Court of Chancery, which must ultimately become mine . . . . to show that, though unfortunate and inconsiderate, I am not destitute of strong feeling and gratitude towards those who have been so seriously my friends." The supreme example of Brummell's wit in Mr.

Melville's judgment is the reply made to a stranger who greeted the Beau when a penniless exile at Calais with "I am so glad to see you, for we had heard in England that you were dead." "Mere stock-jobbing, my dear fellow, mere stock-jobbing," was Brummell's immediate answer. Another capital story is his account of having caught a cold. "The rascally landlord put me in a room with a damp stranger." But the book is a mine of such anecdotes. We have not space to discuss Mr. Melville's treatment of the minor wits and dandies, but can heartily recommend his book to those who enjoy light reading on an entertaining but by no means edifying subject. The volumes are illustrated by a really capital selection from contemporary artists, excellent examples of Gillray, Cruikshank, and George Dighton being included.

We are not sure that it is possible for anyone to achieve a thorough knowledge of a subject as wide as Stained Glass by six years' study, but Mr. C. H. Sherrill has certainly not wasted the time he has devoted to this fascinating pursuit, if we may judge by his volume, "Stained Glass Tours in France" (John Lane, 6s. net), which is the outcome of his six years' labours. The book is on the right lines. It has, moreover, a usefulness outside the information it conveys about the art it treats. The form is that of a guide, designed to direct the travellers' footsteps from Paris to the famous provincial cities of France, where good examples of medieval stained glass may be found, and there are carefully marked and mapped itineraries by following which the would-be student can work through his "periods" one by one. These periods, according to Mr. Sherrill's classification, which is as sound as it is simple, are three in number. His first set of tours concerns itself with stained glass of the thirteenth century and earlier, his second with that of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and the third with that of the sixteenth. When specimens of glass representative of more than one period are found in a single building, those of the period immediately under review are dealt with, and the rest are left alone until this period is reached in the book; places, therefore, like Chartres and Bourges necessitate more than one visit. This plan conduces to lucidity in differentiating one style from another. Of technical matter, Mr. Sherrill gives us no more than what is necessary to explain the development from the old pot-metal method to the richly enamelled and artistically designed and coloured style of the Renaissance. The basic principle of stained-glass study is not lost sight of, namely, that the art was the servant of architecture to an even greater extent than was medieval wall-painting; and thus it happens that in dealing with the cathedrals and churches of his choice the author often gives us as fresh and vivid a glimpse of the entire building as of its windows. The spirit of the work leaves nothing to be desired. Even as Nicolas Poussin is said to have developed his love of colour by contemplating the glories of the sixteenth-century windows at Grand-Andely, so Mr. Sherrill's enthusiasm has waxed stronger with every new discovery made in the course of his journeyings. Exhaustive his book is not, but as a well-written and stirring introduction to the study of stained-glass, and an admirable lesson in how and where to look for it in France, it could hardly be bettered. It is not over-burdened with illustrations, but what there are are well chosen and well done.

In the "Memoirs of Edward Vaughan Kenealy, LL.D." (John Long, 16s. net), mostly composed of his own autobiographical notes and diaries which his daughter, Miss Arabella Kenealy, has edited and prepared for the press, Dr. Kenealy speaks of "my prototype Mirabeau, to whom I have been many times compared." The phrase throws light on Kenealy's character. He was a man of great gifts without common sense, and with an impetuous, very exacting, and self-absorbed personality. His daughter describes him as an "accomplished Linguist (he was sufficiently familiar with thirteen languages to have written charming verses in all), profound Orientalist, Orator, Poet, Man of Letters, Statesman," and although he is not remembered for his achievements in any one of these capacities we think that his claim to be a poet has some solid foundation. The late Mr. Frederick Leveson Gower, in a delightful volume of reminiscences, recalls the impression made on the members of the Oxford Circuit by Kenealy's poem "Goethe," and cites Phillimore's verdict "that its author is the greatest poet now living on this island." The extracts from the diaries show that Kenealy was a man of very wide reading, but the theological works he produced are of no value. His career was amazing both in its triumphs and its failures, and those who wish to learn about the Tichborne case and the famous Stoke-on-Trent election will find the facts recorded in these pages. Miss Kenealy states that after her father's election to the House of Commons John Bright promised that he should be restored to his position at the Bar, and even hinted at Parliamentary office provided he abandoned his advocacy of the Claimant's cause. The story seems incredible, and we are not prepared to accept it without further evidence.

The most valuable features of the volume on Whistler, which Mr. Bernhard Sickert has contributed to the Popular Library of Art (Duckworth, 2s. net), are the chapter on the artist's technique and the catalogue of his oil-paintings. The latter was badly wanted, for while the etchings and lithographs have received sufficient attention at the hands of Messrs. Wedmore & Way, no attempt had hitherto been made with the oil pictures. Mr. Sickert's list is obviously incomplete in its details, and, as he points out, probably contains mistakes owing to the confusing system of titles adopted by Whistler; but he corrects several previous errors, particularly some which were made in the catalogue of the Memorial Exhibition at the New Gallery, and the total result fills an important corner, hitherto vacant, in Whistler literature. The best is a generous, though fairly just, appreciation of the master's work. Some of his comparisons, however, appear unduly combative. Ruskin hardly receives his due in the reference to him as a "weak, hysterical, egotistic, and, at the same time, grandly unselfish man of genius." Watts's work, apart from his portraiture, is denounced somewhat dogmatically as a failure. All the portraits of Whistler by other artists still living are "coarse performances in which all his elegance and charm are lost."

We cannot better Mr. W. G. Burn Murdoch's own description of his travel book "From Edinburgh to India and Burmah" (Routledge, 10s. 6d. net). He calls it a "ragtag journal," and that is precisely what it is. The book is a day-to-day record of places visited and things seen and done during a journey from Edinburgh to Bombay, from Bombay to Madras, thence to Rangoon, and across Burmah into Chinese territory, and back again to Calcutta and a few show places of Bengal. The travelling in India was performed in trains, that in Burmah in steamers. Of Rangoon he writes: "If anyone wants to have the wrinkles rolled out of his soul, let him go and rest in the quiet, and sun, and simple beauty of the Shwey Dagon Pagoda, with its tapering golden spire and the blue sky above." It is difficult, however, to imagine Mr. Murdoch resting anywhere. Throughout he appears to be distracted by the rival attractions of social festivities, sport and painting, and one is quite thankful when at length he gets away on an elephant into a Burmese jungle, and is thus debarred from one or two of his many pleasures. His work does not show the unconventional mind as clearly as the unconventional style of writing. The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales coincided with his own, and he describes those portions of the Royal progress which he witnessed in a manner that suggests the belated effort of a special correspondent, sent forth to follow the track. Moreover, the number of places mentioned in the book, which remind him of Bonnie Scotland, becomes positively alarming towards the end of his four hundred pages. One sighs for a spell of contemplative philosophy in this whirligig of foreign adventures and home reminders. Yet the holiday spirit of the book is pleasant enough, and the author's impressionistic drawings and sketches, many of which are reproduced in color, are illumined by a spark of real genius.

manence of Wordsworth" in "The Nineteenth Centry." It is a brilliant appreciation which all good Wordsworthians will read with pleasure. Mr. Paul's orthodoxy may be gathered from the dictum "Not to care for Wordsworth is not to care for poetry," a sufficiently trenchant statement of the Wordsworthian creed. In "The Fortnightly Review" Mr. Andrew Lang returns to the attack, which he began a couple of weeks ago in the "Times," upon M. Anatole France's "Vie de Jeanne d'Arc." Mr. Austin discusses "Dante's Poetic Conception of Woman," and Mr. H. S. Salt contributes an appreciation of Thoreau. "The Contemporary Review" contains an article by Mr. Henry Rose on "Ibsen as a Religious Teacher," in which some striking analogies are noticed between Ibsen and Swedenborg, the latter being a writer whom great literary men do not neglect, even if the general public does. "Verses ascribed to Shakespeare," by Mr. J. H. Ingram, and "The Irony of Samuel Butler," by Mr. Desmond MacCarthy appear in "The Albany Review."

Among the articles of political and general interest in "The Contemporary Review" are a characteristic pronouncement on "The Necessary Basis of Society," by Mr. Sidney Webb, with which we propose to deal elsewhere; forcible articles in favor of the Licensing Bill by Sir Thomas P. Whittaker and Sir Oliver Lodge; a continuation of Mr. Thomas Lough's series of articles on "Free Trade and the late Ministry," with special reference to the Sugar Convention; "Oxford in the 'Sixties," by Mr. H. E. P. Platt, in which Mark Pattison appears in a very unpleasant light; and a rejoinder by Mr. Stephen Coleridge to Mr. Stephen Paget's reply to his former article on vivisection. To "The Fortnightly Review" Sir Francis Channing contributes some very interesting and gracefully written recollections of the late Prime Minister; Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald replies to Dr. Beattie-Crozier in an article on "Socialism and Politics," and there are interesting anonymous articles on "Delane and the 'Times,'" and "Gunnery Records of the Fleet." The concluding sentence of the Delane article is worth quoting in view of present and coming developments: "The 'Times' has ceased to interest us; indeed, as a national institution, as the arbiter of great issues, as the organ of the intellectual and governing class, it has ceased to exercise influence and control." In "The Nineteenth Century" Lord Esher gives his personal reminiscences of General Gordon; Mr. J. A. R. Marriott opposes the contention that it is the business of the State to provide work for the unemployed; Sir William White discusses with great weight and knowledge "The Cult of the Monster Warship," and urges, on the lines of his articles in the "Spectator," that an inquiry into the policy of making an increase in the number of "Dreadnoughts" ought to be held; Bishop Welldon treats of the Pan-Anglican Congress; and Sir Roper Lethbridge traces the evolution of Tariff Reform in the Tory Party. "The Albany Review" contains articles on "Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman," by Mr. Harold Spender; "Old-Age Pensions and the Budget," by Mr. William Sutherland; and a criticism of Mr. Mallock's book on Socialism by Professor Edward Jenks, a very learned and competent critic of the school of the new philosophical Radicalism.

A Novel-Reader's Guide.—"The Hate Flame." By Percy Barron (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.). The "hate flame" is the feeling of Ireland towards England. A young Englishman tries to extinguish it by developing Ireland's commercial resources; he is thwarted by a Catholic priest.—"Tangled Wedlock." By Edgar Jepson (Hutchinson, 6s.). A group of faddists who imagine they are leaders of advanced thought and the effects produced on a young girl brought up among them, treated in a vein of amusing satire.—"The Chase of the Golden Plate." By Jacques Futrelle (Collier, 6s.). A fairly good example of the American detective story.—"The Butcher of Bruton Street." By Arthur Applin (Grant Richards, 6s.). A grim story of a fashionable surgeon and a dancer told in a way clearly designed to shock the reader.—"A King of Mars." By Avis Hekking (John Long, 6s.). An account of a bloodless revolution in the planet Mars, and other equally exciting adventures.

The Week in the City.

The Stock Exchange is at last in a really happy and confident mood, more happy perhaps and with better grounds for confidence than at any time since the Boer war. A tour round the City yesterday among bankers and brokers convinced me that a great deal of money has been coming forward for investment. And this, indeed, was to be expected; for why should people keep money on deposit at one per cent. when gilt-edged securities are still comparatively cheap? If the general view be correct, and theory confirms it, there is no reason why first-class securities should not continue to appreciate for some time to come. At present there is no sign of an upward tendency in money and discount rates, though well-informed men in the City think that trade is beginning to improve a little, especially in the West Riding. The reduction of the Berlin rate from 5 to 4½ per cent. has come at last, and the German papers say that the "consortium" which undertook to place the new German loans is at last beginning to get rid of its uncomfortable burden. New issues are being taken up with an avidity which shows that loanable capital is more plentiful than anybody supposed a couple of months ago.

Japanese and Russian Bonds.

After our own Government and Municipal securities, the foreign market seems to be the most general favorite. The high premium which has been established on the Moscow City loan reflects the considerable upward movement that has taken place in Russian securities. That improvement is certainly not justified by the condition of Russia's finances, or by the financial competence of the Russian Government. It is a testimony to the extraordinary strength and credulity of the French investor, and, perhaps, also to a belief that the Anglo-French entente is an additional guarantee of peace in Europe. Japanese bonds have been improving still more rapidly in the last few days, and here the rise seems to be justified by a "Times" telegram from Tokio announcing a surplus of over six millions on last year's estimates.

The Kaffir Market.

In the opinion of some the public fancy for gold mines is likely to return, and, in fact, "Kaffirs" are already a good deal above the lowest. A good deal of discrimination is necessary in this branch of investment; but I am told that orders (for the first time for many years) are coming from South Africa. This is certainly an encouraging sign. But it must be remembered that a vast number of investors have burnt their fingers badly in gold and diamond mines, and the principle of "once bit, twice shy" is likely to hold speculation in check.

American Railways.

Reports from the United States speak of a revival in some branches of business; but, on the whole, trade is still in the depths of depression. The best that can be said for railroads is that the retrenchments and curtailments of expenditure have begun to have their effect, and the net losses on receipts compared with last year, which were so large, have been greatly diminished. This, however, must be mainly at the expense of improvements and repairs. On the other hand, the crop reports are still very promising. The wheat looks splendid, and even the cotton is much better than last year. The passing of the Currency Bill is supposed to have removed the immediate fear of another monetary crisis. Upon the whole, then, it seems probable that even in the American market the ups are likely to predominate over the downs, but no one cares to prophesy. Mexico is still suffering from a severe depression, caused by the withdrawal of foreign capital and the difficulty of attracting more to the various mining and other ventures which are spread before the investing bird.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and of the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."

FAMOUS SHILLING GUIDE BOOKS.

These well-known Guide Books are based upon what may be called the "centre" principle, it being assumed that the reader will make one of the well-known tourist resorts or watering places his head-quarters, and explore the surrounding district at his leisure and convenience. Each guide, therefore, deals not only with the town from which it takes its title, but with all places likely to be visited from that town. Several places are, of necessity, described in more than one volume.

Diary of the Week.

The meeting between the King and the Tsar took place on Tuesday in fine weather at Reval, and visits were exchanged between the Royal and Imperial yachts, the King wearing a Russian dragoon uniform, the Tsar that of the Scots Greys, and the Emperor being created an Admiral of the British Fleet. The Tsar was accompanied, not only by his wife and children, but by M. Stolypin, the Premier, M. Isvolsky, the Foreign Minister, and by the Russian Ambassador in Great Britain. On the King's side, however, only permanent officials, Sir Charles Hardinge, of the Foreign Office, Sir John Fisher, of the Admiralty, and Sir John French, of the Army, were present, and the "Westminster Gazette" properly asks why, if these forms were observed in a despotic country, Sir Edward Grey did not represent our own constitutional and Parliamentary Sovereignty. On Wednesday the formal banquet took place on board the "Standart," and the diplomatic speeches were made, both declaring that the visit would contribute not only to bring the two countries close together, but to maintain the peace of the world. The Tsar emphasised the number of questions settled between Russia and Great Britain, and declared that the agreements embodying these arrangements were of "limited scope." On this the "Times" makes the specific announcement of a complete Anglo-Russian agreement on Macedonia, Russia allowing that Macedonian civil needs shall have the first charge on Macedonian revenues. Practically, the entire Continental Press agrees that an Anglo-Franco-Russian entente has been established. The most unfriendly comment is that of the "Neue Freie Presse," which probably represents the German view. The Viennese organ insists that "wildly foaming national hatred" plays beneath the surface of the entente, that Britain is still building up a system of anti-German understandings, and that the meeting would bring a strong element of restlessness into the world. The "North German Gazette" is friendly, suggesting that the entente is confined to Macedonia and Persia, but the Berlin Radical press is thoroughly alarmed and angry. Sir Edward Grey's engagements cover every part of the world save that where peace is really in danger.

Sir Bampfylde Fuller, lately Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal, has written an ill-judged letter to the "Times" under the burlesque title of "J'accuse," inspired by what he regards as his own "abandonment" by the Indian and Imperial Government. The letter condemns the Government for its weak attitude to the Swadeshi movement, for the release of Lajpat Rai, and for the offer of what it calls "conciliatory plums" to agitation. But it admits that scope must be afforded to the aspirations which "we ourselves in schools and colleges have been engendering and fostering, aspirations which are gradually restoring to the country its political self-respect." Meanwhile, the Indian Government has, with great haste, framed and passed two Acts of repressive legislation. The first is a Press Act, which partly revives the Lytton legislation of 1878. It appears to deal only with incitements to crime and gives magistrates power to confiscate printing presses and to stop the issue of offending papers. It is impossible to disapprove of the suppression of journals which, according to extracts read by Sir Harvey Adamson, called on the Bengalis to use bombs and to "light the sacrificial fires fed with blood." The Explosives Act is on the lines of the English Bill. Both measures were passed in a day. Lord Minto, in commending them, declared that young India must be saved from the doctrines of "murderous anarchy," but that the "political aspirations of honest reformers" would be met.

Meanwhile the situation has been considerably lightened by Lord Morley's speech on Thursday at the annual dinner of the Indian Civil Service Club. The speech was carefully phrased and balanced, but its tone was unmistakably that of a reformer. Lord Morley said truly that now the Indian Secretary had to keep his watch "on two longitudes," he had to consider India and the British Parliament under democracy. His language on the outrages was grave, but not tragic or panic-stricken. There was no "earthquake," but "rather heavy clouds" had arisen on the horizon and were sailing over the Indian skies. There was, in fact, "a certain estrangement and alienation of races in India."

As to methods, though the first duty of Government was to keep order, it must be reconciled with the legitimate "ideas and aspirations" of the Indian people. "Pure repression" was impossible: it would involve the breakdown of British statesmanship. On this point Lord Morley spoke with emphasis and powerful suggestion of the first establishment of universities in India, an event which he called "deeper" and "more momentous" than the transfer of the machinery of Government to the Crown from the old East India Company. "When we talk of education," said Lord Morley, significantly, "we are getting very near the root of the case." He spoke in praise of the great "self-command" shown by the governing classes in India in face of the campaign of bombs. He approved both of the Press Act and the Explosives Act, the former of which tempered executive action with judicial process, and was aimed, not at criticism, but only at direct incitement to murder, "incendiary froth, stained with bloodshed." "You may," said Lord Morley, in his picturesque way, "put picric acid in the pen and ink just as much as in any steel bomb." But he declared his belief in a great body of "reasonable people," on whose steadiness and enlightenment the rulers of India might build. The speech seems to us to be conceived in a spirit of courage and complete faithfulness to Lord Morley's ideals, and to breathe a cautious but thoroughly progressive spirit. It should, therefore, be of great promise for the future of Indian reform.

The Miners' Federation, which now stands practically for the entire organised body of British miners, has decided by 213,137 votes against 168,294 to affiliate with the Labor Representative Committee, in other words, with the Parliamentary Labor Party. This reverses the decision of 1906, when the affiliation was rejected by 10,000 votes. It almost destroys the Liberal-Labor group in the House of Commons, thirteen members of which, out of a total of twenty-two, must, after the ratification of the vote, cross the floor and sit with their Labor colleagues on the Labor benches. The new arrangement, however, is well discounted, and will lead to little friction. Life-long members of the Liberal Party, like Mr. Burt and Mr. Fenwick, may decline to transfer their allegiance, and their path will doubtless be made easy for them.

The Conferences of Friendly Societies, held during the Whitsun Recess, have spoken freely on the Old Age Pensions Bill. Generally the tone has been friendly, but details have been freely criticised. The points most objected to were the low limit of income and the high limit of age which most speakers thought would exclude many members of their organisations. They also appear to prefer an age limit of sixty-five, and their arguments tended in the direction of a sliding scale. On the other hand, Trade Unionists are said to prefer the fixed limit, but we strongly hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will acknowledge the overwhelming weight of the argument in favor of a sliding arrangement. If this change were made and the wide and loose sweep of the language of the section which imposes a test of character were changed, the friends of the Bill would probably accept the elimination of paupers from the 1st of January last as a temporary measure pending a general reform of the Poor Law. The Chancellor has already stated that the earlier estimate of six millions must be expanded and that the first year's cost of the scheme will be nearer seven millions.

Just as last December Turkish aggression on the frontier almost led to civil war between the Shah and his Parliament, so now pressure from Russia has brought Shah and Parliament to the brink of war. On the day the Russian ultimatum was accepted, the Royal Clan urged the Shah to dismiss his reactionary counsellors who were under Russian influence. The Shah agreed, and the chief of them took refuge in the Russian Legation. On Sunday last, however, the Shah suddenly left Teheran, recalled the old clique, imprisoned some notables who were sent to protest, issued a proclamation against the reformers, and appointed a new governor of Teheran and others officials in violation of the Constitution. He is now outside Teheran, gathering forces, while the reformers are mustering theirs. The strength of the Constitutionalists is in the towns, and the Shah hopes to have the peasants on his side. If the reformers' suspicions are just, the Anglo-Russian agreement has not succeeded in making Persia's neighbours stand aside and leave Persia to work out her fate free from foreign interference.

The high treason trial at Cettinge has been enlivened by the testimony of a witness, named Nastic, who turned King's evidence, to the effect that the bombs intended to be employed against Prince Nicolas were made at the Servian State Arsenal with the connivance of the King and Crown Prince of Servia. The Austrian Press hastens to say that there must be some truth in this story, but Austria welcomes anything likely to keep Servia docile, and outside Austria nobody credits it, though the incident has led to a diplomatic rupture between Servia and Montenegro. Neither King Peter nor his son is particularly nice, but they are not imbeciles, and it is probable that the Cettinge trial is an attempt to ruin the National Democratic Party in Montenegro, which is displeasing to the autocratic Prince, and at the same time to damage Servia. None of the evidence yet produced is worth the slightest credence, and it has been given so far chiefly by spies like Nastic and other gentlemen of similar calibre.

On Sunday Mulai Hafid entered Fez, and Kaid Anfloos, the last of Abdul Aziz's supporters, is preparing to go over to his rival. Abdul Aziz's game is up, and with it the French policy of naked aggression, but the Colonial party is making a desperate effort to prevent the French Government recognising Mulai Hafid, who is now de facto, as well as de jure, Sultan of all Morocco, except a few ports dominated by foreign guns. The "Temps" surpasses itself in sophistry by arguing that, because the Algeciras Act was signed by Abdul Aziz, Europe is pledged to maintain him, even though the Moors have deposed him. On the same principle, in the event of a royalist revolution in France, Russia would be bound to intervene to restore the Republic. Of course, Europe's sole concern is that the Sultan, whoever he be, should execute the Algeciras Act. Mulai Hafid is willing to do that, and to recognise him is the first step towards its execution. But the French jingoes do not want the Algeciras Act to be carried out in all sincerity.

This day (Saturday) a great procession of the moderate section of the Women Suffragists, led by Mrs. Fawcett, will march to the Albert Hall. An invitation was sent to the Prime Minister, and Mrs. Asquith replied expressing personal sympathy with the movement. On the other hand, a mixed body of public men and women, who do not represent the full strength of the women's memorial against the suffrage issued some years ago, have started a hostile agitation. The best known names among the women leaders of the anti-suffragists are Lady Weardale, Mrs. Humphry Ward, and Mrs. Max Müller. The Committee propose to start a National Women's Anti-Suffrage Association. Their chief grounds of opposition are the "spirit of sex-antagonism" that the extreme Suffragists have evoked, the dislike of great bodies of women to hostile action against husbands or brothers, and the unfitness of the vast majority of women, who, the Committee declare, "know nothing whatever of politics, or parties, or the nation, or the Empire."

A lively and very searching discussion was started in the House of Commons on Thursday on the working of the Small Holdings Bill. Sir Edward Strachey gave an inspiriting account of the extent of the movement towards the land. Already 16,000 people had applied for a quarter of a million of acres. Furthermore, co-operative societies were being formed in Essex and elsewhere in order to rent land. Unfortunately it seems that the machinery of the Act is working so slowly that as yet no one of the 16,000 has actually been settled on an acre of soil. Blame for this delay was divided between the Board of Agriculture and the County Councils. Mr. Morrell, speaking for Oxfordshire, and Mr. Montagu, for Cambridgeshire, thought that the Councils had been working hard, but that the Small Holdings Commissioners had done little or nothing. On the other hand, Mr. Bennett, who represents the Woodstock Division, insisted that the landlords and their friends on the County Councils were unsympathetic and even obstructive, and that, unless the Board brought pressure to bear, no notices to quit land wanted for small holdings would be served this year, and no farms actually secured before 1910. The work of sifting applications and guarding against loss is doubtless a difficult one, but we hope it will be expedited.

The Duma on Saturday adopted the Budget Commission's recommendation and rejected the credit for battleship construction, despite a strong appeal by M. Stolypin. The vote asked for was small, but it belonged to a programme the execution of which was intended to cost £228,000,000 in the next ten years. The Duma has its doubts about this ambitious scheme, but the line it took for the moment was that the Navy Department must be radically reformed before it could be trusted with the handling of money. M. Guchkoff, the Octobrist leader, bitterly complained that the Department was as bad as during the war, that those who had led the navy to Tshushima still held office, and that Admiral Alexeieff, the most incompetent of all, was actually being put forward as candidate for the Ministry of Marine. The Duma's resolution to insist upon reform and to control naval and military policy marks a great advance of independence. Clearly any Russian Parliament, be its elements the least Liberal, must slide into opposition to the bureaucratic Government.

Mr. Burns spoke with insight and humour on Monday in opening a new recreation ground in connection with a co-operative housing plan at Ealing. He denounced what he called "the spirit of the horde" under which people "cried in companies, smiled in battalions, sported in divisions, holidayed in armies, and married in mobs." He did not like to see "120,000 men without a woman among them watching twenty-two players developing the wrong end of their anatomy." "Where the women and the child were not, there was the beast," he added. The remedy was a return to the pursuit of individual happiness which was to be sought in the garden and in home and family games, and to which the work of the old County Council—not, let us hasten to add, of its successor—has greatly contributed.

The results of the cricket season thus far point to a return of fortune to Yorkshire. Her three serious rivals—Surrey, Lancashire, and Nottinghamshire—have all lost a match. She remains unbeaten, largely on account of the revived power of her bowling and of Hirst's unrivalled gifts in every department of the game. Surrey is probably the best team of County batsmen, but she lacks a great captain and a great fast bowler. On Wednesday she succeeded with some difficulty in drawing her Whitsuntide game against Nottinghamshire, her old rival, and she has proved to be no match for the great Northern eleven.

Politics and Affairs.

A NEW POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT.

The decision of the Miners' Federation in favor of union with the Labor Representation Committee, in other words with the Parliamentary Labor Party, is an event of real political importance. As it takes effect, it must impair the nominal strength of the Ministerial Party in the House of Commons, and must change the superficial and the real basis of Liberalism in the country. The Durham miners have stood aloof from the ballotings, which have yielded a majority of nearly 45,000 votes for amalgamation, but substantially the mass of miners tend to united action. The attraction of the new force has overcome attachment to the old. Formal partnership is dissolved, and henceforward Liberalism must look to the miners as Sweden now looks to Norway, that is to say, it must court their friendship without being able to count on their alliance. The material loss is not inconsiderable. When the new ties have been consummated, about a dozen members of the House of Commons will cross over from the right to the left of the Speaker. In the constituencies the great mining interest, which controls, or partly controls, nearly a hundred seats, will nominally be independent. The old links with the Liberal organisations will gradually be dissolved, and veterans like Mr. Burt, Mr. Fenwick, and Mr. John Wilson, born and bred in the Liberal atmosphere, fully absorbing its best thought and most exalted feeling, and trained in its most generous traditions of statesmanship, will feel themselves thrown on a new and somewhat alien world. And, on the other hand, Liberalism must needs suffer from losing contact with one of the soberest and most virile strains in the Labor movement. The miners are sturdy folk. Their moral strength and intellectual resources may be judged by the quality of the men they have sent to Parliament. Members like Mr. Burt and Mr. Fenwick would adorn any assembly, and are fitted to fill almost any position in a legislative body. It is these pioneers who have made straight the way for the Labor Party, and are to-day ensamples of democracy, models of the firm, continent, self-possessed and self-controlled type of governing man, who has spread the fame and sustained the might of England all the world over.

The immediate consequences of the new development can hardly be revolutionary. The miners give to the Labor movement a steadying and, on the whole, a conservative force. They are strong trade unionists, and the great majority are not Socialists. It will be interesting to see what part they will play in the inevitable work of readjusting the constitution of the Parliamentary Labor Party. They are likely to call for some modification of the pedantic and impracticable rule which forbids co-operation with the old political parties —that is to say, which turns their leaders into tied agents of the central organisation, depriving them of power and responsibility. They will almost certainly raise the vexed question of the position of trade councils and of Socialist societies on the Labor Representation Committee, and will call for a trade union basis both in policy and in representation. Their accession will greatly strengthen the financial side of the movement. The trade union contribution will be overwhelming, and many more members of Parliament will be sustained from it, while the Socialist and middle-class element, which has much to do with ideas, but little with maintenance, may be eliminated altogether or greatly reduced in voting power and importance. In a word, the new combination may practically imply a reversion to the views and practice of the Trade Union Congress, linked with an element of semi-Socialist but cautious and opportunist policy. Organised, militant trade unionism will reappear in a political dress, but stamped with the old hall-mark.

It is clear that both the regular political parties are likely to suffer in this process. Toryism will probably be wiped out among the organised industries, for Protection will not go down with the cotton-workers, the body of trade unionists where Tory democracy had made most converts, and Mr. Balfour's cold and sceptical Conservatism, essentially old-fashioned and based on privilege, cannot live in the fresher atmosphere of workmen's politics. And Liberalism will have to fight for working-class support, to earn it, and to pay for it. But, on the other hand, a certain loss of ideas, of power, variety, and freedom in their expression, must result from a breach with Socialism, and a decline of Mr. Keir Hardie's influence, and that of his middle-class lieutenants and sympathisers. Labor will always be a source of inspiration, of suggestion, in politics; it is bound to think and act rightly in so many questions where the average partisan is inclined to go wrong. But in proportion as the Labor movement reverts to a purely class basis, it ceases to become a competitor in the actual business of government with the older constitutional organisations. No pure workman's party can go very far. Middle-class brains and training are indispensable to it. It must depend on lawyers for its draughtsmanship of Bills, its foundation of ideas and schemes of policy. If by any miracle it actually came into power, it would find itself at sea in the management of affairs—dependent on admirals, generals, diplomatists, civil officials, the powerful, sheltered, experienced hierarchy of experts which is always in power, and even in some of its branches counts on its ability to thwart a Radical, to say nothing of a Labor, Administration. Recent experience hardly encourages the belief that we shall soon see a transfer of superintending force from the classes which monopolise the higher intellectual training to those which are still shut out from it. A man of genius springing from the soil or the workshop might modify these disabilities, but he could not remove them.

For these reasons we are not likely to witness great political changes as the result of the inclusion in the Parliamentary labor movement even of so splendid a natural force as the miners can supply. But the event is one to be marked by the Government and the Liberal Party. Labor is now being regimented into a Parliamentary army, which may within the next few years command a hundred votes, or, say, a sixth of the Parliamentary representation. It can no longer be ticked off as so many safe votes in the Liberal Whip's pocket-book. It must be taken into account, in time into partnership. This is a clear development of the group system, with which Continental statesmanship is familiar. Liberalism cannot be deposed; the two-party method is still closely linked with our constitutional development, with the ingrained habits and old memories of the British people. But its leaders have now to be tested in their capacity to grasp a new situation, to realise that they must come to a definite electoral and Parliamentary understanding with Labor, throwing aside obsolete traditions, and envisaging the essential conditions of democracy, opening the higher schools, the universities, the services, to the people as a whole, and standing boldly for equality of intellectual, economic, and political opportunity. Thus it will attain a concrete faith and basis of its own. In such a process of renewal this statesman or that may fall back into Toryism if he will. But the party as a whole, bent on assuring its future, cherishing its old ideals of peace, freedom for trade and nationality, and organic social development, as opposed to revolutionary theory, but advancing to a firm conception of national well-being, will renew its life and ennoble its activities.

THE BASIS OF THE TRIPLE ENTENTE.

A Russian newspaper, commenting on Sir Edward Grey's speech upon the Reval visit described it as the greatest political utterance since Disraeli. The judgment is severe, but it serves to underline the sharp departure which the speech proclaimed from the traditions of a Liberal foreign policy. The speech was, in effect, an argument, plausible, and even eloquent, in favor of an attitude of color-blindness towards the character and polity of foreign States with which we have dealings. That a Liberal democracy may conclude with a despotism an understanding as cordial and as intimate as that which links it to a Radical Republic, that the undiminished horrors of the repression in Russia should play no part in deflecting our sympathies from the Government which bears for them the indisputable responsibility, that a Tsar who has given his hand to the organisers of Jewish massacres is as fit a subject for royal courtesies as a French President or an Italian King—these are the conclusions to which this attitude drives us. It is an attitude which is quite logical and defensible, but the context of ideas in which alone it can thrive has no relation to Liberalism. Assume that our Empire exhausts our obligations and our sympathies towards mankind, interpret patriotism as a pursuit of national greatness, controlled by no sense of a wider human community, and it will seem natural to choose our allies without regard to their character, and accept the friendship of a despotism, if it can serve us in adjusting the general balance of power to our own ends. The Whigs of the last century had a wider and more human outlook. They conceived of Liberalism as an international principle, and believed that the shortest road to peace lay through the triumph of the ideas of nationality and popular rights. The key to Palmerston's policy—wayward, tactless, and unfaithful to itself, though it often was—was, as he put it himself, a determination "to give moral support to the constitutional principle." He would not have given his support to a Government, whose Ministers "thank God that there is no Parliament in Russia." The man who defended the popular indignation which resulted in the mobbing of General Haynau in London, on the ground that this man, who had flogged women prisoners, was "a great moral criminal," would not have sanctioned a visit to a Tsar who has protected torturers, and rules in time of peace with the aid of field courts-martial. When he dared the Queen's displeasure by receiving the exile Kossuth, he was not ashamed to enjoy the approval of Radical deputations which talked in plain English about "despots and assassins." To the remonstrances of Queen Victoria, who saw the world as a community of Courts and never caught a glimpse of a nation, Lord John Russell had an answer which has its pointed application to Reval. "Somewhat of the good opinion of the Emperor of Russia and other foreign sovereigns may be lost," he wrote in a general defence of Palmerston's policy, "but the goodwill and affection of the people of England are retained, a great security in these times."

Sir Edward Grey appeared to be conscious that his extreme reading of the principle of non-interference looked like a departure from Liberal traditions. He recognised the right of interference, with an almost legal precision, in two specific cases—when treaties sanction our intervention as in Turkey, and when an oppressed nationality is struggling against alien rule. These distinctions are somewhat arbitrary, and in any event they have no application to the present case, since no one proposes that we should actively intervene in Russia. But are there no oppressed nationalities in Russia? Are the Poles, the Georgians, the Finns, and the Jews less worthy of our sympathy than were the Magyars or the Italians? King "Bomba" was not an alien despot in Naples, yet no legalist among the Whigs saw anything more tolerable in his tyranny than in that of the Austrians in Lombardy. We had no treaty rights in Servia to authorise us to express an opinion on the immunity of the regicides from punishment. Treaty rights of interference had always a beginning, and the motive which prompted us to acquire them is of universal application. It was because we sympathised with the subject peoples of Turkey that we insisted on a recognition of our guardianship. That broad fact of sympathy cannot be limited by treaties, or confined to nationalist causes. Only a madman would propose to intervene in Russia. But only a mind which had failed to grasp the elements of Liberalism would dispute our right to allow our sympathy with its victims to regulate the degree of cordiality in our relations with the Russian Government.

The discussion of the ethics of this visit has been for the most part unreal and insincere. Sir Edward Grey created a situation from which it was exceedingly difficult to withdraw. To cancel a visit once publicly announced, on the ground that we disapprove the internal policy of the Tsar, might perhaps be described as an interference in the internal affairs of a friendly State. But to the more fundamental objection that the visit ought never to have been arranged, this argument cannot be opposed. To have refrained for a few years longer from a courtesy to which there is no precedent in the whole history of Russia and Great Britain, would have implied neither interference nor insult. To salute the head of a friendly State is the most natural and proper of acts, when he can fairly be regarded as the representative of his people. A Tsar who dares not show himself in a Russian street or face a Russian crowd is not the representative of Russia. A Tsar who has publicly posed as the patron of the Black Hundreds marks himself out as the head of a disreputable faction, so long as the struggle lasts. Courtesies which must be directed exclusively to the leaders of one party in a civil conflict partake themselves of the nature of an interference. Had Professor Milyukoff or the Speaker of the Third Duma been included among the guests at Reval, the visit might have worn another complexion. But it is M. Stolypin, whose "necktie" popular speech confounds with the hangman's rope, and the Grand Duke Vladimir, whose name is identified with "Bloody Sunday," who have represented Russia at this first fraternisation.

To gauge the future of this relationship, it is necessary to understand the motives which prompted it. It is the case that the Russian Liberals welcome the visit, but it was certainly not their advocacy which induced our Foreign Office to undertake it. The impulse came, in the first instance, from France, whose interests and persuasion, if we are not greatly mistaken, were also responsible for the breach of Free Trade involved in our adherence to the Sugar Convention. The calculations behind French pressure were confined to the sphere of high politics. It was the ideal of M. Delcassé to group all the Powers of Europe, but more especially England, France, and Russia, in a league for the isolation of Germany. His successors may have seen the risks of a too open and aggressive pursuit of the policy of "penning in." But his school still dominates the French Foreign Office, and its organ, the "Temps," is even now advocating the conversion of the Triple Entente, which exists already, into a Triple Alliance with a military basis. In all the recent approaches to Russia, French diplomacy has been the mediator and the go-between. Nothing is further from the mind of Sir Edward Grey than any thought of an aggressive policy towards Germany. But the fear of that war which the "Temps" calls "inevitable" seems none the less to govern his whole strategy. He sees the risk to European peace from German ambitions, and he raises against that danger barrier behind barrier, and after insurance, reinsurance. He wrecked the hope of a reduction of armaments because he feared to surrender our advantage in commerce-destruction. He is preparing public opinion for a great increase in our fleet next year—a contingency of fatal significance for the cause of peace and for the existence of the Liberal Party. And now, as though our "Dreadnoughts" and our destroyers were insufficient, he seems to be nervously seeking for allies on the Continent. True, he has undertaken that no treaty shall be arranged at Reval. But, short of treaties, there may be conventions, more or less formal, which provide for certain contingencies. Few competent authorities doubt that we have already some military convention with France. If no business of this nature was contemplated, it is not easy to guess why Sir John Fisher and Sir John French should both have accompanied the King to Reval, there to meet the Russian Ministers of War and Marine. A more dangerous policy than this of isolating a formidable and alert Power, it would be hard to conceive. It is such preparations against the "inevitable" war which tend to realise the fear that has become an obsession.

The Russian attitude towards Germany is, however, a shifting and very calculating mood on which it would be rash to reckon. The Court has always been, and still is, pro-German. The masses have always detested Germany, mainly because the harshest members of the bureaucracy, from Pleve to Kaulbars, have been Germans by race. The recent publication in M. Stolypin's official organ, "Rossiya," of the statement that Germany had undertaken to lend military aid to Russia, in the event of a revolt in Poland, created a passionate fear of German influence, which suffices to explain the present anxiety for a rapprochement with Liberal England. But the Russian Liberals have never done justice to the cleverness of their opponents. Wooed by both King and Kaiser, visited by both, included by each in turn, now in a Baltic and now in an Asiatic Agreement, the Tsar is in a position to take from each the services which each can render. Germany can lend troops. We can lend money. Both may be necessary to a nearly bankrupt Government. Neither suitor can provide all that the bureaucracy wants; it will, therefore, play with both. Amid this competition for influence, knowing that only the need of money ties Russia to England and France, it is hardly likely that we shall risk much by giving unpopular advice, or loading our financial assistance with unwelcome conditions. Carried along by our suspicions of Germany in this struggle for influence at St. Petersburg, we shall have to remember at every turn that the men with whom we sympathise are not the men who can serve us. It is the bureaucracy which makes treaties, arranges commissions on loans, and bestows concessions to financiers. The Liberals have no influence, and the best of them are in gaol. If we are to derive any solid benefits from our friendship with Russia, it will be by cultivating the good graces of its ruling caste—by taking care, in Russell's phrase, lest "somewhat of the good opinion of the Emperor of Russia" should "be lost."

OUR OPPORTUNITY IN INDIA.

No one can regret more than ourselves the tone of Sir Bampfylde Fuller's letter to the "Times" last Saturday. From the title of "J'accuse" down to the conclusion it displayed the undignified temper of a disappointed man. We do not deny that his position as first Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal was difficult. As he says, the Partition was none of his doing. Yet in carrying into effect the policy of splitting a great nationality in two, he was naturally regarded as the embodiment of Lord Curzon's crowning blunder, and the more loyally he attempted to fulfil his orders, the more he exposed himself to the slights and opposition of which he complains. He attempted to fulfil his orders loyally. By that attempt he succeeded in reawakening the long-dormant hostility of Mohammedan and Hindu, he alienated the true leaders of the Hindu population, and he roused a spirit of resentful disaffection in the colleges and schools. We do not wish to try his case again, but we are convinced that if Lord Curzon had not resigned, and if Sir Bampfylde Fuller had remained in Eastern Bengal, it would have been no mere affair of Swadeshi and boycott with which we should have been dealing in the last few months.

But, unfortunate as the letter is, there are some sentences in it well worthy of attention at the present crisis. He does not believe, he says, that, in any case, India could have long continued unchanged:—

> "For the last fifty years," he goes on, "we ourselves in schools and colleges have been engendering and fostering aspirations which are gradually restoring to the country its political self-respect. We have recognised, though not perhaps always quite adequately, that scope must be afforded to these aspirations, and that our legislation must conform more and more to the wishes of the educated classes."

That would not sound much for a Liberal in England to say. Statesmen like Lord Morley have used similar language time and again. But when an Anglo-Indian, trained in the circle of officialdom, and writing in a mood of personal resentment, can still speak in that fashion, it marks a change indeed. It is the signal for reforms that cannot be delayed.

Consider the present situation. The accession of the Liberal Government to power was greeted in India with an outburst of hope and goodwill. It was welcomed as another step in the restoration to the country of its "political self-respect." The increasing irritation of Lord Curzon's Viceroyalty had been brought to an end just before, and people were willing to suspend the intense hostility produced by his final act. For his successor they had secured a welcome contrast in Lord Minto—a man of Liberal sympathies, and, what is equally rare and vital in India, of fine tact and courtesy in his dealings. When, only a few months later, Mr. John Morley was appointed Secretary of State, the appointment sent a thrill of joy through the country. We all recognise Lord Morley as a man who laid down the guiding principles of Liberalism in the firmest outlines, and followed them with strong conviction. But, honored as he is in our country for his works and his career, he was regarded by Indians with a more profound devotion. They make better disciples than ourselves, and they had chosen Mr. Morley in a special sense as their Master. His works were studied in their colleges and universities. There was hardly a student of them all who had not derived from Mr. Morley his firmest principles of freedom and self-government, and he was equally admired as the commentator on Burke, the follower of Mill, the friend and interpreter of Gladstone, and the advocate of Home Rule. Here, they thought, was the man who would redress the heavy balance of their wrongs. Here was the champion of justice and nationality, who, at a stroke, would undo the galling offence of the Partition, would admit Indian representatives to a genuine share in their own government, and would help in restoring to their country her "political self-respect."

The stronger the hope, the more extreme was the disappointment. We could hardly expect Indians to take sufficient consideration of the "damnosa hereditas" with which Lord Morley is weighted, or of the resistance with which every proposal of reform is met by Anglo-Indian society and officials encrusted in their routine. In answer to their hopes the Indians only saw the maintenance of the hated Partition as "a settled fact," the deportation of one of their most honored and moderate leaders without trial, the passing of a Seditious Meetings Act, a system of police and postal espionage which failed to protect innocent people from violence, and a renewal of flogging which by the laws of caste excludes the victim from society, and the shame of which burns into an Indian mind. They have now seen an Explosives Bill and a Newspaper Bill hurried through the Viceroy's Council in a single day, while Lord Minto tells them that in his opinion a general Press Act for the further suppression of free speech is imperatively necessary.

We do not wish to spend time in criticism of the past. No one objects to the Explosives Bill; there is not much objection to the Newspaper Bill, provided it is strictly limited to cases of incitement to murder, and it would only be fair if one of the first prosecutions under it were directed against such a paper as the Anglo-Indian "Asian," which has suggested to Mr. Kingsford that he should murder every strange Indian who approaches him or his house. But we would point out that until Lord Morley is able to bring Simla into line in regard to his proposals of reform, the Indian is able to say that the only measures with which we have so far answered the hopes of India have been repressive. The one notable step in advance has been the admission of two nominated Indians to the India Council in Whitehall. That is an important change, but it does not strike the Indian imagination. London is far away, the most trusted leaders of Indian opinion will not quit their country in her time of need, and nominees are never the trusted leaders of opinion. As for the other reforms for which Lord Minto appears willing to be sponsor, they are worthless.

Now, therefore, is Lord Morley's opportunity, an opportunity to which the general wording and tone of his admirable speech on Thursday to the representatives of the Indian Civil Service show him to be fully alive. He has shown caution; he has conciliated Anglo-Indian and Conservative opinion. Proposals from him which would have raised a storm of panic two years ago would now be considered quietly. He has certainly proved that he is no impatient idealist, no St. Just of the English Revolution, as his opponents used to call him to satiety. And both at home and in India he retains the following of Liberal opinion trained on the principles he has laid down, and anxious to see their confidence in their teacher vindicated. His mind could never rest satisfied with the paraphernalia of Advisory Councils with their Rajahs and Notable incapacities, and of Legislative Councils stuffed with nominees whose function will be to give Government measures a deluding aspect of popularity. He must be anxious to draw his scheme of reform upon generous and satisfying lines. Such lines are not difficult to discover: in the rough, they would be the elevation of a united Bengal into a Governorship, relieved of large extraneous districts by the creation of a new province; the admission of at least one Indian into the Executive Councils; the enlargement of the Legislative Councils by the admission of a minority of genuinely elected members, with some control over expenditure; and a gradual extension of primary education.

There is nothing revolutionary in these proposals, nothing to excite panic in the most nervous Anglo-Indian. Those who tell us never to concede because Orientals regard concessions as signs of fear, forget Lord Morley's fine saying that we are the representatives not of Oriental civilisation but of Western civilisation. There is no question of fear. Our position in India is as unassailable as our protection is at present essential for the country's welfare. All but a minute circle of Indians recognise these things. But, as Lord Minto said, our real strength must always lie in our justice. And nothing could restore the somewhat shaken reputation of our justice so completely as a great and striking enactment of reforms that would be conspicuous to all the peoples of India, cut the ground from under the feet of violence, and mark a new era in the restoration to the country of her "political self-respect."

CO-OPERATORS AND POLITICS.

In Whit Week the Co-operators met in Congress to measure their growth and to rejoice in their strength. Their satisfaction is well founded, for during sixty years this movement has grown rapidly, continuously, and at an accelerating pace. Its activities have spread over an ever-widening area of the working population and an increasing variety of trades, until now the movement contains nearly two and a-half million members, nearly all of them householders, among whom, in pecuniary benefits alone, it distributes over twelve million pounds per annum in dividends. In general terms, this signifies that not far short of one-sixth of the wages of the workers of the country are expended in co-operative stores, which supply the principal articles of food and clothing for the majority of the population in hundreds of our Northern and Midland towns and villages, and that a bonus of about £5, upon an average, is added to their annual wages. All this is the material fruit of an essentially moral movement, and one which perhaps bears more striking testimony than any other to the self-control, the perseverance, and the social spirit which modern industrialism, with all its shortcomings, has done so much to provoke in our working classes.

There are those who lament what they term the decay of the co-operative idealism and the fading of the magnificent visions of the earlier prophets of the movement into grocery dividends. But such scoffers speak without discernment, for the achievements we describe are nothing else than the spirit of co-operation translated into fact, and all who are personally familiar with the co-operative leaders in every centre of activity know that for intelligence, civic spirit, and political enthusiasm they stand in the foremost rank. The movement, like others, has its obvious defects and its necessary limitations. It might have been expected to do much more than it has done for the intellectual education of its members, for a large proportion even of the comparatively trivial sum devoted to education really goes to recreation and amusement. Although certain large departments of industry, both in manufacture and in transport, lie quite outside the range of any probable success, a larger and more serious attempt to deal with certain branches of agriculture, as, for instance, dairy farming and fruit growing, and with working-class banking and insurance, might by this time have been attended by very important results. Though these and other productive industries have been the subjects of recent, not unsuccessful, experiment, either by the Co-operative Wholesale Societies or by separate societies, comparatively little has been done. It still remains true that the solid success of British co-operation lies in retail and wholesale commerce, for, except in the case of a few articles of clothing and food, the production of the goods sold by the thousands of co-operative stores still remains mostly in non-co-operative businesses. Though the recent penetration of the Co-operative Wholesale into many new branches of manufacture, and even into agriculture, has revived the larger hopes of some, it remains inherently improbable that the movement can secure for the working class consumer the "profits" of production as it has undoubtedly secured for them the "profits" of distribution. Still less likely is it that the persistent efforts of productive workshops, directly owned and managed by the workers in them, or any compromise along the lines of co-partnership, will realise, by gradual advance and absorption, the ideal which, like every "good co-operator," the President of this week's Congress expressed when he foreshadowed a time in which "the people should become their own employers."

The overwhelming majority of great capitalistic enterprises lies at present practically untouched by the co-operative movement; there are no signs that the mining, shipping, and railroad industries, the great metal, engineering and machinery trades, or the great services for municipal supply, to name certain conspicuous instances, are likely to fall to any appreciable extent under voluntary co-operation. It is no disparagement of the co-operative movement that it cannot thus reconstruct the entire industrial system. Its more thoughtful leaders clearly recognise the necessary division of labor in the working class movement, and are beginning to think out more clearly the relations between this and other branches. Though no formal relations subsist between the co-operative and the Trade Union organisations, the distrust, and even active animosity, once frequently displayed by Trade Unionists have given way to more friendly feelings, cemented by a recognition of the fact that strong centres of Trade Unionism are also strong for co-operation, and that the personal forces in the local movements are largely the same. The refusal of co-operators to come into the Labor Party, or, indeed, to assume any political character, strongly attested by last Tuesday's resolution, conceals some of the new facts of the situation. Though the Congress wisely refused to entertain a proposal to run co-operative candidates for Parliament, its proceedings made it very evident that in the near future it may be forced to abandon its attitude of political abstinence. Free Trade is rightly recognised as vital to the interests of co-operation, and, just as in Switzerland, the powerful Konsumvereine, which have sprung into existence within the last few years, founded on the Rochdale plan, have thrown themselves with vigour into the attack upon food taxes, so here the deadly designs of the Conservative Party, now committed to Protection, must force our co-operators, not merely as individual citizens, but as an organised movement, to assist in the defence of free imports. A resolution, passed by a large majority of the Congress, approving woman's suffrage indicates another clear line of political sympathy. The part taken by women in the working of co-operation has been of great and growing importance, and nowhere else is the fatuity of the "argument" that women have no experience and no interest in "questions of finance" so fully exposed. For the entire detailed success of the co-operative movement has been dependent on the practical "finance" of the women members, who do nine-tenths of the purchasing. If Free Trade remains primarily a consumer's question, it is pre-eminently a woman's question. Here, too, is a plain and an almost inevitable approach from co-operation into politics.

Still more important, however, is the greater new opportunity for the application of co-operative principles and practices afforded by the policy of rural reconstruction, to which the Liberal and Labor Parties are committed. The working of the Small Holdings Act, and of the policy associated with it, must be dependent for its efficacy upon the co-operation of local groups of agricultural and other village workers. For the use of agricultural machinery, for the purchase of seeds, manures, and foodstuffs, for dairy work, fruit preparation, and other subsidiary manufactures, and, above all, for transport and for marketing, they must learn the industrial and moral art of co-operation. Last, not least, the finance of the agricultural revival demands the establishment of people's credit banks, which, whether run upon a purely co-operative basis, like the Raiffeisen banks, or furnished with public capital, will demand for its safe and successful administration the spirit and the forms of co-operation among neighbours. The co-operative movement of this country cannot ignore these new dangers and opportunities opened up by the recent trend of politics and legislation, and alike in combating the one and utilising the other, it is likely to find itself gradually drawn more and more into politics, which, after all, in nations where free popular institutions prevail, are only themselves another branch of the great co-operative movement.

AN INVASION OF LIBERTY.

THERE is so much material for useful reform in the Prevention of Crime Bill that we regret the inevitable concentration of interest on one disputable feature of it. This is the provision which sets up the "indeterminate sentence." It is a new penal device, unknown to our law, and borrowed from the not entirely admirable prison system of the United States. We should be the more disposed to consider it favorably if it were not for the almost boisterous welcome it has received from the reactionary Press, and from upholders of the harshest forms of penal discipline like Sir Ralph Littler and Sir Robert Anderson. Men of this type are completely discredited among prison reformers. They have never assisted or believed in the ameliorating work of the last fifteen years, and at the back of their minds lies the vindictive, medieval theory of punishment against which that movement was directed. If, therefore, they applaud the "indeterminate sentence," it is because they see in it a concession to their own fixed belief about criminals as, to use a phrase of Sir Robert Anderson, "human beasts of prey." There is a kind of science which uses the same language and parades the same class of remedies. The "indeterminate sentence" seems to satisfy both these types of reactionists. It asserts the rights of society, and especially of property, against a class that appears to menace them. Plenty of "advanced" sociologists would condemn the habitual criminal to the lethal chamber. The "indeterminate sentence" may segregate him practically, though not nominally, for the term of his healthy natural life. That is a more expensive process, and is in the nature of a weak concession to humanitarianism. But it is on the right lines, and is capable of expansion.

Now, we do not deny that the case of the habitual offender, the regular recidivist, is a difficult one. Prison life does not reform him. He simply lives through his sentence, patient, cunning, outwardly well-behaved, but waiting all the while for the earliest chance to resume his hunting, preying life, full of excitement and interest. He goes from the hands of the police, and he goes back to them. They watch him, he them, and in this game of alternately finding and losing the criminal millions of public money are squandered. Can nothing be done to diminish this waste of energy and treasure? The plea would seem to be a strong one; but we have to point out that its very character throws discredit on the machinery of the indeterminate sentence. This is, in the main, a reversion to the old idea of repressing crime by way of increased severity of punishment. The history of the last century has completely destroyed this notion. Crimes and punishments have decreased together. The latter have become less severe and less prolonged, the former have diminished both in number and in seriousness. Moreover, we have long ago acknowledged the failure of our prison system to prevent recidivism. We admit, indeed, that, especially under the conditions that prevailed before the Gladstone Committee began its labors, it encourages crime; that it recruits the criminal classes. A prison is, at its best, a seemly, whitewashed sepulchre of men. It lacks the essential conditions of a true society, and therefore it can do little for the moral betterment of its inhabitants. For that reason we are resorting to all kinds of useful experiments not for putting people into prison, but for keeping them out of it, for enfeebling the prison taint and getting rid of the prison name and associations. Finally, we know that the tests of good conduct, under which prisoners earn a remission of sentences, are the most fallacious in the case of the habitual offender. It is easy for the old "lag" to fit himself into prison routine; and his adaptability is precisely the measure of his determination to resume his old life.

In the face of these considerations we see little hope of good from the "indeterminate sentence." It is, we must remember, an addition to the severity of punishments, and goes, therefore, directly against the spirit of reform. Already, in fact, though not in form, people are sentenced over and over again for the same offence. Their past is always up against them. This principle of cumulative sentence is now to be extended. In addition to the specific crime to which the judge affixes a specific penalty, a man is to be handed over to a body of officials who are to determine what further punishment and exile from society he shall bear because of the offences for which he has already been punished, and because of other offences that, in their opinion, he is likely to commit! Is it likely that Parliament will sanction so grave a departure from the principles of English law? As things stand, the liberty of citizens can only be restrained on fixed principles, for definite periods. But under the "indeterminate sentence" judge and jury surrender this power into the hands of irresponsible officials, who may exercise it according to their discretion, and with slight control from the Secretary of State, for as long as the prisoner's health and sanity last. What is this but a kind of modernised lettre de cachet? Doubtless there are limitations. Three convictions—for what?—must be proved, and also an addiction to a life of crime. The new prison, we are told, is to be not quite like the old prison, and the man or woman who may be condemned to spend the whole, or nearly the whole, of the remainder of a lifetime there is to be under the ward of committees, boards of visitors, and the like. The Home Secretary will finally determine whether or no there is "a reasonable probability" that the détenu will "abstain from crime and lead a useful and industrious life." But his decision must be based, in the main, on the reports of the "Directors of Convict Prisons." Are these gentlemen to be assigned the task of passing judgment on the moral strength and soundness of this class of prisoners, their ability to stand temptation, to stick to a trade, to keep clear of bad companionship? And, if so, how will they act? Either they will have to apply the utterly unreal test of hypocritical submissiveness to rules, or they will take the rough view that the bulk of recidivists are morally irreclaimable, and will treat them, and advise the Secretary of State to treat them, as life cases. Either line is objectionable. Prison officials are not moral reformers; they are interpreters of rules, often, by the nature of the case, hard and unimaginative interpreters of rules. They are peculiarly unfitted to exercise the delicate supervision of character which is essential to a moral judgment on others, the kind of judgment, let us say, which a good schoolmaster, or parson, is competent to wield. The true reformation of a man can only be wrought by one of his fellows who loves him and believes in him, and can thus accomplish the miracle of "conversion" that Hugo records in the story of the good Bishop and Jean Valjean.

As for law, it is, we doubt not, a very partial and feeble instrument of justice, but it has its rules and its restraints, above all, its atmosphere of publicity. But prisons, even reformed prisons, are dark places, and dark deeds have sometimes been done in them. Not the worst of men ought to have the ordering of practically the whole of his life on earth dependent on the will of prison officials and prison "visitors," however capable or well-meaning. Property might like to persuade itself that it was safe from burglars and forgers—which it never will be—and it would, no doubt, be convenient for society to shuffle on to "specialists" all responsibility for the future of the "habitual criminal," while the active causes of crime—poverty, over-crowding, the drink-shop, the ungoverned life of the slums, the wild passions and ill-directed impulses of men, not infrequently the cruelty and unfairness of the scheme of things as we have ordered it—proceed unchecked. But we hope that no democratic House of Commons will sanction so large a subtraction from the domain of law and so serious an invasion of the liberties of the subject. There is every reason for expanding the period of "conditional liberation" within the bounds of a definite sentence; but it seems to us to stretch the spirit of Habeas Corpus to call for the indefinite detention of a man without bringing a specific, definite charge against him.

Life and Letters.

"IN HIS BLINDNESS."

At Islington, in the midst of streets and other surroundings which we hope no poor heathen visitor will regard as the finest flower of Christianity, there is now on view an exhibition of mankind's efforts to comprehend the divine. It is called "The Orient," but is not specially Oriental, though the United States and most of the Western Hemisphere are excluded—we suppose as being already permeated by the same religious spirit as we may observe among ourselves and in the rest of Europe. On account of this familiarity, the London Missionary Society, which has organised the exhibition, has omitted representations of the religious forms that are considered the highest, but in other respects the development of the religious sense in man's various races and stages can be followed very completely. We are shown examples of almost every kind of worship, from savage belief, which sees spirit in almost everything, up to the Positivist forms, which can discover spirit almost nowhere. And the first thing one notices about all these varying attempts at religion is that they are not strictly historic in point of date, but at this moment co-exist upon the world's surface, as though to present us with the long history of man's thought in visible summary.

But one form of religion does not necessarily lead to another, and there is no reason to suppose that, if left to himself, the Ju-ju worshipper in his swamps would ever conceive the Allah of Mahomet. It appears that nothing is so slow to change as the religion of a race, and having once reached a certain stage of ritual, it abides. Unless some entirely different religion is imposed upon it, the race itself will change or disappear more quickly. There is the difficulty of treating religion as history, for we have no assurance that any particular form of it has passed through previous stages like the religions we see around us to-day. We can but vaguely place them in the order that seems to us most natural, and suppose that in the unrecorded ages of the past some few races of men have slowly risen from the worship of strange powers in stones or crocodiles up to the worship of an invisible but ever-present spirit, while other races of men remain prostrate before stones and crocodiles, seeking no more. The exhibition does not reveal the past history of religion so much as the present diversity of man's own spirit, and how rarely it cares to change.

The power in the stone, the filmy soul lurking in all things visible, the mysterious human bond of totem in emu or fish, the guardian angel in a greasy rag, the living or even imaginary frog that, hoisted on a pole, will awe a countryside—certainly these show diversity enough, no matter to what primitive stage of man you turn. The Zulu, who doubts of God, likes to have the snake of his father's soul curled upon his roof. Foxes, bears, and trees find worshippers, toys are dowered with mortality, and Juggernath is put to bed. The Chibokwe woman spreads meal before her wooden bird in hope that her childbirth may be eased; her husband stripes a toy canoe with red and black to please the fishing-spirit. Powers of evil must have their due; the goddess of Indian cholera receives her offering; and the small-pox image her coat of vermilion daub. For luck or vengeance the Congo man drives nails thick as quills upon a porcupine into his wooden god, lovers thrust pins into inhuman hearts, and Sister Helen melts her waxen man. Medicine men cry aloud for rain, and snuff crime upon the air as a dog smells blood. All night dark forms are now dancing in the moon, while the drum throbs to ecstasy, and antelope skulls glimmer upon their circle of sticks. Every morning in a million households Shiva beside his patient bull receives the offering of water, rice, and a green leaf or two, Vishnu's footprint is painted anew upon the forehead of his own, the schoolboy prays to the elephant god for wisdom in his examination, and Kali, dumbfounded at her husband's sacrifice, mercifully checks her carnage. In China the praying wheels are spinning round; the burning prayers ascend to the sky, mingling their smoke with burning gods; every day millions of her people wake to accept three contradictory religions, and once a year her Emperor mounts the triple Altar of Heaven and prostrates himself before the universe, alone in upper air.

What is it that perpetually drives mankind to such strange observances? What built Stonehenge, and fills the circles of our grass with elves and Little People? Or what set the Virgin's temple on the Acropolis, and heard the god's voice at Delphi, established Jove at the heart of empire, and secluded Mecca's black stone from unbelievers? It has been thought that the love of the dead sufficed, and that gods are but ghosts in the glory of recollection. No people of the world are so stony as to believe that the dead can die. In every land some All Saints' Day celebrates the passion of an inextinguishable yearning; the Chinaman launches his lantern on the water; the Hindu kindles the tiny lamps of Dewali along his window sills and threshold; the Christian lights his taper at the grave. Nor is it an unnatural study to peruse the sacred tablets of our parents' records, and to idealise the qualities that, having given us birth, became incorporate in our persons. Yet this passion in itself, strong though it is, can hardly support the full weight of man's religion. For the virtue of uncles fades like their sin, and, except for lords and Chinamen, few of us can penetrate beyond three generations of our ancestry.

The hope of our future reward, and of the retribution of others, is also named as an incentive to religious belief. If retribution once failed beyond the tomb, "who," cried the epigrammatist, "could now believe in gods?" And, certainly, there is consolation for humanity in this exhibition's pictures of the Buddhist hell, where greedy officials are clapped into cages, and incompetent doctors suffocate in choking sand, and those who disestablish churches squat ill at ease upon mountains of spears. All wish the full arc of life somewhere to be drawn, and did not an eternal justice otherwise subsist, mankind in his desire to rectify this muddle of existence might in natural course have invented it.

Yet we feel this also is but a thin and limited explanation of so profound a reality. There is a notable change come over our aspect of things, once so easily dismissed with talk of darkness and superstition. From Isaiah and Horace downward, it was a commonplace to sneer at the poor idol maker who warmed himself with one half of the log and of the other made a god. That sneer is obsolete now—as obsolete as the condemnation of "the heathen" in vague, black lumps and parcels of humanity predestined to blindness and destruction. In that fetish of greasy rag, or that staring idol with protruded tongue, we no longer denounce the work of the Evil One, but behind the hideousness and absurdity we perceive some poignant attempt of the human soul to express something beyond itself, some idea for which it can find no adequate expression in form, something which it can hardly yet conceive even in thought. To fix this idea, to present it more clearly before herself, the soul must be content with that symbol, however hideous and absurd. It is the idea that counts—the search for something not to be found within the world's flaming walls. "Behold, I go forward," said Job, "but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him." The Luvale Bantu searching for his symbol of the spirit is in like case. "Lift the stone, and thou shalt find me," answers the new-found Logion; "cleave the wood, and there I am." It is always the same search, always a foreboding of spiritual power not far removed, a haunting belief that all these transitory things are but symbols of a glory that may possibly be revealed.

If we must search for the origins of religion, whether childlike, grotesque, or ennobling, it is here we should look for them—here in the dim region where Wordsworth found,

> "Those obstinate questionings
> Of sense and outward things,
> Fallings from us, vanishings;
> Blank misgivings of a Creature
> Moving about in worlds not realised."

It is a recognition of these faint origins, with all the pathos of their failure, and all the splendour of the distinction they confer upon man, which has produced so remarkable a change in our attitude towards religious forms, and even in our missionary methods. When a missionary doctor now finds a medicine man plastering a fever patient with chewed leaves, painting him with red ochre, and spitting a preparation of maize and ashes into the nose and mouth, he no longer calls him fool or murderer; but he says, "You are doing your best, and yet perhaps I know a better way." And if anyone knows a better way among the obstinate mysteries of the spirit, it is thus he will teach it now.

DEMOCRACY AND THE EXPERT.

It is rare to find a working politician in this country able and willing to instruct the people in the meaning and method of his necessarily tortuous proceedings. For few politicians profess any sort of political philosophy, or care to consume time in studying the rules which regulate their craft. These considerations give real importance to the careful essay upon "The Necessary Basis of Society," in which Mr. Sidney Webb sets forth those working principles of social reform which seem to him to explain and justify the course of governmental development to which all modern enlightened States are committing themselves. For Mr. Webb is at once a political philosopher, with a rare equipment of historical knowledge, and a skilled practitioner in the arts of administration, and he has done more than any other man in this country to realise the policy which is here described by the term, "A National Minimum." The general contents of this policy have won, or are winning, a piecemeal acceptance among all persons of goodwill and liberal disposition in this nation, irrespective of party attachment. That the continuance of widespread poverty, with its accompanying ignorance, disease, and vice, is inconsistent with civilisation, and that the State must play a large and a growing part in the extirpation of these social evils is doctrine common to Liberals, Conservatives, and Socialists. Even the passage from the intellectual and moral acceptance of this broad principle to the middle axioms of social policy contained in the National Minimum will be refused by comparatively few among those who seriously concern themselves with social reform. That sweating trades which impose starvation wages, casual employment, excessive hours of labour and insanitary conditions, upon bodies of helpless workers, shall be forced up to a standard of decency by the strong arm of Government, is generally agreed, and though keen controversies wage round the efficacy of the proposed methods of interference, the ancient notion, that such evils are inherent in the beneficent working of industrial competition, and should be left to the slow process of extinction involved in such competition, has almost entirely disappeared.

It is true that all modes and objects of interference are not equally popular. Of the four chief heads of Mr. Webb's National Minimum—subsistence, leisure, sanitation, education—popular opinion is prepared to give the State a freer hand in dealing with the two latter than the two former. This is partly due to a clearer realisation of the fact that disease and ignorance involve dangers to society, partly to the recognition that an effective public guarantee of subsistence and leisure requires large and undefined modifications of individual control of industry and property. But even in this direction the change of public opinion within recent years has been remarkable. The treatment accorded by all political parties towards employers' liability, shorter hours, and anti-sweating measures, implies not merely an abandonment of old ideas as to limits of State action, but a definite acceptance of the social gospel of levelling up. Timid souls who, though not caring or daring to resist such potent tendencies, harbour fears lest they may be swept down a smooth current into the maelstrom of Socialism, are treated with soothing words by Mr. Webb, who assures them that they need not feel alarmed, because his minimum is "a necessary condition even of an individualist State." But most of those who understand the magnitude and multifarious nature of the actual State control involved in the enforcement of a minimum of public health and education, to say nothing of the drastic policy involved in protective measures against sweating, will think it fairer to admit that the old individualist State has been weighed and found wanting, and that we are committed to a more Socialistic conception of national life.

But for those who accept as correct this interpretation of our modern political forces, Mr. Webb's article raises another issue of supreme importance. Throughout the modern democratic movement two fears have haunted the imagination of the upper classes. One is that democracy implies government by the mob, another that it would interpret "equality" by a rude levelling policy, a common treatment by the common people. The twentieth century, according to Mr. Webb, repudiates the rude early improvisations of nineteenth century democracy which gave ground for these fears. The modern State, armed with its national minimum, will no longer realise itself in education through "common schools," in which children of all sorts and ages were put through the same rough groove, in an almost indiscriminate poor-law, or the clumsy mechanism of our prison system. The keynote of the new State is specialisation, for "it is upon the specialised scientific treatment of minorities—often of quite small minorities—that social well-being depends." Such a State must be made competent to apply the doctrine of a minimum wage to the ever fluctuating details of each branch of every trade, with allowances for the circumstances of individual workers: its schools must be finely equipped psycho-physical laboratories, closely correlated to a department of industrial survey, and a similar delicacy must pervade its system of public hygiene.

This means, of course, that the real power of government must be wielded by experts, members of an elaborate bureaucracy. Now, though expertism and the high degree of specialisation it usually involves, are exposed to certain familiar dangers, no one can deny that a State, which is to get laws well administered, must use carefully chosen, well-trained, and experienced men, holding secure posts, and endowed with considerable authority and discretion in the performance of their functions. But, if public machinery becomes as elaborate as this specialised scientific treatment seems to imply, will the people retain any real hold upon the State and be able to watch, check, or control, in any adequate way, the operations of the governmental machinery? This is, to our mind, the crux of modern democracy, and we do not perceive either in this utterance of Mr. Webb, or in other utterances of the school of politics to which he belongs, any recognition of this danger, or any suggestion of a feasible safeguard. Mr. Webb still speaks as a democrat, but he does not suggest any provisions by which popular opinion or the general will shall retain the true "sovereignty" and exercise a sufficient control over the "expert." Officials secure of their posts, sitting in the remote recesses of an intricate system, even when chosen for special abilities, tend to become arbitrary, slow, mechanical, unduly conservative, and not infrequently corrupt. Unless the method of government furnishes some preventive or remedy, the specialised scientific treatment will become an oppressive sham, and in the name of democracy we shall have set up a new oligarchy, the more dangerous because the forms of representative democracy will be used to establish and maintain it.

That it is the business of able men to get somehow into positions of power and responsibility, and to use their superior trained faculties for the benefit of the public by framing laws, engineering them through legislatures, and administering them as they think best, even where such measures are opposed to the wishes or the current judgment of the people, has always been a tempting idea to certain types of temperament. It is conceivable that the forms of popular self-government can be so manipulated by knots of clever men as to enable such a bureaucracy to establish itself; but there is ample testimony of history to support the conviction that such power would generate the gravest possible abuses. Believers in democracy are not willing to commit themselves to a machinery of government too elaborate for popular control. For they recognise that the voluntary goodwill of self-controlled officials, as a motor power of government, is a very poor substitute for the will of the people. Now we have a suspicion, which we trust may be unfounded, that Mr. Webb and his friends do not really believe in "the will of the people" as the true source of governmental power: if it is for them a force at all, it is only as so much fuel to be utilised by the superior wills of a virtually self-appointed aristocracy of talent.

But in truth the consideration of the moral driving power of government is scarcely touched by Mr. Webb. The problem seems to him almost wholly one of intellect and tactics. "Legislation and governmental administration become in all highly-organised communities—however democratic they may be—more and more the business of elaborately trained experts, and less and less the immediate outcome of popular feeling." But is the alternative suggested here a true one? Surely not. The system of representative government is designed, on the one hand, as a check upon this immediacy of popular feeling, upon the other as a check upon officialism; and elsewhere, we believe, Mr. Webb has suggested that a type of person styled the "expert representative" may be able to safeguard the public against abuses of officialism. But is this safeguard other than a merely verbal one? In a reformed society, where we may presume every man must work for his living, it would appear as if our "expert representatives" could be none other than elderly retired officials, a very valuable class doubtless, but hardly a sufficient channel for the motive power of democracy, either as an inspiration, or as a check upon the system which has moulded them. The issue we consider an extremely grave one. All of us are for efficiency, most of us for the national minimum "below which the individual, whether he likes it or not, cannot in the interests of the well-being of the whole, ever be allowed to fall." But before we give our full consent to the elaboration of the official machinery required to compass this end, we desire to understand more clearly how the motor power is to be generated, and in what ways the principles of government by the people are to be secured.

THE MIDSUMMER TROUT.

Some anglers think that trout, in common with flowers and song birds, are at their best in spring. Of such was a young lady who said to the present writer, just arrived in the Highlands and anxious to go out on a loch, "Oh, yes, we'll go; but the fishing is now over for the year." As June was still young, this astonished one; but the lady held to her opinion. The gamekeeper, she said, had told her that trout-fishing ended with May. Her belief prevails in quarters where you would least expect it. Only a few days ago a trader in tackle, in whose shop we were seeking flies, said, as he set out his cases, "Of course, there's very little use trying the river now." He was an angler, too! Was there warrant for his depressing view? Well, there was a little. Just as the flower garden becomes dowdy and the birds become silent before Midsummer Day, the trout in many places become languorous by the same time. This is particularly noticeable, and particularly explicable, on waters that have the Mayfly. After their fortnight's feeding on that most relished of all things in their fare, the fish seem to be out of appetite for a time. Besides, the languor overtakes many a water which is without the Mayfly. There also it becomes difficult to pile up a basket such as will cheer the heart of reasonably exacting man. To be sure, there are exceptions to this rule, exceptions so noteworthy that we must be cautious in our generalising. Think, for example, of Lochleven, which, after a long series of tame seasons, is in this very month of June rejoicing its frequenters by sport so good as to make the best of the old-time records comparatively modest. Recently it has been not unusual to hear of well-nigh a thousand trout caught, by never more than forty-four anglers, on this wonderful lake in a day. Then, no angler in Hampshire, a region of famous streams, ever refrains from expecting fair sport even in July or in August. This fact, well based upon experience, is strange: one would naturally expect the trout of Hampshire, where summer is early, excessive, and prolonged, to be specially afflicted with langour. Nevertheless, one does not deny that there is cause for the impression of our young lady, the gamekeeper, the tackle-dealer, and many others. On two waters out of each three, or thereby, sport with the trout certainly does fall off just when the early flowers are fading and the birds are ceasing to sing.

What is the meaning of this? Before endeavouring to show what it is, let us perceive what it is not. The phenomena in the trout waters have nothing to do with the vernal influence that produces the gentler iris and affects the young man's fancy. Spring is love-time with the birds and the flowers; but it is not so with the trout. It is in autumn that these have their season of amour. By May the impulse which flourishes into splendour in the flower garden, and into music in the copses, is long past in the haunts of the trout, and it does not begin to stir again until September is well advanced. Thus, we must not seek consolation for our empty or ill-plenished creels in thoughts of a scientifically emotional kind. Mr. Watson is a great poet, an illuminating interpreter of the reign of law, a seer; but he is not quite correct in saying that in May half of the world a bridegroom is and half of the world a bride. It is no bridal glee that makes the trout sportful in May. It is sheer gluttony. Before the starling and the nightingale are hushed, the trout are gorged. That is why, in effect, they say to the angler, "Owing to the pressure of other matter, we are obliged to decline your contribution." They cannot well hold any more. They are even unable to accept the offerings of what may be called the regular staff, Nature. You shall see this for yourself if you look upon a stream. There go, fluttering or floating down, alders, black spinners, grey gnats, oak flies, Welshman's buttons, sedge flies, willow flies, and other insects, too many to be named; and not one in a thousand is taken. Here again, however, we must beware of generalising. In fact, we must seem to contradict ourselves. That is not our fault. It is because the Trout is as slippery a customer as a Tariff Reformer forswearing taxes on foodstuffs. His inwardness is not to be caught at a glance. It is true that he is gorged; but it is necessary to discriminate. He cannot take many more flies; but there is something for which he will eagerly endeavour to find space. That is a worm, small and daintily pink or purple. Do you ask us why this appeals to him? If so, think why it is that we Britons, who would not for a high fee eat the roe of our own salmon, fall to whenever that of the Russian sturgeon is on the table. We take the caviare because it is ill to come by. It is for the same reason that the trout at midsummer takes a worm. At that time of the year worms are well down in the soil, which near the surface is too dry to be comfortable; thus there are few, if any, washed into the streams in the process of Nature. The one which you yourself offer is probably the only worm within a mile. It has the attractiveness of things exotic.

If you ply that worm skilfully, you shall have no cause to complain that the trout are languid. The condition is not easily fulfilled. A fly, or two flies, or even three, can be cast so far that, using ordinary caution, you do not come within the range of vision of the fish; but if you toss a worm as sharply as you cast a fly, the bait will leave the hook. Hook, observe! We recommend a single hook, and that small, instead of a Stewart tackle, which is a flight of three hooks. It leaves the lure comparatively untrammelled, and therefore the more effective. Deftly dropped near where a trout is lying, a worm at this time of the year, unless a thunderstorm is coming, will as a rule be rushed at.

We are old-fashioned enough, as they would say in the "Quarterly Review," either the blue or the buff, to be joyful at that great moment. Worm-fishing is tabooed on many streams; but we cannot approve the objection. A nibble at a worm is at least as exciting as a rise at a fly. The rise is over and done with, one way or the other, in less than a second; but the nibble may go on for four or five seconds, and each of these is as a thrilling minute. Is the trout a fingerling or a five-pounder? When, O when, should we strike? We know not; nobody knows! Occasionally the trout is only chiveying the worm, which is not within his lips for more than a small fraction of a second at a time; in that case the success or the failure of the strike is accidental. Occasionally the worm has been seized; in that case the strike, though again on chance, will, if in time, be effective. The great question is that of timing, and it is not soluble on any scientific principle. In fly-fishing you strike whenever you see or feel a rise; in worm-fishing your mind is rent in a conflict between anxiety not to be too quick and dread lest you should be too cautious. That is to say, the inhibitory nerves and the other set, the name of which we forget, are in full blast at the same time. This is moral and intellectual discipline of a beneficent kind. It is so clearly good that we do not bang and bolt the door against reconsideration of certain anti-sport philosophies to which, for the sake of fair play, an airing has now and then been given in these pages. All men in sound health have a natural liking for the bow and spear, or other weapon of the chase; and what all sane men feel to be natural no man can with assurance denounce as perverse. . . . Meanwhile, since we took to the worm, our basket has been filling; and what is this we see? The sun has set, and the breeze has dropped, and the stream is aboil with rises! Have we once more to go back upon the track of our assertions? Indeed we have! Though at the high noon of summer the trout are indifferent towards flies in daytime, always, when the atmosphere is fresh, they rise uncommonly well between sunset and midnight. In fact, they rise as briskly throughout these hours as they do at mid-day in April. What, then, on analysis of the belief of our young lady and the gamekeeper and the tackle-dealer, do we find to be the truth? Only that during the hours of sunshine the trout tend to ignore flies between the close of spring and the first flood in August. That is a frail basis on which to assume that the season ended with May. Why, Midsummer Night is near, and our basket is packed to the brim!

Present-Day Problems.

THE PROSPECTS OF THE TERRITORIAL FORCE.

By a Territorial Officer.

A profoundly interesting problem is being worked out in the recruiting for the Territorial Force. It is the whole problem of the citizen army. Can we secure men enough, under the voluntary system, to defend the United Kingdom? The question is one of quality even more than of numbers, though public attention is fixed just now on the latter alone. If Mr. Haldane's proposals prove inadequate, or can by any means be made to appear so, the believers in conscription will be supplied with a powerful weapon, and a vigorous Press agitation, especially if aided by a war scare, may easily bring compulsory service into the sphere of practical politics. Indeed, there are many who are looking forward eagerly to the failure of the new scheme, and make no attempt to disguise their hopes.

To these the comparative smallness of the numbers who have hitherto joined the Territorial Force is, of course, a cause of rejoicing, and they are making the most of it. The period within which "old soldiers"—i.e., the existing Volunteers and Yeomen—may enlist for a shorter service than the four years which will be demanded in future, comes to an end on June 30th. After that date a great effort will probably be made by the advocates of conscription to prove that the whole voluntary system has broken down. It is extremely important to anticipate this effort, and to inquire dispassionately what is happening, and what is likely to happen. My contention is, in brief, that whatever the answer to the problem may be, that answer will not be finally given on June 30th, nor for (at least) two years to come, and that the prospects of the Force are, all things considered, distinctly favorable.

The total establishment laid down is, roughly, 301,000. Only 144,000, however, or rather less than 50 per cent, had enlisted on June 1st. Of these about 94,000 were Infantry, 19,000 Artillery, and 17,000 Yeomanry. The remainder were composed thus:—Engineers, 7,423; Medical Corps, 5,019; and Army Service Corps, 1,571. The Yeomanry, the cavalry of the new force, shows the best record; out of the 56 "units" which it is proposed to raise, 52 are already "recognised"—i.e., the authorities have satisfied themselves that a sufficient number of men will be recruited to justify the separate existence of the regiment.

The results have not differed much in the various parts of the country. The Lancashire district stands highest, with 55 per cent. of the establishment already secured, and London and the Home Counties stand lowest, with 37 per cent. and 38 per cent. respectively. The military correspondent of the "Times" attributes the low figures in and about London to the disparaging attitude of the London Press towards the Haldane scheme. This is not the first time that the London Press has proved itself to be far from representative of the country as a whole.

Many things have to be considered before these figures are taken as a sign of failure. In the first place, the "establishment" of 301,000 is a purely imaginary figure. It represents what Mr. Haldane expected to get, what he thought desirable, what was supposed to be "needed"—a word which covers an abyss of unsettled controversy. And it takes no account of quality—a much more important question than numbers. Apart from this fact, it is obvious to those who have any experience of volunteering that any Minister who attempts to reconstruct, or to reorganise, a voluntary army, must expect a great temporary fall in numbers. Soldiers—even voluntary soldiers—are intensely conservative in all that concerns their conditions of service. The change of a few buttons will knock off a certain percentage of men. New conditions always look formidable on paper. Many volunteers are waiting for the last moment before they make up their minds to rejoin; but a still larger number will not rejoin this year at all; they will wait until they see how the new regulations work out at the next camp, and whether there is any difference in the drills during the forthcoming year. If they hear a good report from the bolder spirits who have stuck to the work, they will rejoin for the requisite four years, instead of rejoining now for one year.

The chief reason given for this hesitation is the fear that the pay, or the food, will be less good, and that heavier fines will be imposed in case of non-attendance at camp, or leaving the force before the expiry of the enlistment period. Behind this, there is a vague fear that the element of compulsion is going to be gradually increased. As a matter of fact, it is not expected that any substantial difference will be found, as regards pay or messing, either in the Volunteers or Yeomanry, though an experienced volunteer officer tells me that it is possible that the few pence hitherto given in his corps as "beer-money" will have to be reduced. The question depends on calculations too minute to be entered into here, and the answer will vary with different corps. As to the fines, the trouble arises simply from the fact that a maximum figure—£5—is mentioned in the regulations. Probably the fines will generally be as small as before, though it is to be expected, and, indeed, to be hoped, that somewhat less laxity will be allowed in escaping the obligations of annual training and drill.

As for the men who are giving up service and not likely to re-enlist, it is probable that the Territorial Force will be very much the better for their absence. They are the men who were never interested in their work, who looked upon the camp as a mere holiday, and objected to the necessary restraints. They are taking the new conditions as an excuse for leaving a service which has become irksome. Such men may spoil the work of a whole company or squadron by their slackness, and even if their places were not filled, good rather than harm would result from their departure.

One cause of the comparative smallness of the strength at present reached by the new force remains to be mentioned—namely, the indifference of many commanding officers to its success. The talk of the officers' messes is critical or hostile, and it cannot but be reflected to some extent in their attitude towards the problem of recruiting. All things considered, the actual efforts made by them have been commendable; but many of them cannot forget that the scheme is the work of a hated Liberal Government; and speeches expressing the hope that the scheme will succeed, coupled with "grave doubts," are likely to have a somewhat chilling effect on the intending recruit. A little more trouble in explaining uncertainties as to the term of enlistment, or the length of camp, and in exploding some of the absurd rumours which have gained currency among the rank and file, might have made a considerable difference.

Time, however, and especially time for seeing how the new regulations work out in practice, is what is chiefly needed. The attractiveness of the scheme lies in the sense it gives to the volunteer of being part of a real army. His force is no longer an unorganised mass, mainly composed of infantry, without transport or any of the minor branches which are essential to an army. It is capable of being put into the field; it has definitely recognised duties. All this appeals to the man who thinks, and it should result in attracting such men in larger numbers than before. It is an appeal which, in the nature of things, works slowly. But one of the most favorable features of the present situation is the enlistment, in the month of May alone, of nearly 9,500 new recruits—men with no previous service in the auxiliary forces.

Two ideals are in conflict. The conscriptionists fix their attention on numbers. To them the officer is everything; the private is mere "material." Supply so many privates or troopers, and they can be "worked up" into an army. It is by this test of numbers alone that they are prepared to judge the Territorial Force. The opposite view is that which attaches importance to the character of the rank and file. There is all the difference in the world between the man who comes with an interest in his work, intending to do it well, anxious for information, and the man who must have everything dinned into his head, and who tries to get through his duties with the minimum of trouble. Under compulsory service, every regiment will contain enough incorrigibly stupid men to hamper its movements and lower its standard. The Territorial Force offers to the nation an opportunity of securing a citizen army, small indeed, but of high quality and setting a high example. There is every prospect that the opportunity will be taken.

Art.

THE ENTENTE IN FINE ART.

The long delay in opening the Fine Art Palace at the Franco-British Exhibition served at least one useful purpose. It stimulated the public appetite for a display that had promised from the first to be unique, with the result that when at last the building was opened to view, visitors to the Exhibition flocked thereto with a vastly increased curiosity to see what it might contain. To this extent circumstances have favored the popular appreciation and serious study of what is, in truth, a very remarkable collection of the art of two nations. As for the authorities, they had an excuse for not being up to time. Their calculations had been upset—as they carefully explain on a typewritten sheet posted within the doors—by the failure of a part of the structure to satisfy the requirements of the London County Council. In consequence of this, and of the mildly romantic engineering difficulties that ensued, the opening was postponed till the Royal visit on May 26th. No explanation of why the Palace was not ready for its Fine Art could be simpler or more convincing. But what is not quite so clear is why, the Palace having been completed, some of the Fine Art was found to be not ready for its Palace. Up to Saturday week, when the latter had been open for the best part of a week, there were still exhibits that had not arrived. There were still items arranged for by the Fine Art Committee which, having waited some weeks for admission, had seemingly been compelled to wait a little longer. We do not know what the non-arrivals consist of; nor should we have gathered from appearances that anything was missing, had not one of the always courteous attendants informed us of the fact in explanation of a much more inconvenient fact, namely, the absence of a printed catalogue.

Yet no catalogue is needed to enable one to perceive one or two of the outstanding truths about this joint exhibition. The first, and the most important perhaps, of these truths is that in regard to the fine arts the entente between English and French is not based on artistic sympathy. There is, in point of fact, an antagonism between the two sections; the respective countries are separated by a far more definite boundary than the imaginary line that divides them within the Palace walls. Whistler said that there was no such thing as a national art, but here we get a refutation of the saying, an ocular demonstration, more potent than many written words, of the Frenchness of the French section and the Britishness of our own. The distinction between the two is perchance accentuated by the Committee's choice of pictures to represent our national art. The Committee, while making on the whole a catholic selection, have laid particular stress, especially in regard to the work of fifty years ago, on pictures that have remained popular with English people and, what is more, have done so by reason of their peculiarly English character. There is Frith's "Derby Day"; there is Landseer's "Monarch of the Glen"; there is Millais' "Autumn Leaves"; Burne-Jones's "Golden Stairs," and other works by earlier and poetical pre-Raphaelites recall a movement that with all its foreign elements remained in its essentials an almost pathetically English one; there is Fred Walker's "The Plough"; the flower of Victorian portraiture wafts to us its fragrance in Watts's "Tennyson," and that wonderful picture of Lord Beaconsfield which Millais evolved, out of three sittings only, just before the statesman died. The appeal of these and of Ford Madox Brown's "Work," of J. F. Lewis's "Harem of the Bey," of Professor Herkomer's "Last Muster," and of Sir L. Alma-Tadema's "Under the Roof of Blue Ionian Weather," is an appeal that varies its degree of power and nobility with individual examples; but, on the whole, it is essentially one that is aimed at English sentiment. So with the Turners of importance; the famous "Mercury," and the three sober-tinted water-colors that hang together in one gallery all belong to a period anterior to that in which the artist became less of an Englishman and more of a genius of light. And what, to follow the chain of evidence still further back, could be more definitely English than Gainsborough's "Blue Boy" and Romney's "Lady Hamilton"? Students of contemporary British painting—for when we come to latter-day art, there is more need to say British and not English—will probably point to the work of certain distinguished artists of the advanced schools, and ask whether this is not evidence that British painting is not drawing nearer to that across the Channel. But such a rapprochement, the reality of which we grant, is no more than fractional, and, according to the most generous estimate, hardly represents one-fifth of the artistic output of this country, as revealed by the too many picture galleries through which it filters. And even if during the last quarter century many British painters have essayed to paint like Frenchmen, and some Frenchmen like Englishmen, the circumstance is nothing new. The interchange of styles and influence has been in progress since the eighteenth century; the history of Art in the nineteenth, so far as it relates to France and England, is that of the action and reaction of the one school upon the other. Constable and the French Romantics, the French Impressionists, and the modern British landscape painters, are connected by an artistic relationship that admits of no question as to its reality. But the character of that relationship equally admits of no doubt but that the artistic affinity between the two nations always did, and always will, stop short of completeness. Anglo-Saxon never was and never will be Latin.

The two partners in the present combination, housed as they are on opposite sides of the same building, help one to analyse the perpetual difference between them. Briefly, it would appear to be the difference between self-consciousness and its antithesis. British Art is profoundly self-conscious. It has been said that the British painter studies public opinion and hesitates to flout it, conceiving that opinion to be inevitably different from his own. Whether it is so in fact or not, does not signify; the feeling that public opinion is ever by his side, watching him, a relentless critic, controls his progress by rules of caution and maxims of timidity; he is, indeed, a mild sort of monomaniac beset by an abiding habit of circumspection. The Frenchman, on the other hand, cares not a rap for his public, since he assumes its capacity to understand him in whatever he does. He thus works unhampered by the consciousness that he may be misinterpreted; the world of Art is to him a free pasturage over which he enjoys his share of the common rights, with perfect liberty to use them as he pleases. Consequently his painting and sculpture have a freedom which those of his neighbour have not, and for this freedom he has made a word, and the word is flair. Of course, he has the defects of his qualities; he often runs his liberty to its extreme, the name of which is licence; but on the whole his flair renders his art joyous and enjoyable, even by those who would not care to possess it in their own work. There are other points of difference, less general but not insignificant, to be observed between the French and British sections of the Fine Art Palace. The French canvases are fewer in number, but the size of works like M. Détaille's "Les Victimes du Devoir" make the achievement even of Professor Herkomer's Council picture in the Academy seem very small indeed. In the British section there is nothing of this monumental character; and, owing perhaps to familiarity with a large proportion of the exhibits, the whole section strikes one as less interesting. The dramatic painters supply nothing as poignant as M. Friant's "La Douleur," the fanciful painters nothing as weird as Willette's huge fantasy of modern vice, the chromatic painters nothing as powerful as Monet's haystacks. Then we find Bastien-Lepage's "Les Foins," at once blunt plein air realism and subtle mysticism; one exquisite portrait head by Fantin; two portraits by M. Jules Lefébvre, triumphs of naturalistic details, exquisitely painted, and welded into a marvellously compelling unity; the queer, quaint platitude painters of the mid-century, Cabanel and Dubufe, and M. Bouguereau, the living follower of their tradition. We can mention no more, but the interest of the French section is certainly the more vital of the two. Yet so far as representative character is concerned, the British part is superior by a long way and, except in the matter of the catalogue, the Fine Art Committee appear to have carried out their scheme with the conscientious desire to omit nothing of importance. There has never been a finer opportunity for studying the history and significance of British art from Sir Joshua to Mr. Sargent.

Letters to the Editor.

DOES THE SUGAR CONVENTION BETRAY FREE TRADE?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A letter to which the signature, "Free Trader," is affixed, is usually gratifying to me, but the correspondent who writes to you under that name in your issue of June 6th, and who complains that I have not dealt with the terms on which the Government has renewed the Sugar Convention, has, I fear, no very clear understanding of the system of Free Trade which he admires.

Were he a thorough Free Trader, he could not advance either of the two arguments which he uses in defence of the renewal of the Sugar Convention.

He says, firstly: "Our refusal to renew would not have modified the policy of the other contracting Powers; Germany could equally have put pressure on Russia."

This is the argument of the Retaliators; consistent Free Traders should have nothing to do with the action of other Powers, so long as they themselves keep open ports, and do not allow themselves to be parties to any limitation of the sources of their own supply.

That being the creed of Free Traders, it is quite unnecessary to argue further on that point; but, nevertheless, I should like to ask "Free Trader" and Sir Edward Grey, who used the same argument, how Germany could have put pressure on Russia, if we had stood out of the Convention, and thus assured to Russia a free market for all the sugar she might wish to send us. If it is alleged that the other contracting Powers would under those circumstances have gone back to the old system of bounties, and by so doing have exported sugar so cheaply that Russia could not have been able to compete with them in our market, what a boon that would have been to the sugar consumers and refiners in Great Britain!

But the other contracting Powers evidently did not care to do this, and relied upon Great Britain's assistance to coerce Russia. If this was not so, and if they could have coerced Russia without us, why were they so insistent that we should come into the renewal, even to the extent, as we were informed by Sir Edward Grey, of causing "unfavorable friction" if we refused? These two arguments, that they could do without us, and that we were necessary to them, contradict each other.

"Free Trader's" second point is:—"By the new clause we provide a simple machinery for the admission of our refined sugar goods into the territories of the other contracting Powers if those goods are not made from bounty-fed raw material."

Now the fact of our being a party to the prohibition by the contracting States of our refined sugar goods, if made from bounty-fed raw material, constitutes us indirectly a party to the exclusion of bounty-fed raw material into this country, which again transgresses against Free Trade. Besides, if we had nothing whatever to do with the Convention, the contracting Powers could not prohibit our refined sugar goods, or raise the tariff on them higher than on corresponding goods from other countries without violating the most-favored nation clause, a proceeding which Sir Edward Grey admitted had never yet been done. It is hardly likely either that the contracting Powers, who naturally wish to sell to us as much raw sugar as possible, would put such prohibitive duties on our refined sugar goods as to lessen our manufacture of them and, consequently, reduce our demand from the contracting Powers for their own raw sugar, out of which these goods are made.

I am sorry to shake "Free Trader" in his optimism, but I think he would have suffered a greater shock had he heard Sir Edward Grey, on Wednesday last, advancing, in support of the renewal of the Sugar Convention, all the arguments of the Protectionists and Retaliators to the cheers of Protectionist politicians on the opposite benches.

As I listened I had to pinch myself to make sure that I was not dreaming, and that these doctrines were really being proclaimed by a Liberal Free Trade Minister.

I can assure "Free Trader" that there were many in the House that day who did not share his sense of security, and who were anxious to voice their individual protests had they had the opportunity.

This, however, the Speaker could not give them, as he knew that there was another important subject to be discussed in the short time remaining.

The matter, however, will not be allowed to remain where it is, as Free Traders feel that this renewal not only betrays their most cherished principles, but threatens the Liberal Party's safety at the General Election.—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST VILLIERS.

THE PROBLEM OF RURAL HOUSING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In my article of last week on this subject I urged that the system of "part time" officers, under which private interest and public duty must almost inevitably collide, was largely responsible for the deplorable housing conditions of many rural districts. May I give some particulars of a case just brought to my notice, which illustrates some at least of the disadvantages incidental to this system?

The main facts are very simple. The Housing Committee of the Birmingham Corporation had applied to the magistrates for a closing order in respect of some houses in Birmingham, which the Committee believed to be unfit for human habitation. The chief witness called for the defence was the Medical Officer of Health of the North Bromsgrove District Council, who was, as he explained, "a personal friend" of the owner of the houses; and, acting partly upon his evidence, the magistrates dismissed the case. Subsequently this medical officer wrote to the local papers criticising what he asserted to be "the indiscreet way in which the officers of the Corporation had proceeded."

At the next meeting of the North Bromsgrove District Council, a letter was read from the Town Clerk of Birmingham, asking whether it was with the knowledge and approval of the District Council that their medical officer had acted, and suggesting that "in ordinary circumstances it is undesirable that one sanitary authority should be opposed in their work by the officers of another sanitary authority." In the discussion which followed (as reported in the local papers of June 6th), this opinion seems to have been generally agreed to. All the councillors who spoke, and even the medical officer himself, admitted the inconvenience of the practice; but it was pointed out by the Chairman that their medical officer was not the whole time officer of the Council, "nor could they expect him to be so at a salary of £30 a year," and that what he did with his spare time was practically his own affair. Moreover, it was stated that this practice, if undesirable, was the universal custom of the neighbourhood; that there was "hardly a case fought out in the Courts but a medical officer appeared on both sides"; and a case was quoted in which the medical officer of the district—whose action was now in question—had himself applied for a closing order, and the Chairman of the North Bromsgrove Council had been responsible for bringing another medical officer to give evidence on the other side, with the result that "in that case also the local medical man was beaten." Replying to the Chairman, Dr. Kidd said he would be prepared to undertake to ask the consent of the Council in future; but if there was a chance of giving evidence in the High Court at a fifty guinea fee he hoped the Council would not object. (Laughter.)

That is the report as given by the local paper. The discussion appears to have been perfectly good-humored; and it is unnecessary to call in question the merits of this particular case. But surely it is obvious that while this kind of practice continues, and the medical officer of one authority can always be relied on to counteract by his evidence the case brought by the medical officer of another, the administration of the Housing Law will never be a very serious matter.

And yet the new Housing Bill, introduced mainly to meet the rural difficulties, leaves this part-time system practically untouched.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP MORRELL.

EXPERIMENTS ON ANIMALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his letter appearing in your issue of last week Mr. Stephen Paget again seeks to confuse the issue by once more basing his general defence of vivisection upon false logic.

Because, from my own personal experience, as well as from the evidence of statistics, I dare not refuse the incalculable benefit of the diphtheria anti-toxin, he would claim that physiologists are to be justified in all they do. It is as if he were to argue that because he eats mutton, which does not involve cruelty, he therefore scorns cruelty in any form. Then he proceeds to vilify the anti-vivisectionists because I have admitted that they are sometimes inaccurate.

He reminds me of a schoolfellow who, having earned a thrashing from the headmaster, proceeded to justify himself by advising the whole school that the other boy had been severely admonished, thereby claiming that the latter was the real sinner.

Because, Sir, the anti-vivisectionists use means of fighting that are unsportsmanlike, it does not follow that their cause is not good. And they are to be pardoned, because their ignorance of technical knowledge makes it almost impossible for them to be accurate. In their principles they are absolutely justified in the brave warfare they have aroused. In the results of their fighting they are also justified; but for the anti-vivisectionists, there had been no legal restraint whatever put upon the physiologists.

And yet the danger to the physiologist himself is so great in legalising his experiments, and the horrors that are perpetrated in the name of science are so awful, that I trust the bulk of the public will always be anti-vivisectionists. Nor can I myself blame them for using brickbats and soft-nose bullets.

Mr. Paget offers to supply literature on the subject to the public. May I warn them that by suppressing all unfavorable information the leaflets of the Research Defence Society, so far as they propose to answer the charge against the anti-vivisectionists, are in spirit, if not in word, untruthful?—Yours, &c.,

VOTES FOR WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I trust that Miss Nancy Lightman is entitled to speak for her sister Suffragettes and the more militant section of the claimants for female suffrage, as she has cleared the ground.

This lady acknowledges the principle of exceptions in the case of men's qualification for the Parliamentary franchise. These exceptions have reference to certain instructions given to overseers and other officers concerned in registration, the principle of qualification being ownership, occupiers of the £10 and upwards qualification, lodgers of £10 qualification, and a certain limited service, burgess and freeman qualification, peers and women being excluded. It was not until 1884-1885 that Mr. Gladstone, in conjunction with Lord Salisbury, was able to enlarge the suffrage, and since that recent date women have been included in the Local Government lists as voters when qualified as men.

The present Government was not pledged to risk its very existence on women's suffrage, yet I doubt if fewer than 75 per cent. of the Liberal members and of the Cabinet are unfavorable to withdrawing the exception of women from the Parliamentary franchise. But the confusion that has arisen from the wild claims of Suffragettes who have failed to state their claims as Miss Nancy Lightman has done, and the strange company they keep, has undoubtedly not hastened the tabling of a new Reform Bill, now foreshadowed by the Prime Minister, while the added difficulties introduced in bye-elections, must, and does, alienate much solid sympathy in the country, a sympathy that helps a Government to pass a measure and make it generous.

Until manhood suffrage is introduced the rate book must be the basis of registration. If a married woman is to vote how does Miss Nancy Lightman propose to get her name upon it, unless that of the husband is withdrawn? Possibly this lady and her friends believe in the property qualification, rather than in our system of household suffrage, and would welcome an extension of duplicate voting, in which case they are right in supporting Tory candidates, but should avow the reason.

The Speaker, the other day, rebuked a Tory member who claimed urgency for a question of artillery by stating that he did not think Great Britain was likely to be invaded before the end of the Whitsuntide recess. The Suffragettes might fairly accept this rebuke as applied to their thoughtless tactics. Should they ensure the defeat of every Liberal candidate at every bye-election for the next three years or more the question of female suffrage cannot be entertained apart from the new Reform Bill, of which, in any case, it must be a part, whether carried or not. Thus to attempt to defeat men who are necessary for carrying it, at the same time exhibiting a want of the most elementary knowledge of the necessities of government, is not to qualify for a right to assist in making the laws.—Yours, &c.,

Blundellsands, A. Grimshaw Haywood.
June 3rd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Florence Travers, writes: "It would now appear that the only direct and practical way of achieving votes for women is by way of adult suffrage." This assumption is quite unwarranted by anything that the Prime Minister is reported to have said in his recent statement and ought not to pass unchallenged.

As far as can be judged from varying reports—there is no official one—Mr. Asquith foreshadowed a Reform Bill which should remove various "fancy franchises" and remedy the glaring defects of the existing registration system. He does not appear to have mentioned adult suffrage nor to have indicated any intention of enlarging (in principle) the male electorate. In practice, of course, a shortened registration period would enlarge the electorate. If a Bill of this nature were passed and if women were included in it on the same terms as men, with a special proviso to include married women, the number of women electors would probably still remain inferior to the number of men electors. The whole of Mrs. Travers' argument, therefore, about the majority of women who would rule the country falls to the ground. Nor, even if women voters were in the majority, would her argument be sound, since it rests upon the second assumption that all, or, at any rate, most, women will vote the same way, and that a different way from most men's. But the opinions of women vary on every conceivable subject, precisely as the opinions of men do; and the majority by which the country would be governed would be made up—like the minority—of men and women together. The country would be governed by men and women, instead of by men only; and as many of the matters now debated in Parliament are matters upon which women are more expert than men, one might hope to see these matters more intelligently treated. At least the House of Commons would no longer offer to the world the opera-bouffe spectacle of a congregation of men gravely debating and deciding whether any mother shall be allowed to take her baby into her bed, while no mother throughout the nation is allowed a legal voice on the question.—Yours, &c., Clementina Black.

Hampstead, June 8th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I should like to point out that your "Anti-Suffrage" correspondent of last week shows an astonishing misapprehension as to the working of political parties.

The power of a Government depends upon "proportion," and not merely upon "majority." Therefore, a majority of one million women would not affect party politics unless there was a great tendency on the part of women to vote either Liberal or Conservative. That there is no such tendency has been proved over and over again by the unwillingness of both parties to give women the vote. Each party argues that women would favor their opponents, and this shows that the balance of feminine influence must be fairly even. Some three years ago statistics were taken as to the relative number of Anglicans and Nonconformists in the country, and their numbers were found to be approximately equal. Now, most Nonconformists are Liberal and most Anglicans are Conservative. This is another proof of the probable proportions of women's votes being duly balanced. I might multiply instances to support this fact, but what I have already said should suffice.

Then, as to the unfitness of women for the vote because they have neither administrative nor legislative capacity, I would remind your correspondent that this is no argument. If it were, the numbers of the existing male electorate would suffer a swift and startling reduction on the application of such a test.—Yours, &c.,

"THE PERIL OF THE GOVERNMENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have been an appreciative reader of The Nation since the appearance of its first number, and heartily approve of your consistent and able advocacy of the programme of social reform which the present Government is tackling. While doing so it is praiseworthy, of course, to preserve your independence, for no Liberal likes at any time to be what Emerson calls, "A mush of concession," but your article on "The Peril of the Government" to my thinking hits the wrong party. I agree that there is a danger of the Whiggery of office benumbing the democratic initiative and activities of the Cabinet, and the Prime Minister is not alone in being all the better for a stirring up. Your protest against the renewal of the Sugar Convention at the present juncture in the history of Free Trade is most timely. Others besides the Ministry, however, must take off their coats to the business of keeping the Government "in vivid touch with popular sentiment." It seems to me that your exhortations should be, meanwhile, quite as earnestly, to say the least of it, addressed to the rank and file of our M.P.'s, from whom there is heard no commanding voice elucidating and enforcing the Liberal programme as Mr. Winston Churchill did, e.g., in his historic campaign at Dundee. Are members merely to go the jog-trot, conventional pace in the recess? If they do no more than this, then we may despair of maintaining the momentum in and out of Parliament necessary to carry the many great and beneficent reforms in hand.—Yours, &c.,

R. Henderson Smith.

THE MEANING OF "BANDE MATARAM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your review entitled "The Anti-Indian Englishman," a title which I should apply to those who mislead the Indians to their own undoing, you comment upon my interpretation of the words "Bande Mataram," and you give quotations from a translation by an English gentleman. First, may I point out that this is a paraphrase, not a translation. Your reviewer must be aware, though he does not say so, that the words are put by the novelist into the mouths of the rebels, and there can be no question as to what is their acquired significance. As to the actual translation, I do not know that any scholar has supported the view that you put forward.

The reference to the goddess Kali cannot be ignored by anyone who has read the poem, in one of the earliest lines of which "the goddess Durga, bearing ten weapons," is mentioned. Mr. Grierson, whose authority as a scholar is unquestioned, wrote to the "Times" to point out that the words are an ancient invocation to the goddess Kali. No doubt the novelist compared his motherland to the goddess, but it is equally clear that the words are understood in their original signification by the agitators, no matter with what particular object they may be used. Sir George Birdwood, also a scholar, supports Mr. Grierson's view.

Mr. Anderson also points out that in "Ananda Math" the rebels are portrayed singing "Bande Mataram" to a statue in honor of the goddess Kali. It seems to me that your reviewer cannot have read the novel or the song, and I have yet to learn that any person with any claim to being a scholar has put forward the interpretation which your reviewer treats as if it were acknowledged to be correct.

For the rest, I make no complaint whatever of your reviewer, who writes from a point of view which I, of course, not only do not adopt, but utterly repudiate as unrepresentative of what is good, and what is true, and what is loyal in India.—Yours, &c.,

J. D. Rees.

JESUITS AS MURDERERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have not read Mr. Perceval Landon's book of stories. I know it only by the interesting review in The Nation of June 6th. Will you allow me to call attention to one point in the long extract your reviewer takes from it, referring to the death of "Cardinal de Bernard." If the words mean anything, Mr. Perceval Landon represents the Cardinal as being murdered by the Jesuits, with the approval of their General.

It is somewhat startling to find that an English gentleman like Mr. Landon casually mentions this as a possible, even a probable event, for a writer of stories of modern life does not deal with the outrageously impossible. Mr. Landon would not represent an English Secretary of State arranging to poison the leader of the Opposition. He would be laughed at if he did. Why fix such a scandalous imputation, even in fiction, on the Jesuit General? Which of recent Generals was capable of it? Mr. Landon's stories are tales of to-day, or of the recent past. Was this murder something that might conceivably be the act of Father Anderledy, or Father Martin, both of them cultured gentlemen, who had scores of English friends? I imagine that to Mr. Landon the General of the Jesuits is a kind of mythical bogey. He hardly grasps the fact that he is a reality. But surely it is time to banish from our literature twaddle of this kind, which would be ridiculous if it were not offensive.—Yours, &c.,

POLITICAL AND THEOLOGICAL LIBERALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In his review of Anglican Liberalism Canon Henson remarks that "there is nothing properly common to Liberalism in the logical and ecclesiastical senses and the political and economic." I cannot help feeling that Canon Henson and others ignore distinctions more practically important than those which they recognise; and, by the same token, they ignore bonds of sympathy more practical and efficient than those which they wish to strengthen.

I think that the feeling which makes a man desire to understand, sympathise with, and recognise the truth in those theological beliefs which he does not accept, is closely akin to the feeling which makes him desire to secure an equal chance to men of all classes, races, and nations, and to substitute the rule of reason for that of force. But, on the other hand, I do not see that a man is a champion of liberty either in thought or action just because he rejects certain doctrines. A man who disbelieves the Virgin Birth or Material Resurrection may be as bigoted in the enforcement of his negations as the extremest Ultramontane or Calvinist can be in the assertion of their positive creeds. And if so, he has for practical purposes less in common with sympathetic Liberalism, say, like that of Dean Stanley, or (may I be excused for adding) such as is embodied in my father's "Religions of the World," than many a Romanist or Calvinist.

I do not think that this is a mere academical distinction. I hope the time for Protestant penal laws against Roman Catholics or revolutionary massacres of priests is gone by for our century, but I think I see something of the spirit which produced these inconsistencies in the present educational controversy. I must say that my point of view on that matter is far nearer to that expressed by your correspondent "Th. Hill," than that of the ordinary Liberal. Freedom from tests for a really efficient schoolmaster ought to mean freedom to teach what he thinks vital as well as freedom to refuse to teach what he disbelieves; and not merely freedom to teach just as much as Nonconformist or Secularist leaders consider tolerable by people of their opinions. As to parental authority I would extend that further than the opponents of religious compulsion do; for I believe there are many other grounds for objecting to the retention of a child in a school than the so-called religious objection. Whatever excuse there was for compulsory education is, I think, done away with by the tradition in favor of sending children to school which has, in the main, been established in the last thirty-eight years; and the abolition of compulsion on the parent might prepare the way for perceiving the need of greater freedom than is yet demanded for the teacher. But as long as Liberalism in theology merely means negation, we shall have a number of cultivated and intelligent clergymen and laymen opposing real freedom in education—Yours, &c.,

LIBERAL ADULLAMITES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The memorial addressed to the Prime Minister, signed by eighteen Liberal members of Parliament, requesting him to capitulate to the House of Lords on the question of Scottish land legislation and to follow the lead of Messrs. Wason and Weir, with whom the House of Lords are anxious to deal, is as inimical to the interests of the Highlands as it is repugnant to the sentiment of the great mass of the Scottish people. The passing of Mr. Wason's Crofters Bill, so highly commended by the memorialists, would be a grave misfortune to Scotland. Such a sham settlement of the land question would indefinitely postpone just and urgent reforms. Its reputed benefits would be shadowy and costly, while its reactionary provisions would work real and lasting injury to the crofting community.

Mr. Wason's Bill extends the application of the Crofters Act to holdings between £30 and £50 of rent, but under a proviso, not found in the original Crofters Act, which renders the extension practically nugatory. The crofter, or his predecessor in title, must have (a) reclaimed the land, or (b) erected or constructed the buildings and improvements, or a substantial part thereof, at his own cost. There are very few holdings in the Highlands to which the qualified extension would apply, and, so far as Argyllshire is concerned, careful inquiry has failed to discover one instance where a tenant within the extended limit has either reclaimed the land or erected the buildings at his own cost. It was around this question of equipment that controversy raged most fiercely with reference to the Government Bill, and the pity of it is to find that the members who back this Bill have so completely given the case away.

The resumption of the holding clause in the original Crofters Act has been a source of worry and loss to many crofters, but this Bill, instead of limiting the purposes for which resumption may be applied for, actually extends that right to "the fencing of land for the general development of the estate." Such an extension of landlord right is a menace to the whole of crofterdom, and might involve the extinction of whole crofting townships.

The memorialists, all Liberal members of Parliament, must surely be ignorant of the character of Mr. Wason's Bill. In their letter to the Prime Minister they state that "if land reform in Scotland is to be postponed till after a constitutional conflict with the House of Lords, other questions may arise and obscure the issue." This is a most extraordinary and groundless charge to bring against a Government that has twice passed the Small Landholders Bill in the House of Commons, twice fought for it in the House of Lords, and twice obtained the King's consent to it. If the issue is obscured, it is not by the action of the Government, but by the conduct of the Liberal members who condone the killing of the Small Landholders Bill by the Lords, and who still hold up the authors of that disaster as the real friends of land reform.

The conflict between the people and the House of Lords has to be fought out. It is a life or death struggle for Liberalism. Men of all parties realise that it is on the field of land legislation that the fate of the Lords will be decided. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman proclaimed a fight to the finish on the Scottish Land Bill—a Bill strongly and persistently demanded by Scotsmen. What more foolish counsel than to retire from the battleground deliberately chosen by the leader of the party, cordially endorsed by his lieutenant, and enthusiastically acclaimed by the rank and file!

The memorialists refer with approval to the English and Irish Land Acts as less controversial than the Scottish Land Bill. I fail to see how it is possible for Highland members to look on the Government Land Bill as controversial, when all its principles were embedded in the Crofters Act, that wrought such wonders of beneficence for years in the past of the kingdom which they represent. The controversy was introduced by the Lords, and was occasioned by their proposed importation to Scotland of the English Land Act, which by no human ingenuity could be adapted to Scottish requirements.

The memorialists invite the Prime Minister to drop his predecessor's land policy as enunciated at Edinburgh last autumn, and to revert to the items of a programme which he himself is alleged to have put forward at Inverness two years before the great Liberal triumph of 1906.

The Prime Minister is pledged to carry out Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's policy, and is not to be shaken from his steadfastness. Nothing could be more repugnant to the sentiment of Highlanders than to be untrue to their old Chief's dying charge, and to betray his trust before his ashes were cold in the grave.—Yours, &c.,

TRADE RETURNS FOR MAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A great deal has been made of the so-called slump in the Board of Trade Returns for last month, but no account, so far as I have seen the daily press, has been taken of the heavy fall in values. The Index Number, so carefully kept by Mr. Sauerbeck for nigh half-a-century, gave a difference of eight points fall in April last compared to April, 1907, and the May one, I presume, is the same or more. I will not fatigue you or your readers with many figures and will curtail them down to millions. Hence, the matter may be reduced to very simple proportions in this way:—

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS FOR THE MONTH OF MAY.

Description.	Home Produce, or for Home Consumption.	Foreign and Colonial Produce.	Total.
Exports, 1907	37 ...	8 ...	45
Imports, 1907	44 ...	8 ...	52
Totals	81 ...	16 ...	97
Deduct 8 points Index Number equal 10 per cent.	8 ...	1½ ...	9½
Net amount compared to 1908 prices	73 ...	14½ ...	87½
Exports, 1908	31 ...	6 ...	37
Imports, 1908	38 ...	6 ...	44
Totals	69 ...	12 ...	81
Decrease upon May, 1907 ...	4 ...	2½ ...	6½
Per cent.	5½ ...	17 ...	7½

Without taking the Index Number, or rather the difference of value into account, the fall on imports would appear to be 15 per cent., that on exports 16, and upon re-exports 23 per cent. In the above tabulation the true state of the case appears.

The return for the five months shows the same results, but the average fall of points of the Index Number is only six since December last. The register tonnage of vessels in the oversea trade carrying cargo only confirms the position now taken up. The whole, or most, of the trouble has come to us from the panic in America last autumn. It is mainly because of the "slump" over there in buying power that our exports have fallen, for the American import trade has gone down a third. The descent with us is most pronounced in the entrepôt business which it is seen has fallen, last month, no less than 17 per cent. compared to 5 per cent. in our own proper commerce.—Yours, &c.,

THE GATHERING OF WILD FLOWERS AND FRUIT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is a Bill before Parliament, the object of which is the penalising of the gathering of wild flowers and wild fruit. It should meet with strenuous opposition; no court in England, above a Petty Sessional one, has ever held that there is private property in either wild animals, wild birds, wild fruit, or wild flowers.

Trespass is not in itself an offence, and Mr. Thompson, a barrister, who has given much attention to this subject expresses the opinion in his "Neglected Phase of the Land Laws," that some Magistrates have strained the law with regard to "constructive damage."

Difficulties have, of course, arisen because wild fruits and wild flowers have now a market value. A Cotswold farmer told me of his difficulty with regard to an acre of wild lilies of the valley, which he had fenced in. Mr. Thompson suggests a solution of this difficulty, by the passing of a law granting the absolute right of exclusion from land in return for the payment of a special tax.

It is interesting that this question was debated during two sessions, some years ago, in the German Parliament, between the landowners and the public, and that it was finally decided that the latter had an undoubted right to gather both wild fruit and wild flowers.—Yours, &c.,

THE DEFENCE OF THE LICENSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Swanwick, in a recent issue, says very sensibly that more should be done to bring home to the minds of the working-men electors the mendacity of the statements regarding the Licensing Bill issued by the brewers and retailed by their agents. But the field is already occupied by the enemy, and even to enter it for the purpose of peaceful discussion is resisted by organised violence.

I will give one typical instance. "A public meeting, to explain the provisions of the Licensing Bill," was held at Burbage, a village near Marlborough, on May 4th. The chairman was the much respected minister of the Congregational Church at Marlborough. "Several licensed victuallers from Pewsey" (a neighbouring market town), "who had created a disturbance at a similar gathering in their own parish a week or two before," had come over and led the opposition. The account of the proceedings occupies nearly a column and a-half—mostly interruptions from the organised blackguardism present, and protests from the platform. At last—"The speaker, after vainly endeavouring to make himself heard above the shouts of the publicans and their following, finally gave up the attempt." Burbage is a typical Church village. My authority is the "Marlborough Times," the Conservative organ.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

SONNET FROM PUSHKIN.

THOU shalt not, poet, prize the people's love.
The noise of their applause will quickly die;
Then shalt thou hear the judgment of the fool
And chilling laughter from the multitude.
But stand thou firm, untroubled and austere;
Thou art a king and kings must live alone.
Thine own free spirit calls to thee; pass on,
Make perfect the fair blossom of thy dreams,
Nor ask for praises of achievement won.
Praise lives within; 'tis thou that art the judge.
And thine the strictest judgment of them all.
Art thou content? Then leave the herd to howl;
Leave them to spit upon thine altar fires
And on the dancing incense of thy shrine.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE series of onslaughts which Mr. Andrew Lang is making upon M. Anatole France's "Jeanne d'Arc," call to mind the Froude and Freeman controversy of nearly fifty years ago. Indeed, Mr. Lang has himself entered the lists against Froude in a paper contributed to "Literature," and since reprinted in a volume called "Among my Books," edited by the late H. D. Traill. Froude's treatment of historical authorities was not irreproachable, but it can hardly be doubted that his accuracy in the main and in broad outline (which is incontrovertible), the color and animation of his narrative, and his masterly style, will always cause him to be read. The same is probably true of M. Anatole France. Who would say as much for Freeman? Mr. Lang attacks M. France for not rating Joan of Arc high enough. He thinks that to speak of Joan as "la petite sainte" and "une béguine"—phrases applied to her by M. France—is indefensible. But he also charges M. France with making an improper use of authorities, and he is particularly angry because M. France suggests that Joan was to some extent the puppet of a clerical director who engineered her visions and revelations for the advantage of the Church. It is at present a very pretty quarrel, and it will be interesting to read M. France's reply to these criticisms, which will, we understand, be given in the English translation of "Jeanne d'Arc," to be published by Mr. Lane.

WHAT may be called "the higher criticism" of the lives of the saints is an historical study of recent growth. Even while still under Newman's influence, Froude was convinced of its necessity. In his "Life of St. Neot," one of the series of "Lives of the Saints" projected by Newman, after gravely narrating the marvels attributed to St. Neot, he drily remarks at the end, "This is all, and perhaps more than all, that is known of the life of the blessed St. Neot." One of the best examples of this criticism is M. Paul Sabatier's "Life of St. Francis of Assisi." That work was the result of a hint given to its author by Renan. The great man advised M. Sabatier to do for the person of St. Francis what he believed he himself had done for the person of Christ, to disentangle essential truth from myth and legend, and present a veritable portrait of the saint. Another good example is to be found in "The Legends of the Saints: An Introduction to Hagiography," by Père Delehaye. It shows the profound difference between hagiography and history, and explains the process by which unhistorical accretions inevitably cluster round the doings of the great Christian saints. Father Delehaye's expositions of the dossier of St. Procopius, is an admirable piece of literary criticism.

WHILE on the subject of the Lives of the Saints we may mention that a biography of St. Thomas of Canterbury, by Father Robert Hugh Benson, is shortly to appear in the interesting "St. Nicholas Series," published by Messrs. Macdonald & Evans. Father Benson is uncompromising in his view of St. Thomas' political action, and he applies the same principle to the present controversy in France. "If it is proper," he writes, "that Edward VII. should be even the nominal head—and by law he is much more—of an institution claiming to be Christ's Church; and that M. Fallières should be the ultimate arbitrator between French priests and people; then it was equally proper for Henry II. to insist upon the 'Constitutions of Clarendon' and the 'royal customs,' and highly improper, as well as absurd, for St. Thomas to resist them." In choosing St. Thomas of Canterbury as the champion of the Church against the State, Father Benson has taken very debatable ground. His work in historical fiction makes us look forward to his appearance in the field of pure history.

BUDDHISM, as M. Anatole France points out in a charming essay, has a peculiar fascination for even the most sceptical minds of modern Europe. Every year sees the appearance of books in which the creed is examined from one point of view or another. "The Wheat Among the Tares," by the Rev. A. Lloyd, which is shortly to be published by Messrs. Macmillan, claims to be the first work in which the historical relations between Japanese Buddhism and Christianity are seriously considered. Mr. Lloyd, who is lecturer in the Imperial University at Tokyo, has given over twenty years to the study of his subject. His conclusion is that Japanese Buddhism arose out of Manichæism and Docetic and Gnostic heresies which very early found their way into Japan. For Messrs. Constable's series of "Monographs on Comparative Religions," Professor Rhys Davids has just finished a book on "Early Buddhism." Besides the life and teaching of Buddha, an account of the religious and political conditions of Northern India is also given.

A PROMISING book on the history of education in this country is announced by Messrs. Dent. It is called "A Century of Education, Being the Centenary History of the British and Foreign School Society." The author, Mr. Henry Bryan Binns, has had the assistance of such educational experts as Dr. Macnamara, Professor Foster Watson, Mr. Sidney Webb, and Mr. Graham Wallas, each of whom contributes a chapter dealing with some special side of the Society's work. The British and Foreign Society has done good service to the cause of education during the past hundred years, and it is well that we should have a permanent record of its activities.

THIS month Messrs. Routledge will publish the first volume of the authorised English translation of Dr. Friedländer's "Sittengeschichte Roms." The translator is Mr. Leonard A. Magnus, and the English version will be entitled, "Roman Life and Roman Manners under the Early Empire." The book gives a full account of the Imperial Court, of the means of locomotion and traffic, the position of women, and the general social life of Rome in the time of the first Emperors. An interesting section deals with travel and the narratives of the tourists of the period. The same publishers announce "The First English Translations of the Great Foreign Classics," by Mr. W. J. Harris, a work giving a bibliography of the chief English translations from Elizabethan times downwards, and tracing the influence of foreign authors upon English literature.

M. GASTON BOISSIER, who died last Wednesday in his eighty-fifth year, was a versatile and accomplished writer, and a scholar of European reputation. He was born at Nîmes in 1823, and the wealth of Roman remains in that town bred in him a determination to make Latin antiquities and literature the chief study of his life. His first important work on the subject, "Cicéron et ses amis," placed him in the front ranks of Latin scholarship. He succeeded Sainte-Beuve as Professor of Latin literature at the Collège de France, and in 1876 became a member of the French Academy, of which he was appointed perpetual secretary in 1895. Among his chief contributions to classical scholarship are "La Religion romaine d'Auguste aux Antonins," "Promenades archéologiques," "Nouvelles Promenades," and "La Fin du Paganisme." He also wrote excellent biographies of Saint-Simon and of Madame de Sévigné in Hachette's series of "Grand Ecrivains français." His death raises the number of vacant places in the Academy to four.

THE STORY OF THE VOLUNTEERS.*

The author remarks justly in his preface that the time is opportune for reviewing the history of the Volunteer Forces. That history is full of lessons and warnings, and it ought at least to guide us in anticipating the results of Mr. Haldane's experiments. There is a great deal to be learnt from Major Sebag-Montefiore's book; but from this point of view it is unfortunate that it is a little wanting in definiteness, and that he has allowed himself to roam rather widely from his subject. Once or twice this rambling habit has involved him in historical mistakes. A historian of the Volunteers is under no obligation to learn all about the Revolutionary movement in the eighteenth century; but if he discusses it, he ought to know the facts. He ought not, for example, to describe the Corresponding Society of London as an organisation "for the propagation of republican views and for maintaining the connection with the leaders of France." This sentence, whatever its precise meaning may be, would seem to suggest that Major Sebag-Montefiore is under the impression that the society existed to correspond with some French revolutionaries, whereas, of course, its name and its methods were borrowed from the corresponding societies which had existed in England fifteen years before the French Revolution, to one of which Burke himself had belonged. The correspondence which the society conducted was not between England and France, but between different centres in England. It had to do not with the Revolution, but with Parliamentary Reform. This misconception helps to explain how it is that Major Sebag-Montefiore seriously thinks that Volunteers were necessary to defend England against "her internal enemies"—a view that was excusable in the mind of the panic-stricken squire of the time, but not tenable to-day. The "internal enemies" were men who happened to think in 1794 what Pitt had thought in 1784. The only difference was that Pitt got into office, while the later reformers got into gaol.

It is perhaps not surprising that a historian of the Volunteers should diverge into other topics, for undoubtedly the chief interest of the Volunteers is social rather than military. Nowhere, indeed, have the social characteristics of English policy played a greater part in moulding our institutions than in the history of the Volunteers. For practical purposes that history begins with the Act of 1794 authorising the formation of district corps or companies of Volunteers, to be entitled to pay, and to be subject to military discipline if called out for invasion, or in aid of the civil power. By a clause in the Act, Volunteers who showed that they had attended exercise for six weeks, were exempt from the Militia. This separation of the Volunteers from the Militia is condemned by Mr. Fortescue as a disastrous blunder, and from the point of view of military organisation a blunder it certainly was. But the explanation is easy to discover. For there were two respects in which service in the Volunteers was made attractive; one was the exemption from the more exacting service of the Militia; the other was the social advantage of serving in a force distinct from the Militia. The separation of the auxiliary forces of England into Militia, Fencibles, and Volunteers, to compete with each other and with the regular army, was a symptom of the social habits of the nation. If the conscript army across the Channel illustrated the militant democracy of the Revolution, the failure to provide a single homogeneous defensive army for these shores was just as true and visible a sign of the vitality and power of the governing ideas of eighteenth century England. In earlier instances of raising Volunteers, described by Major Sebag-Montefiore, the Volunteer companies had been affiliated to the Militia, but if Pitt, when he wished to raise Volunteers on a large scale, departed from this sound practice in 1794, it was not necessarily because, as Mr. Fortescue has argued, he had never grappled with the problem of national defence; it may very well have been because he dared not try to raise a democratic army. The main intention, as Windham put it afterwards, was that the Volunteer Corps should consist of a higher class of life, of a better condition, of such a description as it would not be proper to mix with soldiers of the line. When Castlereagh introduced his scheme in 1808, he declared his anxiety to "prevent the injurious confusion of the highest with the lowest ranks." The same considerations were strongly urged in the circulars which revived the Volunteers in 1859.

There is another aspect of the Volunteer organisation which is interesting in this connection. Its main pivot was personal enterprise in raising a corps. The same quality was stimulated by the prizes which were offered to men for raising independent companies for the army. As Pitt developed that system, a young man could obtain a pension for life from his country by investing a sufficient sum to raise a few score of recruits. A boy colonel in the English Army at the end of the 18th century was not a greater anomaly than a boy cardinal in the days of the Renaissance Popes. There was no end to the mischief and the scandals caused by this system. Now in the raising of the Volunteer regiments there was no mercenary reward, but there was the reward of rank. Individual initiative was the key to the system. Under the Volunteer system the Government dealt not with some public authority but with individual leaders, who raised and maintained its armies for home defence with the help of Government grants. Until Mr. Haldane's scheme was introduced the colonel was even responsible for the debts of the corps. Rank has been the reward of public spirit in the richer classes, not of military skill and zeal in all classes. This idea of the Volunteers as an army of well-to-do men led by rich men has never disappeared, and the whole system still retains something of the spirit of the 18th century. From this point of view the question that it was natural to ask when Mr. Haldane set to work to reorganise the army of home defence was how he proposed to adapt an institution that belongs to the days and fashion of aristocracy to the needs of a democracy. It is a question which has received a very plain answer. For in one of his first speeches he explained his ideal. "We should all be glad," he said, in February last year, "if the counties could go back to their old footing in which the country gentleman had the young men on his estate working with himself in his own voluntarily raised battalion, and contributing thus to the safety of the nation thereby." In another speech he said he wished to find something for the country gentleman to do. By way of helping to this end Mr. Haldane has set up the lords lieutenant, with their county oligarchies, to govern the Volunteers, trusting to the pressure of the rich as the stimulus to recruiting. There is no sign that he proposes to make it easier for "the young men on the estate" to earn the prizes of zeal and prowess. He has given the Volunteers a new name, but he has shown himself as shy of democratic ideas as were his predecessors a century ago.

SPAIN THROUGH ENGLISH SPECTACLES.*

However much Spaniards may differ from Englishmen in their more superficial characteristics there is one fundamental quality in which the two peoples bear a marvellous resemblance. Both have a deep-seated conviction of their innate superiority over other races, and both are apt to be disturbed by periods of distrustful introspection, during which they criticise almost despairingly their own qualities and attainments, whilst resenting with extreme sensitiveness all similar criticism coming from abroad. We are all familiar with our native Jeremiahs, who, at intervals, show us how degenerate we have become, and how near is our inevitable collapse as a great people; how our trade is going, our manhood sapped by idleness, our morals lost by indulgence, and our honesty destroyed by greed. But, whilst we are all shaking our heads sadly at our shortcomings, let a foreigner tell us the same story and Englishmen stiffen up at once.

In Spain exactly the same thing occurs; and for the last eight years the serious writers in the country have been dissecting the national characteristics under a microscope, with a view, as they say, to discover and diagnose the malady that afflicts the nation as a whole. The study of sociology in all its ramifications is, indeed, occupying the best minds in Spain, and it is not surprising that foreigners who take an interest in the country should be attracted by the theories advanced by native Spaniards on the subject. Mr. Havelock Ellis has studied Spain deeply in a philosophical spirit, and has here collected more than a dozen of his essays treating of various phases of Spanish life. I have rarely come across a book so full of keen analysis and fruitful suggestion. An English author, whose book was published soon after the writings of Angel Ganivet gave the initial impetus to this introspective study by Spaniards, first advanced the theory—now generally accepted in Spain—that Spain's history and present position are mainly to be explained by the self-centred individualism and thirst for isolated spiritual distinction due to racial and geographical causes. Mr. Havelock Ellis, after examining the theories of many Spanish writers on the subject, arrives at a somewhat similar conclusion. He notes that the "heroic energy" of the Spaniard is not directed primarily towards comfort or gain; but "towards the more fundamental facts of human existence," towards the spiritual exaltation of the individual, towards the cultivation of his own self-respect and esteem, towards the service of his more immediate friends and kin, even at the expense of justice to the rest of the world. Mr. Havelock Ellis notes the Spaniard's apathy to the general well-being in his anxiety for the well-being of his own small circle: he sees, as all observers have seen, the curiously local character and limited scope of his patriotism, and his narrow view of legal obligations, prompted by the idea that, however good a law may be in the abstract, it is allowable for each individual to evade its provisions for his own benefit. The essays in which this subject is dealt with by Mr. Havelock Ellis are full of food for reflection. He believes truly, with Ganivet and the English historian already mentioned, that what is needed for Spain is a higher ideality, a wider imagination, a firmer belief in the future of the race and of the result of effort for the national good; in short a larger patriotism than that of the parish steeple.

Mr. Havelock Ellis does not confine himself to this subject, however, but has a pair of highly illuminative articles on Spanish art and Velasquez, inspired by a sane criticism and breadth of observation that may be unreservedly commended. An agreeable chapter is also devoted to Ramon Lull, the great Majorcan philosopher, who, in the thirteenth century, founded a school which profoundly influenced the culture of Europe, enforcing as it did the truth of Christianity by the light of reason and logic as apart from revelation. Other essays in the book deal with Spanish dancing, with visits to Segovia, Seville, and Monserrat, and with Spanish women. The latter essay is written, like the rest, in a keenly critical but very kindly spirit, and certainly with nothing offensive in it; but, as illustrating the sensitiveness to foreign criticism already mentioned as characteristic of Spaniards, I recollect that, at the time the essay first appeared in an English magazine, the "Imparcial," the principal morning paper in Madrid, had an article upon it full of petulant scorn at remarks of the author as to certain physical peculiarities of Spanish women.

Throughout the book Mr. Havelock Ellis appeals to us best as a critic. His writing is largely subjective, and very suggestive, even in his descriptive essays: but the book of Mr. Lomas, which reaches me at the same time, "In Spain," is purely descriptive and objective. It is, indeed, to a great extent, a guide book, though without the directions for travel or details of accommodation usually looked for in such books by visitors to a foreign country. On the other hand, its descriptions of places, and especially of the splendid churches of Spain, are much more thorough and enlightening than in any of the current English guide books.

Mr. Lomas knows Spain well, though there are several curious slips in the Spanish words quoted; but he is apt to be somewhat assertive and cocksure in his criticisms, many of which are at least open to doubt. For instance, anyone who knows the stupendous grandeur of the Escorial as a whole may question Mr. Lomas' cavalier dismissal of the place as containing only one really grand thing, the church, "which need not be studied for its detail—Herrera had no notion of working out fine detail in church architecture, but it is vast, solemn, severe." He speaks, too, of the view of the palace-monastery from "King Philip's chair" as being "a never-to-be-forgotten vision of the exceeding ugliness of the building, with its cold, grey prison-house aspect, its hard, ungraceful lines, and its 11,000 factory-like little windows." This is certainly not the effect produced by the scene upon the present writer, who has looked upon it in all lights and seasons. Mr. Lomas is equally outspoken and downright about the character of the Spanish kings. Of Philip II. he takes the narrow, old-fashioned, English puritan view, now to a great extent modified amongst historical students; and of the Bourbon kings who have inhabited the Granja he has some very hard, and not altogether just, things to say, whilst he leaves out of mention the best of them, of whom no evil could be said, Ferdinand VI. and Charles III. The images and altar decorations in the churches, except where they call for commendation as works of art, are called "dolls," "gingerbread," and the like, too often for good taste; and an English traveller who went through Spain openly expressing opinions and comments in the spirit of much of Mr. Lomas' book would certainly not be likely to smooth the wheels of his progress. It is fair to say, however, that, downright as Mr. Lomas is in asserting his views, he is, in matters of architecture and ecclesiology especially, a learned and interesting guide, and his descriptions of Spanish scenery are picturesque and vivid. His account of Segovia, though not so eloquent as that of Mr. Havelock Ellis, will be found useful to visitors who wish to see that gem of cities with as little fatigue as possible. Mr. Lomas, however, went to the wrong inn at Segovia, the one he complains of having been now quite superseded by an excellent, though unpretending, hostelry in a narrow street hard by. As a companion, supplementary to a regular guide book, for an ecclesiological and antiquarian tour on the principal lines of travel in Spain Mr. Lomas' book may be recommended. The illustrations are numerous and excellent.

THE GOLDEN BOUGH.*

WHILE there is, and always has been, ground for charging the majority of readers with caring only for literature which makes little or no demand on the thinking faculty, and which "to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven," there persists a public to whom books of serious aim make appeal, books whose influence silently, yet effectively, purifies the intellectual and spiritual atmosphere. To say nothing of the works on which Time's verdict will not be annulled, there are the proofs around us in the success, slow but sure, of such thought-compelling volumes as Professor Tylor's "Primitive Culture"; Sir Alfred Lyall's "Asiatic Studies"; and Dr. Frazer's "Golden Bough." The last named, in the novelty of much of its contents, and in the easy charm of its style, reached per saltum the first rank among treatises contributing to the ever-fascinating subject of the origin and evolution of rites and customs whose significance had been dulled by familiarity, or obscured by ignorance of their family likeness all the world over. For the interrelation of the several types of barbaric superstitions became the more obvious the more they were classified and compared, but so vast and increasing is the material that even Dr. Frazer's skill has failed to keep in due prominence the connecting ideas which inform the whole, and of which they are but the outward and visible signs. Hence, perchance taking a hint from the processes of evolution which "wheeling, cast the planets," the original volumes of the "Golden

THE NORTH-WEST PASSAGE

BY

ROALD AMUNDSEN.

BEING THE RECORD OF A VOYAGE OF EXPLORATION OF THE SHIP GJÖA, 1903-1907.

With One Hundred and Forty Illustrations and Three Maps.

This record of Arctic Exploration is the realisation of a dream which has always held a foremost place among European voyagers. Captain Amundsen, FOR THE FIRST TIME, navigated the whole of the North-West Passage between the years 1903-1907; and, by a curious coincidence, the sloop Gjöa sailed through the passage on the three-hundredth anniversary of Hudson's first voyage in its search.

"THE NORTH-WEST PASSAGE,"

as a record of adventure in the Polar seas, and by reason of its accomplishment by seven men in a tiny ship no bigger than the cockleshells in which the adventurers of four hundred years ago set forth to seek new continents, is the most important book of Arctic Exploration since Nansen's "Farthest North," and one of the most fascinating works of daring adventure.

A SELECTION

By JOHN GALSWORTHY

A COMMENTARY

The Daily Telegraph says: "Mr. John Galsworthy is a writer whose work always bears the stamp of a distinct individuality. He describes the things he sees with consummate power, without any touch of exaggeration to heighten his effects. . . . If enough people could be made to see and feel things as Mr. Galsworthy sees and feels them, we should be far on the road towards amelioration." Price 3/6.

By JOHN GALSWORTHY

A COMMENTARY

The Daily News says: "A book full of true ideas about life, told in Mr. Galsworthy's characteristic manner. He seems to buttonhole the reader and command his attention until he has finished. He does not deal in half-measures, he says what he feels from the bottom of his heart. . . . An effective book which the reader will find stimulating and profitable. . . . always clever and thoughtful."

By JOHN GALSWORTHY

A COMMENTARY

The Westminster Gazette says: "None, we are sure, will finish this book without being stirred to some thought and sympathy of the life beyond their life. . . . . We have called these studies penetrating, and that is the word Mr. Galsworthy's methods suggests. He works by fine sharp touches which go to the heart of the matter and keep the reader in a constant state of self-criticism." Price 3s. 6d.

LOVE'S SHADOW

The Daily Telegraph says: "By her latest book Mrs. Ernest Leverson establishes herself in a unique position among English novelists. She can only be compared for wit to 'Gyp' at that witty lady's best period, while in the quiet but perfect humour which pervades her pages she recalls the delicately penetrating work of Tristan Bernard. . . . The exquisite lightness of the author's touch is not more remarkable than its sureness. 'Love's Shadow' can be read often and read always, for it is real life seen through the gayest of glasses—real life, in which we are lucky enough to meet with singularly amusing people." GRANT RICHARDS, LONDON.

Bough" escape ponderousness by the author's practice of throwing off a series of monographs, each maintaining unity with the others in virtue of the central idea which determines their orbits; "each," as Dr. Frazer explains, "retaining its value even if the explanation of the priesthood of Nemi should prove to be altogether wrong."

Of the five portions into which the book is to be divided, the first appear to rank fourth in order. It has reached a second edition in a twelvemonth. The new issue has given Dr. Frazer opportunity to add to the appendices, and to enlarge the section on the worship of Adonis, with a chapter on "Sacred Men and Women." Herein a wider field for examples of the sacrifice of chastity in both ancient and modern religions is surveyed, India and Africa adding their evidence to that from Syria and Cyprus. Revolting as is the custom to modern ideas, its religious character is not to be doubted. Its practice in sacred precincts; the dedication of tributes derived therefrom to the gods; and the assumption that any resulting offspring are children of the gods; are among the reasons justifying Dr. Frazer's contention that "the custom was not regarded as an orgy of lust, but as a solemn religious duty in the service of the great Mother-goddess whose name varied, while her type remained constant, from place to place."

The question will be asked, what is the bearing of this on the main theory propounded in the "Golden Bough," which, it may be remembered, is based on the identification of the gods of vegetation with the processes of nature? The fate of these corn, vine, and other deities was believed to be involved in the variations of the seasons; the death-like barrenness of winter betokened the death of the god or his disappearance in the underworld; while in the revival of life in springtime, there was the manifestation of his resurrection. The names of Adonis, Tammuz, Attis, and Osiris cover one conception under which the peoples of Egypt and Western Asia "represented the yearly decay and revival of life, especially of vegetable life, which they personified as a god who annually died and rose again from the dead." In each case "we see a god whose untimely and violent death is mourned by a loving goddess and annually celebrated by his worshippers." Hence the lament for Adonis at Byblus and Paphos; and for Tammuz at Babylon and Jerusalem, by the gate of whose temple the shocked Ezekiel saw the women weeping (chap. viii., 14); hence, since the whole thing hinged on fears that the earth might not again yield "seed to the sower and bread to the eater," the apparatus of charms and magic, mimetic in character, to secure the rebirth and resurrection of the god. While creeds and dogmas vary, ritual and custom are rigid; hence, the ceremonies which attended the mourning for Adonis have their survival in the Roman and Greek churches to-day. At Easter waxen effigies of the dead Christ, adorned with fruit and flowers, and covered with kisses, are exposed in Southern Italian churches; as, in old Rome, images of the virgin-born Attis, bound to his symbol, the sacred pine-tree, were decked with violets and carried in procession to the temple of Cybele, and, as in Alexandria, the image of Adonis, strewn with flowers, was borne by weeping women to its burial.

Dr. Frazer has little doubt that the Easter celebration of the death and resurrection of Christ "was influenced by the similar celebration of the death and resurrection of Attis, which was held at Rome at the same season." The full significance of this, and of much else akin to it, concerning which the hints adumbrated in the first edition of the "Golden Bough" have yielded to clearly defined opinions in the present volume, is apparent to the student of comparative theology. Suffice it, that while the solvent of the higher criticism has demonstrated the essentially human elements in the Old and New Testaments, the comparative method is revealing the common source whence those elements are derived. Lest, however, the parallels which Dr. Frazer supplies (when, for example, he speaks of Osiris as "a god who fed his people with his own broken body, and who died that they might live"; of Attis "as mourned, but in the belief that he would come to life and ascend to heaven," and of the "theory of a new birth and the remission of sins through the shedding of blood as having its origin in savagery") might lead to the inference that he includes Jesus in the mythical theogony of Adonis, Attis, and Osiris, it may be well to quote him on this matter.

> "The historical reality, both of Buddha and Christ, has sometimes been doubted or denied. It would be just as reasonable to question the historical existence of Alexander the Great and Charlemagne on account of the legends which have gathered round them. . . . The attempt to explain history without the influence of great men may flatter the vanity of the vulgar, but it will find no favor with the philosophic historian."

Obviously, only the fringe of a wide embracing subject, such as fills but one portion of a big book, can here be touched. There will remain matters for criticism as in Dr. Frazer's assumption of "old communal rites" preceding marriage as an institution, whereas anthropological research, working on biological lines, tends to support the theory of primitive monogamy. But although on this, and other secondary questions, differences will exist, there will be common agreement that in building the great structure of magical practices on the permanent human instincts of hunger and love, Dr. Frazer has chosen a foundation that cannot be shaken.

EDWARD CLODD.

SOME RECENT VERSE.*

"POEMS OF LOVE AND DEATH," by Lady Lindsay, is a very charming little volume of pleasantly gentle fancies—not, perhaps, to be called poetry, but indicative enough of excellent intentions, and what used to be called "sensibility." In the piece entitled "Unemployed," for instance, there is much sympathy with the sufferings of the poor. The father of a starving family is depicted as on the verge of suicide:—

> "How can I watch you starve? How shall I live?
> 'Twere better in the quiet grave to lie.
> How can I bide, when I've no bread to give?
> My little wife, come, kiss me for good-bye."
> . . . . . .
> "Nay, nay, not that!" so closely do I cling:
> "Dear, if you die, then I shall die with you.
> Oh, let us pray! The dawn perchance may bring > More light, more hope and courage for us two.
> "Be strong," I whispered, though my face was wet;
> "Death is not due; a nobler course will run."
> And heart to heart the dawning day we met—
> And God sent help before the day was done."

That is quite pretty. It throws no light on social problems, for one cannot help supposing that God did nothing of the sort. It is not art, and we think no service can be done to literature by pretending—as we have noticed other critics doing—that it is in any sense poetry. Press notices, at the end of the volume, apparently place Lady Lindsay's work very high indeed—"One of the few living writers," &c., and rate her with Elizabeth Barrett Browning. We confess to a sort of impatience at such critical rubbish; an impatience, however, that does not blind us to the general kindliness manifested in her pretty little book.

Far finer in quality are the "Poems Old and New" of Margaret L. Woods, whose "Ballad of the Mother," and "The Sea-born Man" have a weird charm entirely of their own. Yet, for the most part, there is a veil of artificiality over these poems, the result, we believe, of Mrs. Wood's theories about verse. She is so anxious to show that she understands the "stress" principle, and the principle of syllabic equivalence, that she hardly ever writes a verse which is not an extraordinary example of one or the other, or both. Her blank verse moves thus:—

The Problems and Perils of Socialism.

Letters to a Working Man.

By J. ST. LOE STRACHEY Sewed, 6d.

MACMILLAN & Co., LTD., LONDON.

"A pillar of fire before this murmuring people
Moves beckoning on, again and yet again
The dragon-haunted untractable wilderness
They must adventure, or make the Grand Refusal
And die forsaken of God the despised death."

In another poem entitled "The May Morning and the Old Man," Mrs. Woods is more successful, we think; where the verse is necessarily simplified by the fact that much of it is in dialect. The "Bicyclist's Réveillé" is entirely charming. Mrs. Woods certainly has a distinct place among modern women-poets.

"The Tryst, a Book of the Soul," by Lauchlan Maclean Watt, has much beauty. The evidences of the author's deep religious feeling are branded on every page, and that is tantamount to saying his poetry is of a very high order wherever he is capable of expressing himself, and that is often.

"The Bridge of Fire," by James Flecker, contains much admirable work, some of which is imitative of Swinburne and some of Oscar Wilde. It is marred by some rather belated excursions into the old-time decadent haunts. We do not write "Litanies to Satan" nowadays. But the fantasy entitled the "Golden Head" has a peculiar charm of its own.

"Nineveh and Other Poems," by G. S. Vierick, is another rather ludicrously belated imitation of Oscar Wilde. Even the weak rhyme-endings are imitated with sedulous care, e.g.:—

"Thick pours the smoke of thousand fires,
Life throbs and beats relentlessly;
But, lo! above the stately spires
Two lemans: Death and Leprosy."

The preface would lead us to understand that Mr. Vierick is very young. He is pointing our errant souls to "the poetry of to-morrow," his own we understand.

THE ETHICS OF ILLUSTRATION.*

It is one of the most trite of trite commonplaces that the first business of an illustration is to illustrate both the letter and the spirit of the text that it adorns. Yet it is one of the truths which are frequently forgotten or ignored in the production of modern books. We recall particularly one recent instance in which the text was an archæological and historical description of a famous city, written by a British archæologist of repute. The illustrations were supplied by a Japanese artist, and very attractive impressions they were; but they dealt with the subject from anything but an archæological standpoint, and had no more to do with the text than the sun with the moon. The only part of this work that essayed to interpret the pictures in words was its introduction which, in turn and of necessity, was wholly out of touch with the letterpress it was supposed to assist in introducing. Now the fact that this book was nicely printed and that the pictures were admirably reproduced in colour may have established its claim to be considered attractive, but not its right to be thought well illustrated, seeing that the whole essence of good illustration is contained in the axiom given above. The absolute merit of the drawings or photographs, regarded simply as drawings or photographs, has nothing to do with this particular question. They may be excellent individually and collectively; but unless, within the covers of a book, they do something towards supplementing and expounding the text they illustrate, they are the wrong sort of illustration for that book.

The modern artist-illustrator is often contrasted, generally unfavourably, with his predecessors. But the difference is not, as many people suppose, a difference in artistic powers; it is rather a difference in the conception of what illustration means. For instance, to the men of the sixties, to Millais, Boyd Houghton, Du Maurier, and the rest, it meant a very serious art, an art distinct from other phases of pictorial art, an art of which the primary aim was to do justice to the literary text. Millais' illustrations to Trollope's novels were achieved by his mastery of the draughtsman's craft. But it is not so much their draughtsmanship that keeps them green in the memory as their perfect interpretation of Trollope's characters and scenes. For the time being the artist drew the novelist's characters with the novelist's eye, subordinating his own individuality and using his own technique in the service of the novelist's ideas. The modern illustrator, like the modern painter, is more self-centred. If he is intent on making his drawings fit the text, he is even more intent on showing how exceptionally clever they are in composition and design.

Hence in the books and magazines of to-day we find plenty of drawings as good as, or better than, those of the 'sixties, but only a few good illustrations. On the other hand, the far greater proportion of illustrated to non-illustrated books has brought with it an infinite variety of style of illustration and method of reproduction. If therefore we have lost something of what might be termed the illustrative sense—meaning a sense somewhere between the artistic and the literary—we have gained something to take its place partly—a cheap, possibly an inefficient substitute, if you will, but better than nothing at all. Neither need one despair of finding in the inchoate mass of illustrated matter published some signs of a return of that sense of fitness which we hold to be so necessary. We have before us two books which may honestly be said to be well and truly illustrated according to their different fashions. The first is Mr. Peixotto's "By Italian Seas." We take it first, not on account of its greater intrinsic importance, but because it is an example of what many consider the ideal illustrated book—the book, that is, written and illustrated by the same hand. The sketches are in line and wash, full-page and other sizes. They vary considerably in character; some are the merest outlines; in others, where detail has fascinated the artist, detail is closely followed in a nervous, slightly tentative, style. A certain air of irresponsibility in their arrangement, a suggestion of haphazard selection of subjects, prepares one for a text with cognate characteristics, and this one finds. Mr. Peixotto writes very much as he draws, fluently, pleasantly, prettily; his record is one of impressions rather than facts, his imagination lively rather than profound. Neither text nor illustrations by themselves would hold the attention for more than a moment, but in combination they are sufficient to attract. Secondly come Mr. Rackham's illustrations to "The Land of Enchantment," a collection of legendary and other stories for children, which originally appeared in "Little Folks." Those who remember the wonderfully successful co-operation of Mr. Rackham with Mr. J. M. Barrie in "Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens," will concede the former's great illustrative gift; Mr. Rackham's art, moreover, has qualities which few drawings and no ordinary photographs possess—a real sense of decoration, considerable beauty of pure line, and a range in sentiment from the slightly whimsical to the powerfully grotesque. In the volume before us the aesthetic qualities are prominent, and for this reason alone one could covet the drawings, apart from the text, as one could not covet the illustrations of the preceding book, excellent as are the latter for their purely illustrative purpose. Thus, in the combination of illustrative fitness and artistic quality, Mr. Rackham comes nearest to the ideal illustrator; he carries on both the illustrative fidelity and the artistic strength of the age whose passing we lament. It must not, however, be forgotten that he is an isolated phenomenon, not a type; that his achievement is no indication of what is possible in an era so steeped in commercialism, so devoted to the cult of the ordinary, as is ours. We must not expect too much of such an era. Mr. Rackham, moreover, uses a scheme of colour that is peculiarly adapted to reproduction by modern processes. But his chief quality, be it always remembered, is his illustrative sense, and that is the soul of illustration as a definitive art.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A ROMANOFF.*

Even in Russia belief in the "divinity that doth hedge a King" has passed from the stage of a popular superstition to that of a falling echo. "Many a crown covers bald foreheads," says the poet, and there are too many diaries and journals from royal pens, too many Congo manifestoes from Leopold, and heartfelt letters from the Kaiser for our reverence to accept and swallow them as heaven-sent or "inspired." The populace yearns ever to say with Calverley's heroine:

> "But oh! a piece of orange peel, the end of a cigar, > Once trod on by a princely heel, how beautiful they are!"

but books such as "Never Say Die," by the Grand Duke Michael Michaelowitz deal a back-handed blow at the prestige that escapes the cruel activities of royal biographers and photographers. Mr. W. T. Stead's hasty genuflections, many years ago, before the royal house of the Romanoffs, only impressed the democracy with the fact that the late Czar was an exceedingly obstinate, honest, and stupid man, and "Never Say Die" comes aptly to-day to show us that the man who has absolute power, if, indeed, he had character to use it, over one hundred millions of his subjects, has no chance given him by the system under which he is educated. He is shut off from reality. A powerful man might, conceivably, kick down the horrible, smooth, social wall of plaster, which isolates him from his fellows, but a weak man, who has been mentally spoon-fed from his cradle upwards, has no more chance of getting into touch with and understanding the facts of life than an Indian papoose has a chance of freeing itself from the board to which its mother has strapped it. Sociologically, this autobiography of a Romanoff, by the Czar's first cousin, is a most precious document, one that, devoid of literary quality of any kind, is pathetic in its successful effort to show the world the fearful boredom and inanity of a "royal" lot.

"Belonging, as I do, to the Imperial blood, and being a member of one of the reigning houses, I should like to prove to the world how wrong it is in thinking, as the majority of mankind are apt to do—that we are the happiest beings on this earth. There is no doubt that financially we are well situated, but is wealth the only happiness in this world?" asks the Grand Duke Michael Michaelowitz, and he proceeds, quite unconsciously, to descant on the two means by which nature has striven to rectify the crushing handicap of a "royal" upbringing. As a set-off against "the poor boy's sad and dull youth, living in dull routine, with no comrades, for seven months at Sturm-Hohe-Schloss, and for five months at the Jagd-Schloss," nature developed in Prince Francy, who is the hero of "Never Say Die," an inordinate self-conceit. And as the one possible outlet for revolt against the routine life of conventional duties and meaningless royal functions, in which every desire, need, and pleasure is anticipated, formalised, and regulated as if by clockwork, nature, repressed but irrepressible, brings all her force against the plaster walls and undermines them with a real love affair. As the Grand Duke Michael Michaelowitz puts it, "What is the greatest happiness in the world? Surely love for a woman—the choice of our future wife and family life," and ten times more must this Paradise beckon to a man when it is his chief refuge against the elaborated boredom of a figure-head existence. But "even in this we have not the facilities of private individuals . . . . so it will be easily understood why, consequently, there are so few happy unions," pathetically remarks our royal author, whose own revolt from stereotyped wretchedness, we are given to understand, has provided the material for this remarkable document.

Prince Francy, we are told, was "fortunate in possessing a charming character and a pliant disposition." His tutor, of course, admired and loved him for "his good heart and sweet character." At the military school he was naturally a favorite alike with masters and scholars, and it is not strange that being a prince he passed all his examinations most brilliantly. When he was twenty and he had to swear allegiance to his flag, in the royal courtyard at Sturm-Hohe-Schloss, after a magnificent banquet at which the Ministers assisted, Prince Francy "acquitted himself most admirably. He had never looked so handsome as he did on this occasion, and he made a most excellent and deep impression upon all the guests assembled." His father, Prince Donnerwetter, who reminds us of Prince Bulbo in Thackeray's "Rose and the Ring," was "so affected by the deportment of his son that he could not restrain the tears from coursing down his cheeks, and immediately made Francy A.D.C. to himself." Everybody was perfectly enchanted, but, unfortunately, the Princess-mother, who disliked her son, absented herself from the ceremony, and, of course, everybody at once understood the reason. But Prince Francy "was received with enthusiasm by his regiment, at once became popular, was an excellent comrade, and served his regiment brilliantly and faithfully." There was, in short, not a cloud on the princely horizon till Francy fell in love with the Princess Margaret of Punpernickel, a match which the Princess-mother at once sternly forbade, and her son "being terribly afraid of her," gave up the Princess, became heart-broken from disappointment, grew serious and morose, and "took no interest in anything," for the space of seven years, after which he fell again in love, this time with an enchanting young lady, Miss Dorothy Schweinitz. There is something deeply pathetic in the grave man's account of his despairing struggle against the plaster-of-Paris decrees of his royal fate. He "had been kept so apart from women that he was inclined to look upon them as glorious creatures of a world unknown to him," and when Miss Schweinitz, greatly presuming, asked for the honor of a dance, he "stood as if petrified, and, without uttering a single word, made a deep bow, turned on his heel, and disappeared in the crowd." With extraordinary naïveté, we are told that when Prince Francy tries to win the friendship of Miss Schweinitz's two brothers, who were in his regiment, "this was not a difficult task, as Francy was such an awfully good fellow, and the two officers were already predisposed in his favor by the glowing accounts they received of him from their sister." And when the two lovers have at last met and confided in one another, it is as though their human feelings were filtering to us through layers and layers of stiff Court gauze.

The pages that succeed are the most curious in the book. Tolstoy, with all his clairvoyance (and readers of "Anna Karenina" will remember his caustic description of an English prince) could never have invented or sounded the depths of their shallow futility. Poor Francy who, in his "satisfactory quarters at the Hotel Ritz," proves granite to the wiles of American girls and Brazilian heiresses, succumbs to the match-making devices of the English matron, Lady Ballington, who inveigles him to "the land of the free," and the delights of Crooksham Hall. Here he is run down by her niece, Ursula Atherton, a determined young lady, who sings to him the patriotic song, "There's a land, a dear land where our vigour of soul, Is fed by the tempests that blow from the Pole." The royal quarry escapes to Scotland, is lured back to Crooksham Hall, and, after making a fresh break for Monte Carlo, is carried off again by the indefatigable Lady Ballington, on her brother's yacht, for a cruise on the Mediterranean. There is a short romantic interlude in which Dorothy's claims are wiped off the board, and, at Naples, the persevering Ursula at last reaps the reward of her pertinacity and carries off the spoil:—

> "'. . . . I expressed what I felt so deeply—my gratitude to Ursula and her aunt for their Samaritan charity. Did I express myself too warmly, or did she misinterpret my words? I cannot say how it happened, but suddenly in broken words she avowed that it was love for poor unhappy Francy that had been the mainspring of her actions, a love that she would not suppress although she knew only too well the secret of my heart.
> "'"I have but one desire," she said, "and that is to be ever at your side, dear Francy, to smooth life's path for you, and with my own hands to remove the rough stones from under your feet. I am young, I am strong, and you have suffered——"
> "'She took my hand in hers, and before I could restrain her she kissed it, and on it I felt the hot tears she could not repress. Heavens! what was I to do? I was taken so absolutely by surprise.'"

There is a dying struggle. The lady is repulsed for the night, and in the morning showed "no trace of emotion and greeted me with her usual cheerful self-possession," but on the next page but one we read: "I feel like a man whose ship is nearing the harbour, and Ursula—my wife—stands at the helm." And here we may leave the Grand Duke's story, which, as the old advertisement has it, is "one that no gentleman's library should be without."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

As a pleasant and useful handbook, "South Africa at Home," by Robert H. Fuller (George Newnes. 5s. net), may be heartily commended. The author was the head-master of the Dale College, King Williamstown, the leading institution of its kind on the frontier of the Colony, and had unique opportunities for obtaining trustworthy information and for studying the inside life of the many races who form South Africa's population. The result of his labours is a volume crammed with data and authoritative opinions expressed with a wise and kindly moderation. Mr. Fuller leaves recent politics alone; his aim has been to visualise the scenery, the social and educational life of the country and to give an idea of those industries with which the latter is bound up. He has very little to say of the gold mines, and not much more of De Beers and diamonds. From what he writes on Boers and Britons, blacks and whites, one deduces that his main endeavour is to put forward the best side of everybody and everything connected with his subject. Perhaps he carries this tendency a little to excess; but, after all, the middle view, if we may thus describe his attitude towards the racial problem, is the one that is held by the majority of the people who know the country. Mr. Fuller forecasts the perfect fusion of Boer and Briton in the near future, and his description of their present amicable relationship should be read by stay-at-home persons who endeavour to picture it as something else. He sees possibilities of a problem arising, as between colonists and natives, but is no alarmist on this point; its solution, in his opinion, rests with prudent statesmanship at the right moment. Many of his descriptions of the country, which he has thoroughly explored, give proof of poetic imagination, and the whole book has a freshness and optimism that are good to find. The last chapter is contributed by Mr. G. K. Clive Fuller. It is headed, "Racial Instinct for Sport," and deals with the Boer youth as a football player in a sympathetic manner. His good opinion of their sporting instinct should act as a gentle reproof to those who imagine we have a monopoly of this commodity. The book is suitably illustrated from photographs.

As an example of artistic book production, Mr. Edward Penfield's "Holland" (Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. net) may be highly commended. The print is large and judiciously spaced, and the colour printing is not only of high quality, but is seen to the greatest advantage against the olive-green inter-leaves to which the prints are attached. The author and illustrator is an American artist who can vary his style with his subject. Some of the studies of boats and houses are as imitative as an architectural drawing, while in the more pictorial efforts he shows himself fully capable of massing brave colour into an effective design. At times, again, as in the drawing that faces p. 39, the simplicity of method reminds one of the "Noah's Ark" friezes of Mr. Cecil Aldin. In his text Mr. Penfield describes his country prettily enough from the artist's standpoint. His nationality betrays itself, perhaps, in the naïveness with which he discovers the Isle of Marken, which is by this time about as familiar to our artists as Margate is to the London tripper, and in the calm proposition for the American appropriation of an old house in Amsterdam. He urges "some historical society" of New York to cut up the latter into sections and transport it for re-erection across the Atlantic, as if the only things necessary for the accomplishment of this fell scheme were American dollars and ancestor-worship. However, he seems to have sympathy with the unemotional Dutch among whom he sojourned. The introductory tale of "Kris Kringle" is tender and graceful enough in sentiment to prepossess one in favour of what follows.

The "English Officer" who recently gave us "Society Recollections in Paris and Vienna," has followed up that book by "More Society Recollections" (John Long, 12s. net). We regret that we are unable to see any reason for the publication of these recollections. They contain nothing fresh or significant, and the book is made up of commonplace gossip or equally commonplace descriptions of such places as Homburg, Baden, Carlsbad, and Würtemberg. We are also given a number of illustrations, many of them representing the ladies of the ballet who adorn the Continental capitals. Slightly more interesting are the few concluding pages which describe an expedition to Lhasa and an interview with the Dalai Lama, which the author, in company with a brother officer, was fortunate enough to obtain. But the general contents of the book are distinctly small beer.

The last of three books on Yorkshire, penned and illustrated in color by Mr. Gordon Home, deals with the "Vales and Wolds" (Black, 7s. 6d. net) in the southern part of a county which the author has explored pretty thoroughly. The area covered extends from the coast-line between Filey and Spurn Head to a point as far west as Haworth, the home of the Brontës in the West Riding, and the writing, while varying somewhat in the interest of its matter, is, on the whole, sympathetic beyond the ordinary. Mr. Home is best, perhaps, in describing the general character of the wolds and of the coast scenery, and in recalling the town of Ravenserodd, on the Humber, which was swept away by floods in the fourteenth century. When he comes to the manufacturing towns—Hull, Leeds, Selby, and so forth—he appears to be oppressed by their smoke and noise, and his literary spirits flag perceptibly in the rather prosy historical retrospects of neighbouring places of interest, to which he treats us. York, however, as the city most tenacious of its medievalism, rouses him to enthusiasm. He criticises the mean surroundings of Beverley Minster, and urges their betterment. We can remember that less than half a century ago the approaches to York Minster were equally, if not more, undesirable, so there is reasonable hope that his desire may be accomplished in the case of Beverley, though the improvement will not be effected by any "government with a mandate for beautifying England," for which our author sighs! The water-color illustrations are somewhat uneven in their artistic appeal. It may be that the sunset effects, to which the artist is extremely partial, do not readily lend themselves to reproduction by the three-color process; at any rate, the thin and metallic quality of several of these skies is a disturbing factor. Among the more convincing drawings are those of Wressle Castle and Bootham Bar, York.

"The British Year Book of Agriculture and Agricultural Who's Who, 1908-9" (Vinton, 5s. net) is an excellent work of reference for agriculturists all over the world, and is the most ambitious attempt yet made to bring together in one volume a complete handbook of British agriculture. The volume is divided into ten parts, and extends to close upon 600 pages. Part II. is particularly interesting, as it brings together in a concise form full information respecting each county, with the acreage under respective crops, numbers of live stock, population, and full particulars as to agricultural education, scholarships, local facilities of analyses, and advice for farmers, with a complete list of correspondents of the Board of Agriculture and other officers. Part X., devoted to Agricultural Who's Who, is quite a unique feature, and comprises brief biographies of about 2,000 persons officially and prominently connected with agriculture.

Mr. W. Biscombe Gardner is a water-colorist of the older school, who perfectly understands the requirements of the three-color process, and works accordingly. Mr. A. R. Hope Moncrieff is the author of several picturesque guides, including one on Derbyshire. Between them they have contributed a volume on "The Peak Country" (Black, 6s. net) to a now famous series of color books; and if conscientious workmanship in the pictures and a neat style in the letterpress were the highest possibilities for this class of work, their joint effort would spell perfection. For ordinary people who wish to recall their journeyings in Derbyshire it will do very well indeed. It tells them all that is essential to know about the Peak itself, otherwise Kinderscout, about Matlock, Buxton, Castleton, Chatsworth, and Haddon Hall; it gives them most of their well-loved and most familiar quotations relating to the district; it imparts less familiar information concerning the origin of the name of The Peak and the establishment of the first hydro at Matlock. Moreover, it is written with a sprightliness that prevents one getting bored. The only thing it does not accomplish is the exaltation of the ordinary reader above and beyond his ordinary vision. Few color books, indeed, have done this; it requires a more than ordinary power on the part of both author and artist, and this is unfortunately far to seek. But we remember one volume in the same series, in which this power was discoverable, and the fact that a color book can be more than a gracefully elaborated guide-book—can, in fact, be vital, passionate literature—was thereby proved. Still this one stands high in its class, though its class is the second.

The personal views of Mrs. Henry Jenner in regard to the representation of "Our Lady in Art" (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net) may be gauged by her warm appreciation of Luini's Madonnas and her reference to Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment" as "horrible blasphemy." The forcibleness, however, of the last expression does not alter the fact that her little book contains an exhaustive and thoroughly conscientious study of a very big subject. As she observes, the Mother and Child are as common in art as in nature, and they vary almost as much. In art there is no traditional Mary, as there is undoubtedly a traditional Christ; individual artists were content to render the ideal lady of their time and country, subject always, of course, to the regulations laid down by the Church as to her attributes and symbols. The latter were stringent enough, as one may discover by reference to the Byzantine Guide to Painting and to the instructions set forth by the Spaniard, Pacheco, the father-in-law of Velasquez. Different aspects of Our Lady's character belong to different ages. For the first six centuries the Byzantine artists viewed her as the Great Intercessor; in the seventeenth the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception took particularly strong root in Spain, and expressed itself time after time on the canvasses of Murillo. Mrs. Jenner eulogises this painter and many another in accordance with the degree of religious sentiment their works convey to her mind, and discusses virtually every class of picture in which Our Lady figures. The forty-one carefully selected illustrations to her volume enhance the significance of the text.

A Novel-Reader's Guide.—"The Church and Thisbe Grey." By John Le Breton (John Long, 6s.). A powerful indictment of the inefficient way in which Church work is carried on in country districts. The lady "church-workers" are treated with much severity. A distinctly able piece of work.—"Rose MacLeod." By Alice Brown (Constable, 6s.). An American novel. The plot is not well conceived, and many of the situations are improbable, but the characters of Rose and Osmond are fresh and interesting.—"The Mystery of Myrtle Cottage." By Oswald Crawfurd (Chapman & Hall, 6s.) The mystery is not very mysterious. Mr. Crawford hints at a foundation in fact for his novel. It tells the story of two girls who dressed as men and gained considerable success, the one as an artist, the other as a journalist.—"The Wild Widow." By Gertie de S. Wentworth-James (Werner Laurie, 6s.) A sprightly, and in some of its episodes rather risky, tale of a lady who swindles an insurance company. Her subsequent adventures on a chicken farm and in smart society are narrated in a brisk and entertaining fashion.—"Buried Alive." By Arnold Bennett (Chapman & Hall, 6s.) A humorous fantasy, telling of a famous painter who assumes the personality of his deceased valet.—"Young Lord Stranleigh." By Robert Barr (Ward, Lock, 6s.) The hero, while in appearance a lazy man of fashion, shows amazing skill in checkmating a swindling company promoter. Another of his exploits is to save the Bank of England by placing at its disposal about a thousand tons of gold which he has stored in a disused Cornish mine.—"Gilbert Hermer: The Memory of a Man, His Ways, and His Words." Written by the Friend of his Age. Introduction by C. Masefield (Blackwood, 6s.) An excellent character study of a kindly and attractive personality. The writer of the introduction is at pains to disclaim responsibility for the work, the author of which has certainly succeeded in making Gilbert Hermer into a real personage.

The Week in the City.

Whitsuntide caused the usual pause in financial operations, but the emission of new issues has been renewed with fresh vigor, Mr. Harriman's Union Pacific Bonds leading the way. Stock Exchange business became quiet just before the holidays, and profit taking by speculative buyers has arrested the upward movement. The visit to Reval seems to have given more anxiety than hope, and the previous rise in Russian securities seems to have more than discounted the impulse which the visit was expected to give to the credit of Russia. If Russian financiers and statesmen had any sort of competence they could easily regenerate Russia's finances; as it is, they are steering the huge, unwieldy vessel straight towards the rocks. The foreign market was unfavorably affected by liquidation in Berlin, where the meeting at Reval is regarded by many with suspicion as another step in a deliberate anti-German policy. Berlin, moreover, has difficulties of her own, for the comparative dearness of money and the depreciation of German and Prussian funds, combined with the heavy Government borrowing, are all accentuating the general difficulties and discomforts that follow a slump in trade. In spite of this pause the markets do not look like going back, as the low deposit rates and the smaller volume of trade must continue to bring new money into investments.

Trade Prospects.

Just now trade prospects may fairly be identified with harvest prospects; and these are happily good, at least at home and in North America. Our farmers are anticipating another prosperous year, and if the harvest in the United States and Canada comes up to anticipations, we may look for a trade revival. The high price of provisions during the last year must have caused a most serious curtailment in the effective demand of the laboring classes throughout the world for clothing and boots, and other secondary needs. No wonder that Lancashire and the West Riding, and the manufacturing towns of the midlands, have relaxed their prodigious activity. The first sign of a slight rally from the worst came at the recent London wool sales, when buyers competed quite keenly, as if they had suddenly began to realise that wool is very cheap, and that cheapness will stimulate consumption. The Board of Trade returns show that both the value and volume of our foreign trade are much less than a year ago, though the figures are still good in comparison with other years. The commercial depression in the United States, and Canada, and Mexico, is still severe, as seen in the railway returns, and in the amount of unemployment; but there seems to be a little more activity in the textile and iron industries of the Eastern States, where production had fallen off from 25 to 50 per cent. The number of idle cars on the railroads of the United States is still enormous; but none of the big American lines seem to have been so severely hit as the Grand Trunk, whose traffic decreases are on a scale that may well cause uneasiness. The Company has made some ill-advised extensions, which seem likely to prove an unremunerative burden for many years to come.

The Last Account.

The last account was one of the most satisfactory for holders of shares that the Stock Exchange has seen for a long time. Despite a slight reaction at the close, almost all classes of securities rose in value. Home railways and American railways were, perhaps, the most favored. Great Eastern rose 9, while Great Northern Pref. and Def. were both 4¾ better, Great Western 4¼, Great Central Pref. 3¾, and Brighton Pref. 3½. Among Americans, Union Pacific gained 7 points, Northern Pacific 6½, and Louisville 4. There was a big business in foreign bonds, which are very popular with investors—Russian, Japanese, Spanish, Portuguese, Greek, Argentine, and Chilian all showing substantial gains. Among foreign railways, Mexican First Preference recovered 3 points. Possibly the depression in Mexico has now passed its acute stage, but there is the certainty of the President's retirement within two years, of which account must be taken.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and of the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

FAMOUS SHILLING GUIDE BOOKS.

These well-known Guide Books are based upon what may be called the "centre" principle, it being assumed that the reader will make one of the well-known tourist resorts or watering places his head-quarters, and explore the surrounding district at his leisure and convenience. Each guide, therefore, deals not only with the town from which it takes its title, but with all places likely to be visited from that town. Several places are, of necessity, described in more than one volume.

Diary of the Week.

A good deal of alarm has been created by a report that the Kaiser, in addressing a body of cavalry last week at Döberitz, after inspection, made the following speech:—

> "Well, it certainly looks just as if they were trying to encircle us and bring us to bay, but we can put up with that. The German never fought better than when he had to defend himself on all sides. Let them all come. We are ready."

Both the alleged date and the wording of this speech have been discredited, but it is not denied that, about the date of the announcement of the Reval visit the Kaiser used some pointed words of encouragement to his soldiers. The French Press has taken the story coolly, the "Temps" saying satirically that while no one proposes to invade Germany, the Kaiser has a right to say to German soldiers what no French general would be allowed to say to French conscripts. We dwell on the incident at length in our leading columns.

Mr. Roosevelt has declined a third-time Presidency in order to constitute himself for the moment the Grand Elector of the nation. His powerful personal campaign for Mr. Taft has secured his lieutenant's nomination by the Republican Convention, and he will thus enjoy the virtual, if not the actual, direction of the politico-social policy which his second Presidency initiated. The enthusiasm for him has been unexampled. His name was cheered for fifty minutes in a scene of the calculated abandonment which marks American political Conventions, where strategy and hero-worship go together. A word, a hint, from the listening President, who is said to have followed every phase of the Convention through the telephone, would have secured nomination, and probably an overwhelming vote for a third Presidency. But his will prevailed, and his nominee was finally chosen on Thursday.

Mr. Taft received 702 votes, exactly the number predicted for him by Mr. Roosevelt, whose nice calculation of the working of the machine was thus justified. This is a novel practice for an acting President, but Mr. Roosevelt's control of the Republican platform, on which his old War Secretary is to stand, has not been so complete. In spite of Mr. Gompers's action, the anti-injunction plank has been much weakened, and even if the law is changed, the American workmen will obtain nothing like the charter which our own Trades Disputes Act gives to British trade unions and workers. The authority of the Courts is to be upheld, but the modes of procedure are to be more accurately defined, and injunctions are not to be issued without notice. The other chief planks are a strengthening of the anti-Trust Law and further State control of inter-State corporations, and a revision of the tariff based on a moveable scale of maximum and minimum rates, according to the way in which foreign countries treat American goods. This should lead to a reduction of the tariff in favor of free-trading Great Britain.

The second reading of the Old Age Pensions Bill was carried on Wednesday by 417 votes to 29. The 29 consisted of a small body of 28 Conservatives, not unfitly shepherded by Mr. Harold Cox, who proposed an amendment calling for a system of State insurance, and delivered the most brilliant criticism of the Bill. The majority included 37 Conservatives, mostly of the Protectionist wing, though Mr. Austen Chamberlain followed Mr. Balfour and Mr. Walter Long and walked out of the House. Apart from Mr. Cox's attack, the Opposition confined themselves to arraying a set of small and shadowy objections, ending in their decision to abstain from voting. Mr. Balfour, indeed, excused himself for his failure to propose a system of pensions by significantly pleading the cost and pre-occupation of the South African War. But while hinting that the Bill should touch disablement, which after all is largely covered by the Compensation Act, he refrained from following Mr. Cox in advocacy of the German system of compulsory insurance.

Mr. Lloyd George's careful and interesting speech contained some hints of a revision of the plan of the Bill. He set the "probable ultimate cost" of the scheme at seven and a-half millions, declaring himself ready to adopt a sliding scale, and to modify at least the wording of the character test, which he described as an industry test, while insisting that "loafers and wastrels" must be excluded. He also proposed to insert a series of qualifications for a pension, such as membership of a friendly society or a trade union. The disqualification of paupers, he hinted, would be "provisional" on a general scheme of Poor Law Reform, and he also suggested his desire to deal with the problem of physical infirmity. Mr. Cox's chief point was that, while the English Bill would only benefit half a-million of people under a partial and arbitrary system, the German plan took in fourteen millions of people, and distributed fairly a great variety of benefits. The Prime Minister, in closing the debate, declared that the inclusion of paupers must add nearly three millions to the cost of the scheme, but that it was temporary, and he practically promised an amendment of the character clause. He asked eloquently whether, because the question was complex, and the Bill imperfect, men were to sit still and watch the tragedy of dependent old age "with dumb lips and with folded arms, with bewildered brains and palsied energies."

The Pan-Anglican Congress was opened on Monday with an "intercession service" in Westminster, which, in its extreme simplicity of ritual and vestments, seems to have disappointed the High Church Party. The Congress was greeted by the Prime Minister in a speech of great eloquence and sincerity at a dinner given by the Pilgrims' Club. Mr. Asquith asked what contribution the Congress would make to the great cause of "peace, unity, and concord." "It would almost seem," he continued, "as if the one and only sovereign specific against war upon which the Christian nations of the world are all agreed is the insistent multiplication and equipment of the instruments, human and inanimate, of destruction; but I am one of those who think, at any rate, that they can discern behind and beneath this disheartening spectacle the silent movement of pacifying and reconciling forces."

The actual work of the Congress has been divided between social entertainments and a series of monster meetings in the Albert Hall and elsewhere. No votes have been taken, the Chairmen of the sections simply summing up the debates. On the marriage question the tendency seemed to be to take the anti-State attitude of the fanatical High Churchmen, and to refuse marriage, and acknowledgment of marriage, to divorced persons, even when innocent of adultery. On other questions, such as the development of religious truth, the criticism and interpretation of the Bible, the acceptance of scientific doctrine such as evolution, the inspiration of the non-Christian churches, and the toleration of non-Christian social forms, like polygamy, the tone was more tolerant. Sweating and the minimum wage as its cure, the evils of the housing system, Christian Science, and Agnosticism were also discussed with considerable breadth and freedom. Professor Sorley, in speaking on Agnosticism, regretted that the Pope had united the "living body of Christian theology and the corpse of scholasticism." The strong Episcopal influence and bent of the Congress has, however, been evident throughout.

On Wednesday the "Times," basing itself on a remark of the Bishop of Limerick that the Universities Bill proceeded on principles "foreign to our Church," suggested that the Irish Bishops were hostile. It further hinted that Rome itself disapproved, and demanded of Mr. Birrell that he should say "Aye or No," whether he had obtained the good will of the Pope. On Thursday the statement of the Irish hierarchy, signed by Cardinal Logue, appeared in its pages, declaring almost the precise contrary. It stated that the Bill was drawn on lines "suited to the educational needs of the country, and likely to lead to finality on the Universities question," but objected, on various grounds, to the non-residential character of the Dublin University, and refused to promise to send the art students of Maynooth to reside in Dublin. This last objection was met in the Committee by the rejection, on Mr Birrell's strong and impassioned plea, of Mr. Butcher's amendment which required a period of two years' study at a constituent college of one of the two Universities as a condition of taking a degree. He insisted that the Senate of the University should decide what disability should attach to the affiliation of any college. The Chief Secretary carried his point, in face of some rather strong Nonconformist protests, by 32 to 16, so that the Bill is probably safe.

The Prime Minister, who is managing his party with much tact, spoke brilliantly at the National Liberal Club on Saturday, in exposition of the Ministerial programme. He insisted on the necessity of a "larger concentration of effort on a smaller number of subjects," and hinted at the necessity of carrying over Bills from one session to another. He still hoped for an educational settlement short of the sectarian or the secular solution, and declared that the Licensing Bill must be carried through all its stages in the Commons before the Session closed. Dealing with the criticisms of The Nation on the Pensions Bill, he stated that no general test of character should be imposed, but that the exclusion of the "wastrel" was desirable. As to paupers, there was to be no permanent disqualification, and the exception only applied to the present year. The whole question of "classification" would arise under the coming reform of the Poor Law, but meanwhile the Guardians must be restrained from transferring the whole burden of pauperism from rates to taxes.

The Tory Party, which, as Mr. McCrae said, are trying to bring about compulsory service by making voluntary service impossible, attacked Mr. Haldane's territorial scheme on Thursday, on the debate on the Army Estimates, chiefly on the ground of the smallness of the new force, the inadequacy of the artillery, and the weakness of the local organisations, which, Mr. Lee said, meant the setting up of ninety-three War Offices. We agree with Mr. Lee that this would be in the nature of a national disaster. Mr. Haldane replied with a statement as to the progress of the force. He stated that over 50 per cent. of the 300,000 men at whom he aims had joined, 69 per cent. of whom were old Volunteers, who, however, had only joined for a year. 82 per cent. of the units have now been formed. The best results have been obtained with Yeomanry. A caustic comment on this statement was that more yeomanry had joined because the force had practically been unchanged. Sir Charles Dilke's criticism was that there existed no sufficient material for a striking force, and that the new "terriers" were the old Volunteers under a new name, only that there were fewer of them. Another criticism was that it was not clear whether the territorials were really intended for home defence, or to act as an army reserve, reinforcing the regulars in a foreign campaign.

There has been no appeal to arms yet in Persia, but the Shah has been gaining ground, and the Parliament losing it in its anxiety to avert civil war. The agitation against the Shah has spread to the provincial cities, which are sending support to the Mejliss, and some of them have telegraphed deposing him. On Friday, however, the Mejliss obeyed the Shah's order to disperse the armed Nationalists of Teheran; but it drew up a memorial recounting the Shah's breaches of the Constitution, and threatening to dissolve if he would not co-operate in restoring popular confidence. The Shah replied sternly that he was not prepared to lose without an appeal to the sword the inheritance his father had won by the sword, and he arrested some Nationalist leaders. What the Parliament's next step will be is unknown, but the temper of the populace is firmer than that of its representatives, for the shopkeepers of Teheran have persisted in closing despite a royal prohibition accompanied by the threat of confiscation.

The publication of the Anglo-Belgian correspondence in reference to the Congo has rather eased the situation in Belgium. Sir Edward Grey pressed the necessity for abolishing forced labor, "differing in name only from slavery," giving the natives land and freeing commerce; but he made clear England's sympathetic attitude towards annexation by Belgium accompanied by reform. The international difficulty is now believed in Belgium to be removed, and a good many Liberals are likely to vote for annexation. King Leopold has refused to lower his price, and the Government will stand or fall by the treaty of cession as it is. It will probably be carried. Though some of the "young" Catholics would like it amended, they are hardly likely to persist in opposition, seeing that the signal demonstration at the Parliamentary elections against annexation has not been fortified at the provincial elections, which, despite their offering the whole of the country the opportunity to express an opinion, have resulted in no appreciable shifting of parties.

The city of Alcazar, with a mehella of 2,000 men encamped there, has gone over to Mulai Hafid, whose power now extends to within two days' march of Tangier. The French jingoes are striving hard to avert his inevitable recognition by the Powers. The "Temps" has printed letters to prove that Mulai Hafid is anti-European and anti-French, but the "Débats" recognises that if they are genuine they witness only to his tactical necessities, and it condemns the perilous manœuvre of trying to convert him into an enemy. No credence can be given to the French stories that Mulai Hafid is resorting to oppressive methods to raise money, and that he both lacks funds and is alienating his supporters; while there is very good reason to believe that the Morocco Bank has already cut off Abdul Aziz's credit, and refuses to honor his drafts. The acknowledgment of Mulai Hafid is a bitter pill to M. Clemenceau, but it looks as though he were slowly bracing himself to swallow it.

The students' strike in Austria is one result of the campaign against Modernism. Professor Wahrmund, under clericalist pressure—the Christian Socialists are the strongest party in the Reichsrat—was forbidden to lecture at Innsbrück for having written a modernist pamphlet. The students protested against this attack upon academic liberty, but when the University Senate arranged a compromise, under which Professor Wahrmund was to give seminar instruction but not to lecture, the Government refused its sanction. Thereupon the Innsbrück students struck, and the University was closed. The movement spread to the other Austrian Universities, and all the German Universities and colleges, and some of the Czech have joined in the strike. The holidays gave an opportunity for making peace, and during last week-end all the Rectors were summoned to Vienna. Professor Wahrmund has consented to suspension, and the Rectors have issued a manifesto affirming their confidence that no danger is impending to academic freedom, and calling upon the students to resume work, as, in default, the Universities will be closed completely for the summer term. The appeal does not look like being obeyed.

The text of the Indian Press Act has reached this country. Its language strikes us as dangerously wide. The preamble states the expediency of providing for "incitements to disorder" in newspapers, and the chief clause permits the summary confiscation of the plant of a newspaper which, in the opinion of a magistrate, contains any "incitement to murder," or to "any act of violence." Surely this phrasing would cover suppression for a strong, or violent, article which happened to be followed in the town or neighbourhood by a turbulent political meeting. We think that this is not the kind of restraining action which the Indian Secretary contemplates.

A young Russian Jew, Mr. Selig Brodetsky, living with his father in Cecil Street, Mile End, has this year been bracketed with Mr. Ibbotson as Senior Wrangler. Mr. Brodetsky the elder came to England as a "greener," and his brilliant son supported himself at Trinity by winning a series of scholarships which covered the whole cost of his maintenance and left a margin over. His father explains that if he had delayed his immigration until after the passing of the Aliens Act he would have been shut out, for he would not have possessed the necessary five pounds. Under the same law, of course, we should have lost the enrichment of English character and industries which we owe to the flight of the Huguenots to these shores. The "Westminster Gazette," by the way, notes that the great public schools make a singularly small contribution to the Mathematical Honors List.

The annual return showing the number of experiments on living animals under vivisection licences, was issued on Thursday. It states that the total number of experiments made upon animals in 1907 was 73,374, or 27,301 more than in 1906. Of these 70,794 were performed without anæsthetics, the great majority being inoculations which, while practically painless at the moment of operation, frequently cause acute distress to the animal operated on in later stages. The return also shows an increase of 27,507 over last year's figures in the number of animals experimented on without the use of anæsthetics. This increase is accounted for by the progress of cancer investigation. 45,302 animals were used for this purpose at three institutions. The infringements of the vivisection regulations are said not to be of a serious character. All are explained as misunderstandings or inadvertence as to the terms of the licences held. We think that trained scientists might be expected to take the trouble to inform themselves concerning the exact powers provided by the licences they hold. The whole question of vivisection inspection and licences is assuming large proportions, and will have to be dealt with seriously when the Commission now sitting issues its final report.

Sir John Day, who retired from his Judgeship nearly seven years ago, died on Saturday in his eighty-second year. Without being a great advocate, a great lawyer, or a great judge, he was associated with two considerable public events—the Royal Commission on the Belfast Riots of 1896, of which he was the chairman, and the Parnell Commission, on which he sat, after fierce criticism of his appointment, in absolute silence. Personally a man of engaging temper, he had medieval ideas on punishment, and his sentences for sexual crimes, blackmailing, and violent assaults were so harsh that both Bench and Bar rejoiced when his judgeship came to an end. His practice in these matters upset not only modern ideas of justice, but all notion of equality of sentences.—Lord Derby, who died on Sunday, aged sixty-seven, was a Conservative statesman of some note. He suffered from comparison with his brilliant father and his elder brother, who, though not at all brilliant, was for some few years an almost commanding force in British statesmanship. Lord Derby was not at all commanding, but he made a fair Secretary for War and for the Colonies, and a good Governor-General for Canada. He was a tolerable speaker, without possessing his brother's curious impressiveness or his father's fire.

The readers of page 15 of the "Times" this (Friday) morning will conclude that they have bought a three-penny edition of the "Daily Mirror." The greater part of the page is given up to social and personal gossip. Two and a-half columns of this consist largely of descriptions of the dresses and appearances of the ladies who went to Ascot. A column and a-half is taken up with chatter about chiffons. We remember no issue of the "Times" which has been so defaced. We are informed that the writer was "struck with Lady Kinnoul's very brilliant yellow." He (or she) was similarly affected by the sight of another lady's "quaint mauve-colored dress." The same introspective genius is able to certify that "never were shoes neater or stockings daintier," and observes with pleasure that a "plastron of Irish lace" modified a dress which "otherwise would have been severely Directoire." There are perhaps 2,000 words of this dressmakers' drivel. To this measure has Printing House Square come.

The exhibition of Mr. John Lavery's work at the Goupil Gallery is representative of every phase of this well-known Scottish artist. Among the important portraits are those of Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., and of the artist, the latter having been painted for the Uffizzi Gallery, Florence; while the fruits of Mr. Lavery's sojourn in Tangier are seen in a variety of pictures and studies of land and sea. One of the most successful of these is "The Housetops—Night," a silvery moonlight view of Tangier; while "Tangier Bay—Moonlight," and "The Sea-shore—Moonlight," are nocturnes whose broad Whistlerian harmony is genuine in its beauty. The study of a girl's head, entitled "The Halo," and characterised by its dead brown flesh tones, might almost be called an excursion into the mystical. Other figure work includes numerous small portrait sketches, which are perhaps the most attractive exhibits of this section. Distinguished by their crisp handling, they are not marred, or, at any rate, not to the same extent as are some of his larger portraits, by the peculiarities of flesh color that tinge most of his recent work with unpleasantness. They emphasise the attractions of his method and his power of graceful composition without calling attention to manneristic blemishes.

WANTED, AN UNDERSTANDING WITH GERMANY.

If the speech which some of the obscurer German newspapers have ascribed to the Kaiser were authentic, the Reval visit might be destined to prelude an acute period of unrest and intrigue in Europe. The German Press, despite two violent outbursts in powerful papers, preserved a remarkable self-control. There had been no lack of provocation. The "Temps" had talked of a new triple alliance directed against Germany. Even a phase of Liberal opinion in England and Russia had defended the rapprochement against its critics, mainly on the ground that it would erect a barrier against German influence at St. Petersburg. If the Kaiser had talked about the new development of the policy of "isolation" and "penning-in," his language might have been indiscreet, but not unnatural. In point of fact, he has made no public pronouncement, and the most that is probable is that, speaking as a soldier among soldiers, he has made one of his customary private exhortations to his officers, designed rather to stimulate their professional zeal than to frighten the German public. When he is really minded to rattle the sabre, he chooses a conspicuous platform, with a serviceable sounding-board. The incident, even if the few witnesses were agreed on such trivial matters as its date and its occasion, would not be alarming. It would merely serve to warn us once more that, in consolidating our "league of peace," we have left outside it the one Power which might be disposed to trouble the repose of Europe. A system of understandings arranged on this basis might be justified as a preventive measure, if the risk of war or turmoil were really acute. But it neither disarms nor conciliates the enemy. The danger, whatever it be, subsists, and German diplomacy is certain to continue its traditional strategy of seeking out the weak points in the league, straining the loyalty of its members, and raising complications unforeseen when its basis was laid. Russia, acutely divided against itself, and cursed with an inheritance of adventure in the Far East and the Near East alike, will always be a tempting subject for these Bismarckian manœuvres.

The optimists are already looking to the Anglo-Russian understanding for a solution of the Macedonian question. It is some gain that Great Britain and Russia have come to terms on a programme of reform. That, however, was work for the diplomatists, and it is unnecessary to assume that Russia would have made the visit to Reval a part of the price which we pay for her assent. But a programme of reforms countersigned by two Powers is not yet a programme adopted by the Concert, still less by Abdul Hamid. A generation ago England and Russia, had they been agreed, might have settled the Eastern Question. They are no longer the dominant forces in Constantinople. The more the policy of reform is put forward as an Anglo-Russian policy, at a moment when the world is once more talking of "encircling" Germany, the more probable is it that Austro-German influences will make themselves felt in the other scale of the balance. Sir Edward Grey's reforms were a very nicely-adjusted minimum. Carried out in their entirety, they would transform Macedonia. But, subjected to three successive processes of revision, first to secure the co-operation of Russia, then to command the approval of the Concert, and, lastly, to obtain the assent of the Porte, they may fail to effect any real change in desperate anarchy beyond the Balkans. If we are to have a solution by consent and without a breach of the peace, it is no less essential to secure German neutrality than to win Russian approbation. The Concert, to do anything effective, must be unanimous, and we certainly have not been at pains to conciliate German susceptibilities. There is already much going and coming between Berlin and Constantinople. Rumour speaks of a projected visit from the Kaiser to the Sultan as the answer to the King's visit to Reval. It is even suggested that Turkey may openly enter the Triple Alliance. These are probably exaggerations of possibilities, which, in a less melodramatic form, may still influence the future of the Near Eastern Question. If England and Russia were quite resolute and single-minded, even these obstacles might be overcome.

But, as always in dealing with Russia, we are confronted by the fact that she is a dual personality. Public opinion, even Liberal opinion, in Russia would favor a forward movement in the Near East, and might even tolerate an adventure. But the Court, which made the Japanese war, has never withdrawn its gaze from the Far East. M. Stolypin has forced through the Duma his Amur Railway Bill, which projects the building at high pressure, within the next four years, of a purely strategic line though a desert and almost uninhabitable country, at a capital cost of forty and an annual charge of three millions, without reckoning the cost of the fortifications and reinforcements which are also proposed. It has always been a part of German policy to engage Russia as deeply as possible in the Far East, and it is significant that the Court party, which is responsible for this fantastic scheme, is also the Pro-German Party. In reckoning on Russia as an ally in the Near East, we have to remember these cross-currents at the centre, and these vast and risky commitments at the extremity of her Empire. With such projects before her, can she, or will she, concentrate on a work in the Near East which may involve a grave diplomatic conflict with the Power which controls the Baltic and dominates the future of Poland? In winning her assent to a paper programme of Macedonian reform, we are only on the threshold of our real task. That task could be achieved without an outbreak if we could secure the benevolent neutrality of the Kaiser. From that essential condition of success we were, to all appearance, never further than we are to-day. Once more we come back to this elementary principle—that peace, to be fruitful as well as secure, involves an understanding from which no Power can be safely excluded. To isolate Germany is to invite her to play a wrecking game at Constantinople.

The ultimate test of any foreign policy is its influence upon the domestic fortunes of a nation. Sir Edward Grey is a pacific Minister; he is also attempting much for a disinterested work of humanity in Turkey. But if his conduct of our European policy involves us in a yet more accentuated naval competition, the balance of gain is overwhelmingly against it. The encircling of Germany may end by ensuring the arrest of Old Age Pensions at its initial and fragmentary stage. Given the present relations between London, Paris, St. Petersburg, and Berlin, and there can be no hope of a friendly adjustment of naval programmes. The race must go on, until sooner or later one rival or the other decides that armed peace is more costly than the "inevitable" war. If our understandings were frankly alliances, we should at least be able to add the naval resources of France to our own in our competitive reckonings. But at present we have all the risks of an alliance and none of the securities. If there are secret conventions, they cannot be used to answer the alarmists. For our part, we have always held that the material for a bargain exists. The instructions given to Sir Edward Fry at the Hague, make it clear that, despite the tenor of his public speeches, Sir Edward Grey was at one time prepared to consider our renunciation of the right of commerce-destruction, as a bait to induce Germany to arrest the increase of her fleet. Whether it was French influence or the arguments of our own naval experts which induced him to depart from that hopeful attitude, the documents do not allow us to decide. But here, we are convinced, still lies the hope of an accommodation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, since he assumed office, has twice warned the Commons that the whole future of the projects of social reform depends on his ability to repress the exigencies of the fighting services. We cannot retire from the competition with Germany, save by inducing her to modify her programme. If that programme is sincerely defensive, she could not be insensible to an offer from us which would make our fleet less of a potential menace to the world's commerce, while leaving it as a defensive force a more manageable task to discharge. To renounce the right of capture at sea is to lay down a weapon of offence, and by the same act to secure our own commerce from peril. Until we have exhausted this method of approach, it is premature to assume that Germany is the one Power in the civilised world with which we can conclude no pact or understanding.

THE LIMITATIONS OF THE PENSIONS BILL.

The country as a whole has accepted the principle of non-contributory pensions for the aged. The Government's Bill, despite criticism of detail, has the united support of the Liberal and Labor Parties. Official Unionism, as represented by Mr. Balfour, is willing to wound but desperately afraid to strike. Effective opposition is left to Mr. Harold Cox and the Old Guard of Economic Individualism which is no longer an army in being. The country has made up its mind to a fuller responsibility for the condition of the poor, and it is not the aged poor alone who will benefit by the new spirit. To discriminate between poverty and pauperism, to make the vast wealth of the country available for securing the minimum requirements of civilised subsistence without loss of personal independence to all who do not forfeit their right by overt misdoing, is coming to be recognised as a distinct duty of the State. The present Bill is the first fruit of the new principle, but not the least valuable part of Mr. Lloyd George's powerful speech on the Second Reading was the plain hint that the Government are feeling their way to the application of the same principle to the treatment of the infirm and the unemployed. Those who oppose this legislation in the interests of Free Trade finance are taking a risky course. The aim of the more advanced Tariff Reformers is to give the same boons to the poor, but to make the poor pay for them through taxes on food and the common articles of consumption. The problem of Free Trade finance is to show that the burden can be placed where it ought to rest—on the vast surplus wealth of the community. If Free Trade fails, the working classes will be tempted to try Tariff Reform. The true opposition—and we owe a debt to Mr. Lloyd George for emphasising it—is not between Free Trade finance and social legislation, but between reproductive social expenditure and the waste of money in panic-bred extravagance upon armaments. The future of social legislation will depend in the main on the efforts of the economists to resist those daughters of the horseleech whose cry, "Give, give," goes up incessantly from the War Office and the Admiralty. We shall probably want seven millions next year for pensions. The scheme is threatened with grave limitations and drawbacks for the want of another million. Those who care for the lot of the poor must be prepared through the autumn to give careful attention to naval and military policy, that they may be in a position to resist in next year's estimates the attempt to draw the provision for the poor into the insatiable maw of the military and naval expert.

Mr. Lloyd George warns us not to press him too far, lest the financial burden be overdone and the whole scheme be broken down. We recognise the danger, and we gladly admit that he has shown an open mind on the points of detail which we selected for criticism. He has hinted a reduction of the age limit for the disabled, on the lines often advocated here. He is prepared to accept a sliding scale, provided that the total cost be not increased. We hope that he will not content himself with a scale which will merely level up all incomes, say, from 8s. to a maximum of 13s, but will adopt some such scale as that which we have before suggested, whereby the pension would be gradually diminished. For example, if a man with 8s. a week gets 5s., we would suggest that one with 10s. a week should receive 4s., that one with 12s. should have 3s., and so on. This is the only method by which we can avoid discouraging thrift within the limits affected. More serious, however, in our judgment, are the two remaining disqualifications. As to the character test, the spirit both of the Prime Minister's and Mr. Lloyd George's speeches is excellent. To carry it into effect it will, we think, be necessary to delete entirely the words that enjoin a general inquisition into character. The proposal to exempt certain classes from the inquisition does not seem to us happily conceived. There should be no general inquisition at all. If it can be definitely established by the evidence of Poor Law Authorities that a man or woman has been habitually relying on the support of the ratepayers, and refusing work when it was available, that is a fair ground of disqualification which might be definitely established by tangible evidence. Any more general disqualification than this opens the door to great variation in methods of administration, deprives the pension scheme of its greatest asset—its certainty—and admits of all the abuses of an indefinite reference to a tribunal adjudicating without fixed principles of decision, or established canons of evidence. The economies to be expected from this test are not great, on Mr. George's showing, and are not likely to be at all proportionate to the vexation caused by them. They maintain in the pension scheme much of that arbitrariness which is a main objection to the present administration of the poor law, and keeps the aged poor in a state of dependence. We hope the Government will deal with the matter boldly, and sweep away from the disqualification all words of general meaning, admitting of loose and uncertain interpretation.

There remains the more difficult question of the exclusion of paupers. Mr. Lloyd George tells us that this is a vanishing disqualification. But how is it to vanish? Only by the effort to keep old people under seventy off the rates. The aged themselves will make the effort and so will their friends. That is so far a good thing. But the Guardians are expected to back them up. Every man approaching seventy who comes before them will, says Mr. Lloyd George, "be induced to wait." Now we know that from sixty-five onwards the proportion of the very poor who are forced to seek relief increases with every year, and the number who can hold out till seventy must be relatively small. The result of this part of the Bill will be to subject these people to a greatly increased pressure. They will be confronted with a new reluctance to admit them to relief, and the measure which will lighten the lot of their somewhat more fortunate contemporaries will chastise them with scorpions instead of whips. They will have to pass an ordeal of increased severity in order to reach the not very luxurious haven of five shillings a week at seventy. We doubt whether the majority will ever succeed, and, if not, the strange result of this Bill will be that a measure avowedly based on the inability of the poorest to contribute to a pension scheme will have been used as an argument for pensioning those who are rather better off, leaving the worst sufferers in the cold. Let us suppose two cases to illustrate the effect. One is a widow left with twenty pounds a year. She scrapes along with a little work and a little help from friends till she is seventy, and then comes into her pension, and enjoys her independence and an income of £33 a year for the rest of her days. The other is a widow left with nothing at all. She maintains herself by work till she is sixty-five or sixty-six. Her strength begins to fail, and finally at sixty-nine she is driven to seek relief. She loses her pension and becomes a pauper for life. The only effect of the Bill is to make her struggle harder, and to make the Guardians draw the purse-strings tighter against her. We hope her lot will not be embittered by a sense of contrast.

Is it quite impossible to help this class? Mr. Lloyd George says it will cost between three and four millions. But that is assuming that indoor as well as outdoor paupers come on to the pension list, and that no return is made from the Guardians. As an interim measure we think the indoor paupers might be excluded. A very large proportion of these can only be cared for in the workhouse or the workhouse infirmaries, and would not wish to leave if they could. Of the rest a considerable proportion are of the loafer class. The exclusion of the present indoor paupers would, we imagine, diminish Mr. George's estimate of numbers by about one-fourth. It would leave us with some 200,000 outdoor paupers to deal with, to pension whom would cost approximately £2,600,000. These people are now in receipt of 2s. 6d. or 3s. a week from the Guardians, and we confess we cannot see the vast difficulty in supplementing this amount instead of taking over the whole payment. It would mean simply that an applicant for a pension next January would be asked if he had been in receipt of relief, say, for six months during the past year. If so, he would receive his pension, but the Pensions Committee would charge the Guardians with the amount that they had been paying him weekly in out-relief. The Guardians could lose very little by this, seeing that of people of seventy who have come on the rates very few indeed ever regain their independence, while the alternative to out-relief is the more expensive indoor-maintenance. What little increase of expenditure might be thus put upon the rates will be far outweighed by the saving to them effected by the pension scheme as a whole. If then the Guardians continued to bear their share of the cost, it would reduce the burden on the Exchequer by about £1,300,000. In that case the total sum to be found will be perhaps 8½ instead of something over seven millions. We do not consider this an excessive price to pay for a change which will prevent the pensions scheme from missing its prime object—the relief of the poorest, who, as the scheme stands, will go to the wall.

THE WEAKNESS OF ANGLICANISM.

The meetings of the Pan-Anglican Congress are an interesting study to those who would find in them a guide to the practical statesmanship and to the inner life and spirit of the Anglican Communion. The idea of the Congress came, not from the present Primate, but from Archbishop Benson. Behind it may have lain the notion of an Anglican Patriarchate, with the ancient See of Canterbury as its centre and source of authority. But we imagine that any such vision of mechanical unity must have faded before the Congress had been long in session. The gathering, we have been told, is not to be regarded as the meeting of "the Church of England," but of "the Church in England"; in other words, of a non-affiliated branch of the universal church, meeting, as Mr. Frere put it, in sympathy with "the catholicity of Rome and the orthodoxy of the East." This is one view. But it has been sharply opposed by another, that of the Dean of Canterbury, who, on the second day of the Congress declined to regard the Church as other than a distinctively Anglican organisation, bound by the Reformation, and holding to its national and Imperial mission and responsibilities. This, again, comes in conflict with the admission of the Bishops from the United States, as well as with the view of the High Churchmen, who refuse in terms to date the origin of Anglicanism from the sixteenth or the seventeenth centuries. We do not know what issue may come from the secret convention of Bishops which is to follow the open Congress. But where no penetrating spirit of unity exists no compelling voice of authority can well be raised. The High Churchmen failed in their endeavor to persuade Leo XIII., who was not altogether unwilling to be persuaded, of the validity of Anglican Orders. The door to that way of "unity" is therefore closed, and at least two sections of the Church breathed a sigh of relief when Rome came to her decision. Neither do we believe in any approach of the freer spirit of Anglicanism to the picturesque but stiff and entirely unprogressive organisation of the Greek Church. And as for union with the non-Episcopal Churches, that, as Canon Henson well said on Sunday, is made virtually impossible by the tendency, and possibly the deliberate aim, of the promoters of the Congress to aggrandise the Episcopal power. A combination of all these diverse elements could only resemble Robinson Crusoe's famous enclosure for his tame goats, which was so large that the goats within it became as wild as the goats outside.

The Congress, therefore, can hardly come to any dramatic decision as to unity with the two largest divisions of the Christian Church. The Low Churchmen are a declining force, but they are powerful enough to stay any such reversal of the Reformation. Neither, looking at the sectional debates of the Congress, can we discern any sound basis for the attempt to erect the Anglican Church, which sometimes speaks as if Nonconformity had no existence, into an authoritative guide, and even judge, in secular affairs. This applies both to its influence on social reform and to its half-defined resolution to dispute the judgment of the State on questions like the law of marriage. The Church will always, we hope, be a valuable auxiliary in the cause of social reforms. But it is not a fact that, as the Archbishop claimed in his speech at the Albert Hall, it has supplied the "men" or the "public" that will solve them. The impulse to reform in most Christian countries has come from the general social conscience, acting upon politicians and administrators, deeply influenced by Christian feeling, but not conspicuously inspired by the Established Churches. If the Church is changing in this respect, it follows society, and does not conspicuously lead it; while, as to England up to the middle of the last century, it is impossible to say that working-class and middle-class champions were altogether wrong in thinking that in all their desperate fights and oft-defeated hopes the Anglican Church was usually their enemy. Is that Church attaining either a clear knowledge of its own mind, or a true appreciation of the difficulties of the people on the marriage question? In Tuesday's debates there appeared to be a general disposition to call on the Church to forbid the re-marriage even of innocently divorced persons. This was the advice of an American bishop, speaking for a country where divorce has developed into a scandal of caprice. But a clerical member of the Congress warned his brethren that it was necessary to examine such cases with some care, and to draw the bonds of discipline with discretion. Nor was any line of unity reached on the old question of what degree of toleration was to be extended to polygamy among native Christians in the Empire, or on the larger problem of the treatment of rival religions, and their share of the general gift of inspiration. On some of these points the informal Cabinet of the Anglican Church talked with seriousness, and in a progressive and tolerant mood. But it formulated no principle, and revealed no guiding policy. For all such purposes, and for the examination of social questions like sweating, the Congress has proved to be no more an illuminant than the "dramatic conversation" in which Mr. Bernard Shaw impartially sums up the pros and cons of "getting married."

The world, therefore, need not fear or hope for a commanding voice from the leaders of the Anglican Church. Can such a voice come from an organisation leaning so much on the arts that govern the secular world, the arts of compromise and adjustment, the great business of "carrying on"? Will it not rather be individual? At this hour the most searching statement of the Christian point of view comes from a man who lies under the interdict of the Orthodox Church, and to whom, in the hour of his approaching death, she will deny her last rites of acknowledgment and consolation. All that has been said or can be said with truth and sincerity at the Pan-Anglican Congress on war, marriage, poverty, chastity, the relationship between nations and races, and the life of the soul, has been better said by the heretic and outcast Tolstoy, and has been said precisely in that tone which the world, though it may deny and refuse, can never forget. The Prime Minister asked, in a serious and instructive speech, what the Congress was prepared to do for the peculiarly Christian cause of "peace, unity, and concord," for the "corporate sense of oneness," which, as he truly said, secular statesmen were in their fashion forwarding by way of international treaties and understandings, even though they half-defeated their end by their slavish reliance on armaments. Well, the Church can do very little, so long as her mind is set on plans of material consolidation, on keeping the peace with conventional ways and traditions, on plans of coercing men more than on the conquest of their wills and affections. In one of his parables Tolstoy tells the story of the hermit who tried to soften the heart of a robber. First he exhorted him. But the robber laughed. "You live by your piety, and I live by my robbery," he said. "Preach to the old women who come to you." So the hermit determined to live no longer by his piety, and to accept no more offerings. He still exhorted the robber, but when the brigand threatened him, he feared for his life and ran away. Finally he lost fear, and beginning to love the robber, was able to turn his heart. The Church is never tired of exhorting society, and telling it what rules it should observe. But so long as she at once depends on the world and is afraid of it, she will preach to it in vain.

THE ROOSEVELT INTERVENTION.

It will always be a matter of debate whether Mr. Roosevelt was well advised in refusing to put himself forward as a Presidential candidate for a third term in 1908. On personal grounds it is easy to understand his reluctance. The American President is habitually overworked, and Mr. Roosevelt, though a Gladstone in physical energy, has doubtless felt the strain of his seven years' toil on the vast plane of the Presidential life. It was not, however, on personal grounds that the President justified his refusal to seek or accept another nomination. He based it on "the wise custom which limits the President to two terms." We need not lightly reject Mr. Roosevelt's opinion of the wisdom of that particular custom. It was initiated by Washington for reasons which had some validity in the infant years of the Republic. We are not blind to the constitutional case, and there have been moments in Mr. Roosevelt's presidency when the aggrandisement of the office seemed to carry with it some elements of danger. But we must remember that a great defect of the American system of government is its unwieldliness; and to insist that no man, however conspicuous his endowment, shall be allowed in the White House for more than eight consecutive years, seems to intensify its complications. Mr. Roosevelt's nolo episcopari has at least sensibly loosened his hold over Congress. It is indeed remarkable that, for the first time in their history, the people were not merely willing but anxious to break loose from the prejudice against a third term. When General Grant sought to overcome that feeling, they would not listen to him. Now that they appear to have outgrown it of their own motion, Mr. Roosevelt thinks it wise to put in a plea for its preservation.

Apart from this decision, the main interest of the Chicago Convention has lain in its revelation of Mr. Roosevelt's success in indoctrinating the Republican Party with Radicalism. No more than eight years separate the American Republicans from the day when Mark Hanna was their controlling and representative spirit. The party at that time was a party of plutocratic Toryism. It was more than the friend of Capital; it was its slave. It denounced the Trusts on its "platforms" and at election time; it supported them and was supported by them in Congress and behind the scenes. It never doubted that America was made for the millionaires, and that the politicians were their natural allies and henchmen. It was as blind to the gathering signs of unrest as the French aristocracy before the Revolution. Trusting to its machine and relying upon its intimacy with the moneyed interests, it turned politics into a branch of Wall Street finance, and manipulated all fiscal, social, and economic legislation for the benefit of the big corporations. Then, through the accident of an accident, came Mr. Roosevelt. He sat from the first with conspicuous looseness in the party saddle. Where his predecessor had obeyed the Trusts or cozened them, Mr. Roosevelt attacked them. He saw that a party of the Haves, by the mere force of reflex action, brings ultimately into being a party of the Have-nots, and that Reaction at one end of the political scale means sooner or later a powerful revolutionary movement at the other. To head off any such development became the supreme object of his policy, which was clear even when the President's rhetoric seemed a trifle vague. He was alive to social inequalities. He saw that the time had come when the plutocracy, to preserve anything, must surrender something. He preached the doctrine of the "square deal." He sought the pathway of return to the older, broader, more equitable democracy; and, whatever opinion one may hold of his methods or of the tangible issue of his agitation, it cannot be questioned that Mr. Roosevelt has proved himself, even with the ties and reservations of a party leader, a force of restraint on the evil tendencies of American politics. The party men have hindered him at every turn, but he has succeeded in rallying to his side both the rank and file of the organisation and an overwhelming mass of non-partisan opinion.

The result has been very apparent in this week's Convention. The temper of the delegates, by comparison with all previous Conventions of the Republican Party, has been Radical, and the change marks the last gasp of expiring Toryism. No doubt the political pressure of the Labor Party has done much to facilitate the transformation; but the chief personal agency unquestionably has been the President's personality and policies. The struggle over, the injunction plank in the platform, though it has been severely cut down by the party managers, testifies to the change. A few years ago the Republicans were denouncing Mr. Bryan as little less than an Anarchist, because he protested against the abuse of "government by injunction." To-day many of them advocate all that he has ever contended for, and the reactionaries among them are voted down. Few things have been more monstrous than the use to which American employers and the American courts have put the power of issuing injunctions. When the Democrats in 1896 branded it as "a new and highly dangerous form of oppression, by which Federal Judges become at once legislators, judges, and executioners," they in no degree exaggerated its iniquities. Under "government by injunction" a judge may first make a law, then decide, without the help of a jury, whether it has been broken, and finally punish any infringement of it as contempt of court at his unlimited discretion. He can order a man to go to work or to stay at work, and send him to prison if he disobeys. He can prevent employés from striking, and he can make it an offence for them to encourage others to strike. He can forbid a trade union leader or the officer of any labor organisation to address the servants of a corporation with a view to inducing them to leave work. In short, he can bring the whole power of the law and of the State militia to quell any disturbance, or any prospect of disturbance, in any company that cares to come before him and apply for an injunction. Englishmen may get some idea of the American respect for property when an attack on such a system can be described as, and really believed to be, "a crime against society." That was how the Republicans described it in 1896, and again in 1900. Their far milder language of to-day, their comparative return to reason and humanity, are indicative of the growing power of labor and of the effectiveness of the Roosevelt intervention in American statesmanship.

WHAT DOES "VOTES FOR WOMEN" MEAN?

No fair observer of the movement for Women's Suffrage will grudge the organisers of last Saturday's demonstration the full credit of a singularly impressive illustration of the power of women in the modern city-State. It is an impertinence to-day to deny how serious and brilliant has been women's contribution to the activities which were abundantly represented in the procession to the Albert Hall—the functions of teaching, medicine, and healing, the academic and scientific professions, the literary, musical, dramatic, pictorial, and decorative arts. In all these matters women shine; in some of them they are pre-eminent, and the mere man represents a dependent service. We have only to ask ourselves what would happen to the churches, chapels, hospitals, theatres, music-halls, schools, hotels, restaurants of London, as well as to many of its offices and factories, if the women suddenly withdrew their help from the actual directing machinery of its business and pleasure, in order to realise what part women now play in the immense circle of a great city's life. We may take it, indeed, that Saturday's demonstration was mainly ordered by women who may fairly consider themselves elect both among their own sex and among the mass of the community. And we think we shall not be far wrong in saying that the precise form of the suffrage which they have in mind hardly concedes Mr. Asquith's condition of a Bill drawn upon "democratic lines." They desire a reversal of the disqualification which our present electoral law inflicts upon sex, and as Miss Lightman puts the case in another column, they suggest that "every woman householder, whether married or single, would have a vote under the household franchise." Miss Lightman further explains, in answer to a correspondent's inquiry as to what "votes for women" meant, that such a measure would enfranchise "a certain percentage" of married women —a very small one—whose names now appear in the rate-book, and that married women could also qualify under it through "the property and service franchise." Reading this scheme of enfranchisement in the terms of the law as it stands, we see clearly that it means a reinforcement of the propertied elements in the country, and is therefore a subtraction from the value of the workmen's vote. The great body of married workwomen would be shut out, and there would be no effective compensation to them in the inclusion of women who, for example, share Lady Frances Balfour's well-known views as to the iniquity of "socialistic" legislation. It is unfair to expect a Liberal Government thus to reverse the whole meaning and tendency of its work on the suffrage, and to infuse the electorate with precisely that element in womanhood which is least in sympathy with democracy. A measure of general enfranchisement for women is an entirely different proposition. It will therefore be inevitable for Liberals to ask, now that the question of the suffrage is assuming a definite shape, what is the precise demand of those who lead the agitation, so that they may see how it fits in with fixed Radical ideals on the suffrage, and with the general conception of the democratic State.

Life and Letters.

THE DEARTH OF GENIUS.

Detractors of the age, as a recent article happens to remind us, think it a telling argument to refer us "back to the 'seventies," asking what men we have to set against the giants of those days. In poetry they ask us, "Where is your Tennyson and Browning, your coming Swinburne, your Matthew Arnold?" "What theologians to-day can rank with Newman, Stanley, Lightfoot, Martineau, or Manning? What historians with Freeman, Froude, and J. R. Green? What essayists with Carlyle and Ruskin? Among general thinkers or philosophers, whom will you match against Mill, Spencer, or T. H. Green? In this boasted age of science, who stands out as did Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, thirty years ago? Even in the novel, whom will you pit against the George Eliot, Dickens, Meredith of the last generation?" And so they brandish in the world of politics the names of Gladstone and Disraeli, in art those of Rossetti and Burne-Jones, and repeat in ever-growing confidence their challenge.

Now, this disparaging comparison is variously received. It is said that modern genius has not failed, but that certain conditions of modern work and life have narrowed the scope and retarded the growth of great personal reputations. Natural talents are nowadays more rigorously specialised. Our historians are not allowed to roam freely over wide fields of loose literary cultivation like Froude; our Darwin, if we had one, would be chained down to some particular investigation of physical heredity; a philosopher and sociologist who, like Mill or Spencer, took all knowledge for his province, would never emerge from the shades of sciolism. We have the men of genius, but they are working in narrower channels at deeper levels, and their light does not shine forth as it would formerly have done.

But this contention, specious as it is, and in some measure valid, hardly convinces. A great man, we are disposed to insist, will never consent to be enslaved by this narrow mechanical division of labor; the freedom of his genius will insistently assert itself, and he will yoke himself to some worthy task. "But how," it may be said, "if great intellectual and creative tasks are not to hand?" And here we are launched upon another line of explanation of our "barren age." Progress in the arts and sciences, as in every realm, works by some periodic law: an age of great discoveries in science, a rich flowing age of art and literature, is followed by a period of comparative stagnation, or one in which small increments of gain are gathered in. This is a very widely-accepted explanation, but has no general validity. It is certainly not true that in the physical sciences and their application to the arts of life the last two decades have marked a decline of large and brilliant productivity. Quite the contrary. So far as scientific achievement is concerned, there is much to support the view that our great workers do not stand out pre-eminent in personality because they are so numerous, not because they are not great. This answer, we submit, applicable as it may be, not merely to science, but to the labors of history, scholarship, and even philosophy, does not explain the case of the paucity of great reputations in literature and in the arts of popular appeal.

It is here that we come to a really profitable kernel of our topic. The great men of the 'seventies carried a certain real distinction of personality, an inspiration of expression, which no body of men of similar influence and authority carry now. Poets, artists, essayists, scientists, were in large measure the conscious prophets or interpreters of new, large, transforming ideas, the quick fruitage of recent discovery and audacious speculation in fifty new fields. It was a time of Pisgah views, of swift, unfolding visions and transformations, which furnished strong nourishment and splendid inspiration to men of quick imagining and popular sympathies. The early intellectual and emotional operation of the new scientific and critical ideas was liberative and thaumaturgic: the extension of the reign of law into human history, the doctrines of the conservation of energy and correlation of physical forces, the great conception of scientific evolution, still lay in a vague plaster shape, rich material for the poetic eloquence of an "In Memoriam" or a "Belfast Address."

Such oracles are now dumb, and it is their trumpet notes we miss, not only among the poets of our time, but among the statesmen, scientists, and reformers. The great liberative and stimulative thoughts of a generation ago seem to have become conservative and restrictive, almost paralysing, influences of to-day. This is partly what is meant by saying that we live in a too critical age. It is not merely the evident breakdown of old orthodoxies in religion, politics, and general thought, but the rapid subsidence of the early effervescence of the new formative ideas. Science seems to have over-mechanised our thinking and our outlook upon life, as it has our industries; the glow and inspiration have died out of the new thought, and have left a dull heritage of semi-fatalistic formulae, breeding excessive caution, and imposing the intellectual duty of going slow. We are to-day cultivating, as the best fruit of modern culture, a type of broad-minded, shallow-feeling man and woman, who move with self-conscious slowness among the intricacies of life, shunning fanaticism and refusing to take risks. Many familiar features of our modern civilisation co-operate with this tendency, the growth of material comfort and security in an age of peace, strong governments, and economic advance. There is also the congestion of ideas and of information, pouring out upon the mind in ways that well-nigh inhibit selection and preclude settled convictions upon issues of critical importance to the inner life. Such conditions are injurious to the emergence and free life of natural genius. Men bred in these intellectual preserves will not venture as boldly as their fathers into the wilds of life; they will be less eager and less able to "grasp the skirts of happy chance and breast the blows of circumstance" in following their star. It is the general recognition of these facts that leads not a few modern counsellors to urge, justly, if somewhat vaguely, that what is wanted is "a new religion." For most patent among our discouragements of effort is the gradual fading of practical faith, not merely in the personal Providence of current theologies, but in the creative powers of man and the sustaining order of the universe. Take the present case of politics as a signal example. Is it not evidently true that we can there do no great work because of our unbelief, and that the marking-time in most of our great humanitarian movements is primarily due to a want of confidence in man's mission in the universe? Not a few of our Churches are alive to the torpor of our times, but their magical rites seem ineffectual for exorcising it. It may be, perhaps, to a further, fuller, wiser science that we must first look for the new impulse which shall break the spell, revivify the dulled emotions, and kindle once more the live imaginations to great and spiritually fruitful endeavours.

"A DISTANT DRUM."

To men whose breath of life lay in the coffee-house, the boudoir, and the little senate of the wits, there was irresistible attraction in sylvan solitudes and resounding vales. "Too happy swains, did you but know your joys!" they cried with envy as they went ruffling to a rout. Would it had been theirs to tend the flocks with Strephon when dawn was blushing, or Philomela roused the twilight groves! With what song they might have rivalled Daphnis in the wager for a dancing lamb; with what grace languished for the charms of Chloe! Not such their lot. For them Belinda was the nearest thing to nymph, and it had seemed uncouth to stake a lamb at Charing Cross. But in their verse they still turned with nature's yearning to pendant acclivities and woodbine bowers. They could still celebrate a country life, though envious fortune debarred them from the felicity of Thyrsis. "Thy forests, Windsor!" sang the most urbane among them:—

"Thy forests, Windsor! and thy green retreats,
At once the Monarch's and the Muse's seats,
Invite my lays. Be present, sylvan maids!
Unlock your springs, and open all your shades.
Granville commands."

And at such behest, the Muse who sat on the same seats with the Monarch, helped a poet of the town through four hundred lines of Pastoral on end.

That was long ago, but the same sad desire for what is not still haunts our cities, and the suburban resident returning home pictures himself in wilder scenes than Tooting Bec. For there lurks an infinite spirit in man, and, as we have been told, his unhappiness comes of his greatness. True it is not always fresh woods and pastures for which he pines, and his longing may take more fantastic forms than perjured Doris and coy Sylvia's fleecy care. We have but to recall the peculiar sentiment of ten years back, or fifteen years at most, when, in a period of profound peace, the middle-aged citizen's fancy lightly turned to thoughts of war. How far removed from the daily round his natural sphere of action seemed! How little his back garden resembled the battle that, like Job's warhorse, he smelt afar off! When his pleasing wife greeted him in the evening, his heart was burning, like the Queen of Scots, to be a man and know what thing it was to lie all night upon the heather with a claymore at his side. As he sharpened the steel for dinner, he sang to himself the "Song of the Sword." He was within an ace of joining the Volunteers.

"The Song of the Sword"!—yes, it was Henley who first uttered that natural yearning of the peaceful clerk:—

"As he knew me and named me
The War-Thing, the Comrade,
Father of honour
And giver of kingship,
The fame-smith, the song-master,
Bringer of women
On fire at his hands
For the pride of fulfilment,
Priest (saith the Lord)
Of his marriage with victory."

It jogs the liver like a Wagner libretto. Mr. Kipling, to whom the song was dedicated, could hardly have written worse. It has all the worst of Mr. Kipling's qualities—the brag mistaken for courage, the lust mistaken for manliness, the fumbling obscurity, the patronising familiarity with the Lord. That did not matter. Henley had hit the ideal that every man of peace should wish to be. Oh, to shake oneself free of suburbs, to catch the City train no more, no more bring home the skewered basket with the fish, but, sword in hand, stride slaughtering through a free, lascivious world, strike to the heart and feel the hot life spurt; to ride, to blow bugles, to consume all manner of things like a flame, "to go in a glory," as the poet cried, "dead certain sure that we're utterly bound to be right," and otherwise to display all the dashing qualities that the Lord has granted as a heritage to The Blood! To the real man of peace, bored to extinction by his drudging occupations, such an appeal was irresistible. How from his nurseries he longed for the flashing sword-play to clear the world!:—

"Fighting the brute,
The abysmal Fecundity;
Checking the gross,
Multitudinous blunders,
The groping, the purblind
Excesses in service
Of the Womb universal,
The absolute drudge."

Another poet in different language had once before said what these banjo lines seem to be trying to say; in the "Two Noble Kinsmen" the writer thus addresses War:—

"O great corrector of enormous times,
Shaker of o'er-rank States, thou grand decider
Of dusty and old titles, that healst with blood
The earth when she is sick, and curest the world
Of the pleurisy of people."

Such verses utter the very essence of peace. More than any pastoral they reveal the tedium of the town, and stir a restless atavism in the blood of bulging citizens, as even a tin trumpet may rouse old chargers in their stalls. That was Henley's great achievement. When the moment for action came, it was his spirit that sent many an incapable son of peace to sit upon the veldt. To mankind's infinite credit, it is boredom we most detest. In Central Africa two missionaries were struggling through the forest, hungry, ragged, and worn with disease. "Cheer up!" said one to the other; "it's better than Hope Brothers."

The issue by Mr. David Nutt of Henley's complete works in verse and prose has recalled that outworn mood of years ago, when, as the poet said to England, "your whelps wanted blooding." It has reminded us, too, that, in spite of his shameless imitations and his struggles with obscurity of thought, in spite even of his sentimental delight in hugging his melancholy and other emotions to his heart, Henley was still a poet. The things that he wrote more than thirty years ago, before he began to breathe out slaughter and tell us that "God in the Garden laughed outright"—how excellent they sometimes were! The Hospital poems live with the breath of a true passion. Sometimes there are words that catch a moment's true intensity:—

"Ranged in mysterious disarray,
The Castle, menacing and austere,
Looms through the lingering last of day:
And in the silver dusk you hear,
Reverberate from each crag and scar,
Bold bugles blowing points of war."

And, in spite of a reminiscence in the one poem that everybody knows, how bravely its verse runs:—

"In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced nor cried aloud.
Under the bludgeonings of chance
My head is bloody, but unbowed."

It was a boast, but a defiant boast that suffering justified, and by reason of that concentrated defiance it seems likely to go winged among men for many years.

It was only when defiance turned to violence, and boasting bragged in continents, that the taint of unreality crept in and led to the bathos which is unreality's inevitable doom. It is true the master avoided the worst excesses of the young lions who soon began roaring to his bloodthirsty tunes. Above all, he escaped the worst error of his only dangerous rival for the mastership. Henley was never Recessional. He never implored the Lord's mercy on His people for having swallowed Naboth's vineyard. He did not whine to The Blood about a contrite and a humble heart, or cry to them, "Humble ye, my people, and be fearful in your mirth." But by his very personality in literature he helped to propagate those tricks of violence and unreal boasting that became such a plague in the days when guns coughed and generals barked and pens put on khaki. At the end he could not even go for a drive in Mr. Alfred Harmsworth's motor without shouting, "Speed in the Lap of the Lord!"

"Speed on the Knees,
Speed in the Laugh,
Speed by the Gift,
Speed in the Trust of the Lord!"

"Domine, dirige nos" might serve well enough as motto for any motor, but it is merely violent thus to pile the piety up. And as to courage, perhaps it is best to take it for granted and say no more, lest our praise become a dubious tribute, like a certain well-known Order of Chastity. Nor is it necessary always to placard our love for England. We may love our country in other ways than by shouting pæans over the defeated, or wallowing in imaginary blood, and for a peaceful citizen to be constantly singing, "Oh, let me like a soldier fall!" recalls the saying of Pope Pius IX.: "Dr. Pusey is like a bell always ringing, ringing to summon everyone to church, but never going in itself."

That mood of Henley, the "National Observer," and Mr. Kipling, is over now. It is impossible to refuse it sympathy, for it was a protest of the uncontrollable spirit of man against his confines. But reality killed it, just as in the old catch, "War bringeth poverty, poverty peace." For at no time was there any closer connection between its imaginings and the reality of war than in the tea-cup days there was between Windsor Forest and Arcadia.

THE FAIR.

For three short, rushing months, the fever of its activity endures; and the nights and days are crowded equally with a confused succession of festivities. A gay oblivion prevails.

It opens fitfully. But week by week the pressing shows increase, and the hurry of its gaiety gains speed, and quickens to a culminating whirl of fixed events and public ceremonies, and balls, and dinners, and gay foregatherings. Then gradually it slackens off and stops. But while it lasts the pleasure centres of the Big Grey City pack with a scintillating rush of restlessness, and the ordered splendor of pageantry. For it is a festival of wealth, and entertainment, and display.

During the press and bustle of its whirl, the city fills with brilliant multitudes. For besides the habitués of rank and fame, and the larger circles of the well-to-do, who make it a means of extra gaiety, vast crowds of diverse occupations and degrees flock to the Fair for various periods. According to their money or opportunity, they stay; and they add their magnificence or dainty prettiness of considered dress, and their wealth or counted sovereigns to the general prodigality.

They come in mixed thousands of representatives, attracted and actuated differently. Idle cosmopolitans of pleasure, who saunter through the year about the world, come as a matter of routine. Brown-faced men of the services hurry from abroad, for a few precious weeks of remembered and anticipated contrast to their working years; and enjoy with the eager appreciation of comparison. And they who live a leisured life for sport, come to relieve their summer idleness. Contented country folk, who rule a little simple realm of village life, leave the clean quiet of their homes without regret, and plunge into the rushing swelter of the Fair, because of daughters ready for the world of monied men, or just to fulfil the tradition of their life. The scheming free-lance women of curious resource, who flit about the world in luxury, and still retain a nominal repute, come with a surprising magnificence of dress, because of the necessary excitement and the crowds. And the Colonies and the crowded cities of the world send people who have heard of it and want to see, and those who are drawn by memories of past gaiety; and the lonely places, where men lose caste and hope, and the suburbs and the guarded country towns, and the garrisons of home send their contingents of votaries. For the fascination of the Big Grey City's fair is very strong. The men of confidence and wits, and the reigning sovereigns of the demi-monde come too, hunting the idle rich.

So, in established communities, and exclusive sets, and separate circles that meet but never intermix, great throngs of connected families, and friends, and strangers, and acquaintances, and lovers, and enemies rush through a universal programme of events and private entertainments of their own.

For a curious contagion of imitation spreads. All who can do so join its revelries; and all, in a circle of their own, vie in a temporary madness of extravagance and make-believe, to seem the gayest, and to do the most. And mobs of lonely rich and foolish poor pay or contrive, according to their means or more, to do what is correct, and make a show. The glamour of tradition drives them on.

Thus, though the city's usual struggle and unrest thunders and surges onward sullenly, a glittering busyness of enjoyment pervades the streets, where the pleasure-seekers throng; and an unusual galaxy of color predominates. All is magnificence, and arrogance, and rush. Streams of resplendent women and polished men flock to innumerable simultaneous shows, and speed about from one place to the next.

Impelled by a certain feverish anxiety of pleasure, they hurry by; and every phase and folly of rich womanhood goes past. Youth, in a cool soft flimsiness, walks with a dancing step, and looks and looks with the wide-eyed eagerness of interest; or, lounging carefully in the broadness of a car, assumes with a precocious satiety the tilted chin and heavy eyelid of disdain. Age, with a painted face and weary eyes, and a wonderment of flowers on her head, sits bolt-upright, because of a tight encasing frame, and smiles and smiles and smiles; or, lured into the rush by those who make use of her, shrinks from the turmoil. Beauty and the great originals of fashion drive in the crowded ways, and watch unseemingly, under the becoming shadow of a cunning hat, for the universal homage of a glance; or stroll through the parting jostle of the throngs, with an imperious consciousness of right. Complacent prime of life and motherhood, and the set, pathetic hardness of assured neglect, sit in adjoining carriages in a block. And ancient lineage, and recent rank, and famous poverty, and unknown wealth, and country bloom, and foreign sallowness, lean back in cushioned indolence, or walk daintily dressed in the fashion of the hour. And manhood of every age and elegance escorts them, or flashes by in cabs alone, or saunters to some gathering in pairs. All look, and chat, and smile, as if only the carelessness of pleasure was paramount.

All this interminable, unceasing pageant of lolling wealth, and eager idleness, and tired repose, continues in flashing clatters through the hours of the night, until the dawn of the succeeding day.

And wherever fashion has decreed that people crowd, a crush of gay idlers flaunt and criticise, with a certain studied indolence of gaiety.

According to their wants or motives, these throngs behave; and the infinite of human nature shows. Hate, in a gown of wonder, chats to equally resplendent hate, with smiles that never get beyond the mouth; and envy criticises both, with a travelling comprehensive scrutiny of sullen eyes. Love, in a creased and polished elegance, scans the crowding groups with wrinkled haste; or sits and looks, and taps a little foot; or meets and converses carelessly, with only an occasional betraying glance. Vanity saunters to and fro, in trailing trains of broidery or lace, looking beyond with seemingly unconscious stare, and seeing everything. Rich poverty sits still and hides both hands and feet, because of the deficiencies. And folly and self-consciousness are ever on the watch, looking for models for a pose, and shift position, and pat and pull the arrangement of their dress continually. Uncertain ignorance, and watchful rivalry, and stupid pride are everywhere. Enthusiasm and thoughtlessness make merry; and experience gossips quietly; and blatant vulgarity pretends to be at ease; and loneliness looks on. All try to seem indifferent or amused.

But beneath the brilliance and seeming carelessness are egging rivalry, and harassing expense, and wanton vanity, and secret shame, and tragedy and disappointment, and the shifts and fears of poverty and debt. Only the jest and laughter of simplicity, with the glamor of life in front, are free from care.

Thus the Fair becomes a splendid masquerade. Because at the gorgeous lounging jostle of foregatherings, and in the glittering bustle of the streets, a spirit of careful deception permeates the throngs. For everyone of all its votaries must have, or appear to have, the wherewithal for heedless expenditure; and must make as if their only trouble was fun. This is the fashion of the Fair.

Nevertheless, the underlying strain and effort haunt the mind; and the conventional pretence of gaiety and unconcern take on the curious unnatural calm of hidden things. The wonder at the price, in principles and peace of mind, is always there.

THE MIND OF THE BEE.

A banded, humble bee is rummaging in the parti-colored blossoms of the Weigelia. The corollas of the older blooms are ready to slip off over the long stigmas, and the bee gets many a slide for catching hold of an insecure petal. Nothing but sympathy is due to her, but we cannot help adding to her embarrassment by clipping a flower together as she is inside, thus holding her for a moment a furious prisoner. Bursting out, she swings to and fro above our head, humming her loudest, and, to all appearance, trying to make up her mind whether we are worth stinging. To and fro she goes in widening and retreating strokes, then swings right off, and is lost in the width and the depth of the blue sky. It is the way of all humble bees disturbed at their work, and we do not imagine, as we used to do, that it is an action of menace. When she was sipping the Weigelia she was, as bees and men often are, entirely absorbed in her work. She had lost all sense of time and space, and when the disturbance came she was as a man reading a book of Arctic travel who suddenly finds himself under a sweltering June sky. Before we make up our mind what to do we must find out where we are. Since the book has been good, we must turn down the page. Since the honey has been plentiful, we must "orient" the spot by flying round it, and marking well its appearance alone, and by relation to other objects, including this two-legged mass that has interrupted our labors.

Simple as we believe it to be, there are few questions that excite controversy among students of insect life more than this one of orientation. Men who every day find their way home by using churches, public-houses, holly trees, and shop fronts as landmarks rake through all they know (and more) in heaven and earth in their endeavour to account for a bee or a carrier pigeon doing the same thing. Some, like Albrecht Bethe (assuming the bee to be a mere reflex machine), try to prove that it is by "chemoreflex"—in other words, smell—that the hive or the swarm is found. Others (a very large school) attribute to the chief masters of the art of home-finding a sixth sense which they usually, though not always, have the good sense not to try to locate. Yet others claim almost supramundane attributes for such micro-organisms as the semi-circular canals. That veteran entomologist, Dr. Auguste Forel, in his book on "The Senses of Insects," which has just been translated by Mr. Macleod Yearsley (Methuen), settles matters fairly satisfactorily with what we may call comprehensively the supernatural schools.

There is not much to settle. The beekeeper knows well that if a hive be moved only a yard the bees have a difficulty in finding it, returning straight to the old site, and there losing themselves for hours, if not for ever. If they returned by smell, it would be strange if the faculty served them for a mile or two and then failed them in the last yard. If they return by instinct, it is a faculty that is curiously limited by the same distance that they might be thought capable of covering by other means. If bees are liberated up to two miles from home, they usually succeed in returning, and if liberated beyond that distance, they make a fruitless effort to locate themselves, and then return to the box from which they have been thrown. If the box is gone, they show a perfect aptitude for discovering the very place in space at a given height from the ground that it had occupied. It was their last clue to the home they had lost, and, slender as it is, they seem bent on making the most of it. Dr. Forel proposes several experiments by which his rivals of either the chemoreflex or the instinct school might put their theories to the test. We would propose one more. Let a hive be put in a wide plain, and near it let there be put good landmarks to lead the bees home from the principal flower field, and then let the landmarks be all moved at once, so that the final one points to a new site. We should be very curious to know whether the bees began to come home to the hive or to the final post in a new place. It is an experiment that could not fairly be deemed conclusive against those who say that bees find their way by using their eyes, though it is capable of giving that theory emphatic confirmation.

The sixth-sense theory seems to be at least badly shaken by the fact that neither the blinded bee nor the bee compelled to walk shows the slightest idea of the direction of home. The same is, no doubt, true of the bee that has never flown from the hive. But if we granted all that that theory claims, something would still be needed to explain how the bees, as shown by Lord Avebury as well as his anticipator in experiment, find again the place where they have stumbled on an easily collected supply of honey. The bee, humble bee or wasp, taken in a box and induced to taste of such a store, orients itself on leaving and more or less infallibly, according to species, finds the place again. Many a man has done his best to take note of a strongly desired object, such as a gold mine, using all the resources of geography and mensuration, and helping the memory with written notes, and has yet failed to find the place again. There is a lesson to be taken here from the swinging, humble bee. The bee looks at her landmark, not from one side only, but all round. We none of us realise how imperfectly we see from a fixed point. How many people know exactly the difference between viewing an object with one eye and with two? The one-eyed man sees nothing of the depth of a view unless he shake his head, and thus make his one lens act virtually as a stereoscope.

The thousand-faceted eye of the bee probably functions in many ways differently from ours. From a fixed point of view, it is probable, things are like a photograph that has been reproduced in tone through a very coarse screen. Such a picture is for him who runs rather than him who stands, and we believe that the bee gets her best, if not her only view of distant objects while on the wing. She estimates distances to a nicety, and nothing is to us more curious than the swarm that pauses at the aerial site of an old hive doorway that we have removed only a yard to the rear. If the hive is moved forward the bees fly over it without noticing it, and hover at the place where, according to former experience, it ought to be. Some claim this as a proof of instinct. It is the same kind of instinct that makes the man who has moved from No. 4 to No. 6 go back to No. 4 and even try the latch with his key, days after he has been settled in the new abode. Bethe tried a pretty experiment, the basis of which was a revolving hive. Having got the bees to enter from the south, he suddenly brought the entrance to the east. The returning bees formed their "swarm of hesitation" on the south side of the hive, and then flew by a cast to the door on the east. The cast continued for weeks, but diminished in size little by little. Dr. Forel calls this "a phenomenon of fixed habit, corrected each time by a moment of attention." That we think gives a safe clue to the mind of the bee, whether of the hive or of the untidy wild nest. They have their rules, some inherited and accepted without question, others worked out on sound principles and from correct observation. In the intensity of business, these rules become automatic, but if you suddenly disturb the absorbed workers, or if you give them new problems, they solve them (or are beaten by them) much after the manner of admittedly intelligent beings. To argue that they are no more than organisms acting by reflex is an interesting mental exercise, but in the ordinary meaning of the term the proposition is surely untenable.

Short Story.

A BIT OF A PHILOSOPHER.

Adams very kindly and delicately refrained from referring to my sermon, although I was divided between hope and fear that he would. When you invite a philosopher to church it is not unreasonable to expect something in the nature of criticism. I did not fail to note, however, the powerful effort which he put upon himself. His mouth was shut and his jaws closely locked, like a man afflicted with acute neuralgia; and, as he happened to be digging, he brought down his spade on the well-disintegrated soil with much unnecessary energy. I felt sorry for him, almost apologetic, for I had an uneasy suspicion that my theology was the cause of it. I had preached on the Ascension, and, out of deference to my illustrious parishioner, whose presence seemed to fill the whole church, I had handled it with every consideration and respect for the law of gravitation, but seemingly in vain.

After several painful but well-meant attempts, on both sides, to launch a conversation of a safe and secular nature, we gave it up. A pebble in one's mouth may assist eloquence, but a matter on one's mind is a hopeless impediment. I could almost hear the worthy gardener thinking. Strange that religion should make men so self-conscious! At last he threw off the unpleasant reserve, evidently determined, at all costs, to be genuine and natural.

"I wunst knew a man," he began, in his best work-a-day manner, "as like myself as two peas—my wife 'd be no big'mist if she married him—who said, plain an' hout, at a 'total party, that he'd be damned if he'd drink the king's 'ealth in water. Well, sir, that's about 'ow I feel in church, s'rounded by a parcel o' mis'rible sinners. I doe not b'lieve in drinkin' th' Almighty's 'ealth in water!"

As he made this scathing analogy, he picked up a stone out of his onion-plot, which was as obvious as a goat at a prayer meeting, and flung it absently, if vigorously, into his neighbour's garden.

"You mean——?"

"I do, sir," he anticipated, solemnly. "It may suit women o' both sects all right, but it don't touch my spot. I'm drier nor when I went in. My wife don't notice nothink, for she's allus more'n three-parts wool-gethrin', not to mention 'ard o' 'earin'; but when I go to church, which isn't often, I'm as wide'wake as if there was a burglar about. If you want me to dream an' so on, lay me lyin' on the green grass, with a pipe in my mouth, not settin' bolt upright in a musty pew listenin' till foolishness. The only time I'll promise not to notice things is when I'm asleep."

I assured him, contritely, that I should try to remember it.

"As for church," he continued, evidently regarding my penitence as belated, "I feel as queer an' strange as a hoak in a flow'r-pot. That's as true as I'm tellin' you. Nammy-pambly is no name for it. It don't seem to be natcheril, some'ow. I keep sniffin' an' smellin', as if there was a 'scape o' gas. 'Ow ever is it?" he almost appealed. "I s'pose it's all good an' right, but when I get there I'm wishin' all the time I 'ad never come. This isn't fair to no party. I can 'ear the motor-cars tearin' along in the sun an' fresh hair, blowin' their 'orns, runnin' over dogs an' things, an' it's as much as ever I can do to sit the thing out."

"You'd perhaps have the same sensation in Buckingham Palace," I suggested.

"I doubt it," was the unoffended reply. "I'll take the liberty o' doubtin' it till I go there an' try; then I'll let you know def'nite. From all I can 'ear, the King's as nice an' natcheril as anybody."

"Oh, he'd be all right," I agreed, readily. "We're all at home in our environment."

"'Zactly! That's why I say there must be somethink ser'ous the matter with the Church! I'm at 'ome all right in God's world; there isn't a ha'porth the matter with me; I'm satisfied if nobody else is; but the minute I set foot in a so-called place o' worship it hupsets me. That's 'ardly good enough, is it?"

I forebore hinting that he might be unregenerate. Like most revolutionaries, paradoxical to say, he was a man of sterling and inoffensive character.

"Not that I blame you, sir," he added, quickly, apparently perceiving my distress. "You 'ave your living to think about, sich as it is. An' you make the best of a bad job, I s'pose. But what I can't an' won't understand is, why I should feel more wretched an' so on in the 'Ouse o' God than makin' coffins!"

"You're not the first man who has felt uncomfortable in his Sunday clothes," I again evaded.

He drove his spade into the ground up to the ear, and left it standing there, as though the subject now called for his undivided attention.

"Well, then, I'll tell you, sir!" he generously undertook. "I'm not denyin' that there mayn't be somethink in what you say; it's mighty 'ard to go wrong in a Huniverse; but there's two sides to every question. It's only a bit of an Almighty you preach about; you say nothink about the 'oly terror He is. Tryin' to make Him out nice an' good (which is all right and natcheril, I s'pose); you give us a tame cat, a milksop, 'stead of the reel, plain thing. You give the devil the credit for 'alf the world. I don't know from Adam where you got your poor, one-sidered Creator from; but if people didn't keep their own eyes an' ears open from Monday to Saturday, we'd be in a fine mess. An' then your goody-goodies don't know where they are when a church is struck by lightnin', or a storm comes an' sinks ship an' crew an' all, good, bad, an' 'diff'rent alike, or a 'ole city is wiped off the map by a hearthquake, or a volcanar pours over your fine gardens an' res'dencies, an' so on. They may think th' Almighty a fien' for doin' an' 'lowin' sich things, as they called Christ the time He drove the pigs intil the sea; but when they're sick an' tired o' their precious lives,as they're beginnin' to be, they'll pray an' thank God to sling death about even a bit more'n He does, an' save us from rottin'. That's my idear of a good 'Eavenly Father, who's the most reckless an' careless o' the lot of us!"

"But how supremely careful!" I replied, holding up a pansy.

"He's both, sir," was the reverent rejoinder. "But it seems to me that what good people most need to reckernize at this time o' day is, that He's th' other thing as well. It 'd liven us up a bit, I can tell you. An' it 'd stop a lot o' fools' mouths," he added profoundly.

I took the hint.

Present-Day Problems.

WILL THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT FAIL?

By the Chairman of the Central Small Holdings Society.

Sixteen thousand applications for small holdings, made within five months of the coming into force of the new Act, have effectually disposed of the theory that no demand exists. But the question remains: How many of the sixteen thousand are going to be placed on the land?

Not, of course, that all of them deserve to be. But two facts are to be noted—first, that almost all of them are countrymen, anxious to obtain land in their own districts, not ignorant "back-to-the-landers" from the town; and, secondly, that, judging by the recommendations of various Small Holdings Committees which have already made reports on the applications received, something like 80 per cent. of the applicants are "suitable."

The recent debate on the Board of Agriculture vote has revealed two types of opinion on the working of the Act. Some think—Mr. Bennett, for instance, put the case with real force—that in entrusting the provision of small holdings to the County Councils the Government has practically left matters as they stood before the Act; the men who are to administer the Act are the very men whose past conduct has made the Act necessary; all they have to do, and all they are engaged in doing, is to make it a dead letter. Others fix their attention on the necessary slowness of all proceedings relating to the acquisition of land, point to the large number of local inquiries which are being held, and contend that no more could be done than has been done.

It is difficult to accept either view. I do not think that the County Councils can be blamed on the score of slowness. They have been, on the whole, prompt in their investigations. And as to obtaining land, it must be remembered that in most cases the preliminary negotiations are necessarily long; that when they are concluded, there are generally tenants to whom notice must be given; and that this notice has often to be given at Michaelmas, and does not expire till the following Michaelmas. The earliest time at which the slowness, or otherwise, of the County Councils can be really judged, will be the end of September next. It should be noted that several counties—for instance, Cambridgeshire, Lincolnshire, (Holland), and Radnorshire—will be able, not merely to give notice to existing tenants, but actually to establish a certain number of small holders on the land, at that date. Others are negotiating actively. Kent, for example, has already appointed seven valuers to examine land proposed to be hired or purchased. Somerset has appointed a land agent to give his whole time to the work. Other counties are following the example of these. On this point, therefore, judgment should be suspended for the present. Preaching patience to men who have waited for years for the chance of obtaining land is no pleasant task. It must be done, however, and it is being done, in some cases, by our Society.

There is, however, another side to the picture. While the County Councils are not refusing the duties laid upon them, they are certainly not—speaking generally—taking them up with great enthusiasm; and in many ways—some great, some small—difficulties of the most serious kind are being placed in the way of the intending small holder.

An extreme example comes from Lancashire, where an "enquiry" was held at which a large number of the public, including many tenant-farmers, attended, and in their presence the most delicate questions were put to the applicants about their capital, their experience, and their intentions. Needless to say, a considerable proportion of the applicants withdrew in disgust. There seems to be a strange ignorance, on the part of the members of many Small Holdings Committees, as to the timidity and reticence of the agricultural laborer. Even the most independent of Englishmen is not eager to make his banking account public property, or to describe the industrial capabilities of his wife.

This case is typical of much that is going on up and down the country. Enquiries are held at a police-station, and half a dozen of the applicants, foolishly perhaps, yet not unnaturally, refuse to go there. Or they are held ten miles from where the applicants live—a distance necessitating the loss of a day's work. Or they take place at midday—with the same consequences. In one county the application forms, which ought to be of the briefest and most general character, frighten off the laborers by their complexity, and by demands for definite statements in writing as to capital. In another, the notices explaining the Act make it appear as if the small holder is expected to buy the land—with the possibility of renting put into the background. (In point of fact, 90 per cent, of the demand is for renting, not purchase.) In another, enquiries are held only in those parishes where land has been offered to the Council by the owners. Then there are constant references to the Act of a disparaging or contemptuous character, made in public speeches or private conversation, made sometimes by the very men who are to administer its details. On the whole, the comments of some of our local correspondents are not surprising. "The Chairman (of the Small Holdings Committee) had stated in a Tory meeting that the Act was not required. The difficulty is in getting a start, when there will be any amount of applications for small holdings, and additions to holdings. The people seem to think it will not come to anything." "We have very little confidence in the Council. Very few applicants attended; laborers and others are not free at 2 p.m. Our County Councillor speaks fair, has had three meetings, but he points out all the difficulties and dangers and disadvantages, keeping in the background any benefits. To hear him speak you would think he is favorable, but he is not." "The County Council are damning the whole thing by inaction. 7,000 acres have been applied for; 15 acres have been leased for three applicants, and £400 per annum voted to the Clerk's salary to enable him to deal with the applicants." "I cannot get any person of substance to take a working interest. Not being able to obtain land, interest is suspended."

I do not say that this kind of opposition is universal, but it must be faced. Where are the Commissioners? Their view is, no doubt, that they must allow plenty of time to the County Councils, in the hope that the work may be adequately done by them, without pressure from the central authority. That is a laudable aim; but they must keep a close watch on the spirit in which the Act is being administered, and be ready to intervene if it becomes necessary. Sir Edward Strachey says that they are on good terms with the landowners; that is an important point; a still more important one is that they should appreciate the difficulty now confronting the laborer. The Small Holdings Act is not going to fail unless we leave it unnoticed and unsupported. It will succeed if—but only if—it has vigorous backing from the Commissioners; keen and frequent criticism in Parliament, particularly at question time; a society to collect information and give help and encouragement and information wherever it is asked for, and a determination on the part of every land reformer that he will do what he can to make it a success.

Letters from Abroad.

THE NEW ATTITUDE OF THE UNITED STATES TO CANADA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—From the English newspapers which came to hand by Saturday's mail it would seem that quite an undue importance is being attached in England to the recent Longley incident at the Canadian Club banquet in New York. Judge Longley had never been heard of in this country before he came to New York for the banquet; and the sensation said to have been caused by his remarks concerning Canada's relations with Great Britain must have been confined to the cable correspondents of the London newspapers. Had Judge Longley even predicted that Canada would some time join the United States his prediction would have aroused little interest and less sympathy in this country; for never since the Revolution of 1776 and the outflow of the United Empire Loyalists to the Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Ontario has there been less popular interest in the question of the annexation of Canada than there is at the present time. It is a question that nowadays is about as much discussed as the question of the substitution of a Republic for the Monarchy in England. To-day it is one of the deadest of dead questions—a question which no American ever attempts to galvanise into an appearance of life. The attitude of the United States towards Canada to-day is one of indifference to its political future; and apart from questions incidental to the protective systems of the two countries there was never a time when the relations between them were so easy and harmonious.

Conditions were not always thus. In the twenty-four years during which I have known this country, I have witnessed a great and beneficent change in the attitude of the United States towards the Dominion of Canada. In the early 'eighties there was still an unfriendly feeling towards England and no great goodwill towards Canada; and in those days it was not a difficult matter for a newcomer from England to discover why this feeling existed. It was partly due to the school books of the first half of the nineteenth century and to the emphasis that was laid in them on the revolutionary struggle of 1776-83, and also on the war of 1812. It was also partly due to the attitude of England towards the North during the Civil War of 1861-65, and to the attitude of the politicians and official classes in the Canadian Provinces during that great crisis in the history of the United States.

Canada suffered more directly from this feeling arising out of the troubles of 1861-65 than England. The Reciprocity Treaty of 1854-66 was never wholly satisfactory to the United States. The Americans felt that in the Elgin-Marcy Treaty they gave more than they received; and also that the Government of the United Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, when they set up a protective system in 1858 and 1859 for the advantage of Canadian manufacturers, ignored the spirit of the Treaty of 1854 and the promises of Canadian statesmen who had helped to negotiate the Treaty at Washington that as time went on more concessions would be made in the interest of American manufacturers. But it is beyond question that the Reciprocity Treaty was of enormous advantage to the New England States and to the States in the West that border on the great lakes; and had English and Canadian sympathy with the Southern States in the War of the Rebellion been less pronounced a renewal of the Treaty on terms satisfactory to the United States and to Canada might have been arranged without much difficulty. As it was the Treaty was denounced by the United States in what may be described as a "huff"; and since then each country has made its own protective tariff, and each has gone so far in the direction of high protection that another Reciprocity Treaty on the lines of that of 1854-66 is almost as remote as the annexation of Canada by the United States.

The ending of the Elgin-Marcy Treaty led to some sporadic movement in Canada for annexation; and, at that time, annexation would have been favorably considered in this country. But the Federation of the Provinces in 1867 ended all talk of annexation in Canada, although keen interest in the question in this country did not subside until twelve or fifteen years later. In the early 'eighties the War of the Rebellion was still in the public mind. It was still influencing legislation at Washington and at many of the State Capitols, it was still exercising a strong influence over public thought; and there were not wanting men high in the counsels of the Republican Party—men of whom the late James G. Blaine was typical—who were bent on keeping alive this feeling of antagonism towards England and Canada and turning it to the advantage of their party. These politicians had their satellites in Congress and in the newspaper press; and in those days editorial articles in favor of annexation and of the denial of privileges or advantages to Canada until she would consent to enter the Union were by no means uncommon. Nor were these articles confined to newspapers which were in sympathy with the Republican Party. In those days the New York "Sun" was a Democratic paper; but no newspaper was then more unfavorable to Canada nor more insistent on advocating annexation than the paper of which the late Charles A. Dana was editor.

Since Blaine and Dana, with their generation and school of political thought passed away, all discussion of annexation in this country has completely come to an end; and, to-day, as I have said, the attitude of the United States towards Canada is one of complete indifference. This indifference is often a source of wonder to me. The Americans have a people of six millions as their neighbours. This people is in possession of a wide and magnificent country—a country the development of whose material wealth is as yet only in the earliest stages. Moreover, this nation with its Dominion Parliament, its nine or ten provincial legislatures, and its great cities, is working out a political civilisation much as the Americans have been doing since 1776; yet there is not a daily newspaper in New York which, taking one day with another, prints more than seventy lines of news a week from Ottawa or any of the other large centres of Canada. If there is a shipping casualty on the Nova Scotia coast, a mining disaster in British Columbia, or a railway wreck in Ontario, it is duly recorded in the American daily papers. But as for the factors in Canadian life that count in the making of history they are usually ignored in the American press. Ontario and Quebec are both just now in the midst of electoral campaigns. Each province is about to elect a new legislature; but there is no mention of this activity in the American newspapers. It is the same with the popular American magazines. The quarterly journals which are devoted to political science and economics occasionally publish a Canadian article; but an article on any phase of Canadian life is a rarity in such magazines as Harper's, the Century, Scribners's; and even more rare in the newer and cheaper magazines which have enormous circulations on both sides of the border line. The attitude of the people of the United States towards Canada is much the attitude of people in England towards Scotland. There is a constantly increasing commercial, business, and social intercourse between the two peoples; but each country goes its own gait without attracting much sustained interest from its neighbour.

From the British and Canadian point of view this change in the attitude of the United States towards the Dominion is a beneficent one. Indifference makes for better neighbourly feeling; and to-day this neighbourly feeling is as good as could be desired. It would be still more neighbourly if it were not for issues which occasionally crop up out of the two protective systems, or out of questions which are directly or indirectly incidental to these systems. Even these differences are much less acute than they were; for since the Dingley Act was passed at Washington in 1897, and since the Liberals at Ottawa adopted the National Protective policy which the Conservatives had built up between 1879 and 1896, there has been no serious talk about reciprocity. The American and the Canadian Tariff Acts of 1897 have served to deadlock the reciprocity question, which dates back to 1848. Since 1897 it has been increasingly realised that neither country can give way without making a serious inroad on its protective system; and reciprocity with Canada, as with the United States, is almost as dead an issue as annexation.

Many reasons can be adduced for this change in the attitude of the United States towards England and Canada. One is the passing away of the generation of Americans which was brought up on the old text books of United States history. Another is that the old feeling of soreness between the North and South, due to the Civil War, has passed away with the last of what were known as the "Bloody Shirt" presidential campaigns in 1888.

The issues arising out of the Civil War are now either settled or forgotten; and with this great and wholesome change in the tone of federal politics resentment at the attitude of England and Canada during the Civil War has also quite disappeared. Equally important is the fact that the people of the United States have for nearly ten years realised that their place among the great nations of the world is freely and universally recognised. The old sensitiveness as to English and European opinion no longer survives. Provinciality is less and less a characteristic of the United States except in matters of trade and protection; and this country is now so far ahead of Canada in development and population that distrust and jealousy of the Dominion no longer has a place in American national sentiment. In view of this changed attitude of the United States towards Canada, it was, to say the least, bad taste on the part of Judge Longley to discuss the domestic concerns of Canada at the Canadian Club banquet in New York; but as concerns both countries an error in taste is the worst that can be charged against the Nova Scotia judge.—Yours, &c.,

The Drama.

A PARABLE OF LIFE AND ART.

IT is a little surprising to find the critics of the English drama exercising themselves so keenly in disparagement of novelty in form and treatment. For the moment there is nothing that the English drama wants more than freshness, and the writer who strikes out new paths and lets his fancy play freely over the dramatic field is a real benefactor to his kind. This is what Mr. Laurence Housman, following the special vein of his genius, has done in "The Chinese Lantern," which has just been produced at the Haymarket, and straightway he is heavily cuffed and (still more heavily) admonished for his pains. Mr. Housman is flippant and obscure; he is trivial and metaphysical; he means too much and too little. One critic is sure that there is no symbolism in his play; another that there is too little and too much "foolery." Anyway, he has mixed his styles, confounded farce and poetry, prose and verse, satire and pantomime. I will not argue the point whether there is a special vice in the element of "foolery" to which Mr. Housman is addicted, though I might mention in passing that the authors of "Lear" and "Faust" were occasionally addicted to it, and that it haunts nearly all assemblies and utterances of the wise, save, perhaps, a Pan-Anglican Congress. What one is concerned to note is that Mr. Housman has something to say, and that he says it in a certain freakish, charming, irregular fashion of his own; that he takes a truth of life and art and plays with it; that he is, to use a phrase which Mr. Walkley has passed on to the Anglo-Saxon world, "ondoyant et divers." In a way, no doubt, he is very little concerned about the niceties of forms. He makes one of his Chinese characters talk "pidgin" English, and all the rest discourse more or less correct Anglo-Saxon, scatters cheap puns and art chatter with careless humor, drops into and out of poetry and pantomime with equal facility, and makes the symbolic and the obvious chase each other as capriciously as fauns and nymphs on a Greek vase. But for my part I am so content to be even discussing such things as poetry and life in association with a modern English play that I am not greatly troubled with these bits of wilfulness so long as I feel that Mr. Housman preserves a certain background of reality, and that on this he paints a pattern which is pleasing, and now and then quite beautiful.

"The Chinese Lantern" is produced in a very realistic way. Costumes and scenery are all carefully designed so as to make you think that you are in a studio or art-shop in a Chinese city—not, say, at an art school in Paris. The actors squat in the Chinese way, Chinese street cries come to you through the open door or the sunlit windows, the Chinese Feast of Lanterns—"largely supplied from this emporium of the arts"—is on the evening bill, and there is a mid-day Chinese entertainment in the way of a State execution. Only through "The Chinese Lantern" shines the parable to which Mr. Housman has chosen to give this pretty Eastern dress. Olangstsi, the keeper of the art shop, lectures all day and every day on a famous Old Master, which has the place of honor in his studio. The picture is called "The Threshold of the Muses," an interior looking into a garden, and lighted from above by a Chinese lantern. It was painted three hundred years ago, when its aged author, Wiowani, stepped into it and was lost for ever to the world. The pupils paint the lanterns in the place where art is bought and sold, talk the art jargon, are bullied by the art mistress, and lectured at by the art master, and for the rest are frolicsome students, caring less for art than for executions, but ready enough to strike for their wages. The most commercial of them all is Yunglangtsi, the fat grocer-soul, who is to be forced into the artist world, so that he may marry the little Korean slave girl, Mee-Mee. Of Mee-Mee, born under a fortunate star, it has been predicted that she will turn the man who marries her into a great artist. And so the artist, not being born, must be made.

But all along, in the art-shop, there happens to dwell one artistic soul—Tikipu, the servant who mixes the students' colors during the day, and at night lights a candle, and steals away to the Old Master, which he copies, copies, continually. With him Mee-Mee, the little dancing, serving figure of life, is in love. But Tikipu is absorbed in Classic Art, and prostrates himself night and day before its unlit lantern, not divining the light in Mee-Mee's eyes. But, sharper than his own, they discern the weakness of his own work, its "too busy," self-conscious, imitative striving. And, finally, Olangstsi finds him out at his midnight vigils, tears his canvas in pieces, and leaves him prostrate and despairing before his Old Master. As he lies, conscious that his work has no value, the lantern begins to glow, and Wiowani, passionately invoked by his pupil, himself appears in the centre of his picture, stretches out his arms to Tikipu, and with him vanishes into the world of dreams. There he stays three years, till the time has come for Mee-Mee's marriage with Yunglangtsi, the impossible union of Bottom and Titania, the fairy spirit with the soul that hankers after sugar-plums and groceries. Then Wiowani restores Tikipu after his long draught from the springs of ancient art, and shows him where stands his true partner, Life, and how to look into the eyes from which Art draws its perpetual refreshment. Art and Life, united at last, go out into the world and the sunshine together. And in the studio-shop, where art is bought and sold, and Chinese lanterns produced by the dozen for the crowd to make merry with, whose owner will readily sacrifice his worshipped traditions and life itself only to keep going, the Old Master is put up for auction, and as the Jew bum-bailiff is about to knock it down for an old song—to speak precisely, for ten sen—it vanishes from its frame, and leaves Olangstsi nothing even to lecture from! Is not that a little parable for the times, and not least for the English drama?

I have left out many of the touches of fantasy in this sketch of "The Chinese Lantern," as well as most of its frolicsome setting, which Mr. Moorat's music delicately colors and illustrates. But really it is not so very obscure, and if the criticism of it be the author's waywardness, and his failure to give his story the unity and simplicity which make great symbolism, I answer again that the artistic spirit blows where it lists, and that jesting fun is not alien from serious purpose any more than (to compare great things with small) the revels of the Witches' Sabbath are alien from the purpose of "Faust." "The Chinese Lantern" is delightfully played, and I found the gaiety and freshness of Miss Irene Clarke as Mee-Mee, her "bird-like flutings" and flittings and pretty suggestion of Eastern poses and fashions, quite irresistible, and close to the poetic feeling of the play. Admirable, too, was Mr. Ainley's delivery as Tikipu of the verse assigned to him. But this character played itself; and for the rest, Mr. Housman's fancy was lightly and briskly sustained, and at no time, save, perhaps, for the first quarter of an hour, failed of its charm.

IN THE WOMEN'S RANKS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You may like to have my impressions of Saturday's demonstration in favor of Women's Suffrage. A sprinkling of men were requisitioned to help carry the heavy banners, and a few others walked by the side of the women, mostly husbands or fathers up from the provinces, men of a quiet and steady stamp. Before the start, having had my arm decorated by my womenkind with a red braid stamped "steward," I was accosted by a lady who besought me to bear, in her stead, the banner of H——, a banner seemingly with no followers. But before we had got in motion a score of women flung themselves, hot, breathless, but triumphant, upon the standard. No regimental colors were ever hailed with more fervency than was the banner of H—— by the fragile working-woman, her eyes ablaze with the fever of her devotion, who claimed it from my willing hands. She had lived intensely in her imagination for this great day; she had struggled and worked for it in her provincial branch, spent of her scanty time and energy, if she had not, indeed, broidered the flag with her own hands. Anyway, she seized the standard with an air of indisputable ownership, and though her companions protested that the burden would "kill Emily," the nervous energy in her working mouth, and the flash of her eye deep-sunk in her emaciated face, suggested that, if she fainted on the route, the colors would still be clutched in her grasp. Suddenly the march began. It was curious trying to seize the psychology of the crowd amid the running fire of chaff and cheers, the taunts, the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, and the howls of derision that were levelled pell-mell at the moving ranks. In certain spots, notably round Charing Cross, jeers and cheap witticisms of male hostility thickened the air, suggesting that all the heroes of the saloons and bars, the loungers of the "halls," the medical students, the betting men and bullies of the town had there joined forces, but, after Cockspur Street, there was a surprising absence of hostility. What struck one most in the ranks of faces lining the way was the expression of dumb surprise, of strained and puzzled masculine wonder. It was as though those hundreds of thousands of men had expected to see in "Suffragists" women monstrous, and scarcely to be recognised as such, and that these orderly ranks of women, well-dressed, bright, and intelligent, superior in bearing and appearance to most of the women in the crowd, were forcing into the male head strange mental lights hard to be reconciled. Perhaps it was the unfamiliar sight of women actually marching through the streets that puzzled the majority, but everywhere along the route that curious gaze of watching wonder predominated.

And in that sense, at least, the Suffragist procession was an education for the Londoner, whether from Lisson Grove, Mayfair, or a "residential" suburb. The psychology of a crowd is difficult to grasp when the general mass of feeling is complicated by the rich shades of sex emotion called forth on the individual's face by the appeal of women. Antagonism, pure anger, and even malice branded some of the faces I marked in the crowd, but the predominant tone in face and voice next to wonder was that of humor or amusement. They were not brilliant these old sallies about the "washing" and "the baby," the "old man" and "the dinner," but they were occasionally funny. "Where 'av yer left yer ole man? Locked 'im up in the coal-hole?" was said sympathetically to a particularly dignified lady. A large percentage of the democracy was out specially to enjoy the humor of the day, and the wags scanned each fresh section of the procession with a professional eye for "copy." On the other hand, the lady doctors, and nurses in gowns and hospital dress, were hailed with roaring applause along the route. One haughty old lady of sixty-five, an aristocrat to her finger tips, walked with perfect dignity and an air of supreme contempt for anything these unending rows of faces, coarse, wondering, or jeering, might express. Holding her dress high with careful hand, she stepped along with erect head, now and then glancing down her nose with a patronising smile for these vulgarians jostling around her. In Lower Regent Street a grey-haired woman in shabby black stood like a statue of Joy, stretching both arms towards the procession, her old wrinkled face shining with welcoming light, as though her deep, long-cherished dream had flowered into miraculous life. One girl, holding a provincial banner, gazed at the crowd with a smile of perfect love and fellowship wonderful to see, and the rare tenderness of her look drew from a City clerk the simple, expressive tribute "Face!" Halfway up Piccadilly a man stood in the roadway with a face wreathed in smiles of ecstatic gallantry—by his look I took him to be a chivalrous Irishman, a retired officer—and as each rank of women passed him he bared his head, and bowed with a gesture of abandoned devotion that told of generations of ancestors devoted to the "fair sex," and was stimulated, perhaps, by a few mid-day drams of whisky. While from Piccadilly balconies descended flowers and hand clappings, men dotted throughout the West End crowds repeatedly doffed their hats, as if they had come specially to show their sympathy to the women.

But for the most part one cannot affirm that the crowd was chivalrous; an open-mouthed and dumb surprise sat in the eyes, and set in the lines of the men's mouths. The women spectators, so far as I noticed them, were amused and sympathetic. The latent feeling of sex solidarity was aroused, and open admiration at sight of the women marching was excited in them, and showed itself in broad contrast to the masculine stare. It was touching to see the enthusiasm of many women in particular, who stood upright in carriages, or on the tops of omnibuses, or standing on the sidewalks fluttered their handkerchiefs frantically. One guessed that these were the women who, forbidden by male prejudice, or their own timidity, from joining in the procession, were showing their rebellious spirit, while yearning to be in the ranks they dared not join. This class of women must be large, as, despite the many expressions of lady-like horror of the Suffrage expressed so often in suburban circles, in all the watching faces of feminine curiosity I did not see a single expression of disgust.

The procession knew its little tragedies. In front of me, on the further side, suddenly a young man sprang forward from the crowd, and tore a smiling girl from the ranks! The man, so her companion said, was the girl's fiancé, who, enraged at her participation, after his vain protestations, had thus successfully lain in wait. Good things were said in the ranks, but not for the ear of the crowd. Thus, a provincial leader kept instructing her little band of working-women from the North, in this wise: "Look over there, Mrs. Greig, those are the Piccadilly clubs, and there is the enemy!" "It's a funny thing, isn't it, why the men in the clubs have all bald heads; it isn't through too much work, I reckon." And, looking up at the windows of clubland, sure enough, they were blocked with bald pates, bald heads with white whiskers, white heads with bald crowns, venerable heads of shining ivory, the egg-shaped craniums, and broad shining domes of masculine intelligence, all gathered from the post-prandial armchair to ponder the spectacle of an earl's daughter leading ten thousand of her sex, and nigh all the distinguished women of the day, marching under seventy flying banners, one of which was symbolically broidered with the device of white doves in flight bearing the legend "Upwards and Onwards." I have been in many large mass meetings, but I have never seen gathered together so great a number of intelligent faces, as passed from the ranks into the Albert Hall.

It was, indeed, a picked body of women, brought together by one tie and by the magnetism of character. The vast majority of faces, slightly above the average in beauty, were thoughtful and interesting faces. The appeal that the women made to the crowd was of dignified modesty in bearing, combined with a quiet determination to go through with the march under any circumstances. The pleasing consciousness of looking well on a fine day helped the women to feel charitable and kindly disposed to the men; it was the subtle reply of the sex to male hostility. Although the demonstration was well organised throughout by its capable and able leaders, it was less the example and speeches of the latter that impressed one than the intense feeling and democratic esprit-de-corps in the ranks, and the keen enthusiasm of the whole body of working-women, from the lady doctor to the mill-hand, for the Suffrage.—Yours, &c.,

A Provincial Man.

Letters to the Editor.

THE BASIS OF THE TRIPLE ENTENTE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Will you allow an Englishman, resident in France, to make some remarks on your leading article in this week's issue? I cannot but sympathise with the objection of many English Liberals and Socialists to the meeting between the King and the Tsar; many Frenchmen dislike the alliance between France and Russia for the same reason. The strong argument on the other side is that which you have already mentioned, namely, that it might be worse for the cause of democracy both in Russia and elsewhere to drive the Tsar into the arms of the German Emperor. It is a case of choosing the less of two evils; and it is by no means certain that both England and France have not chosen the less, even from a wider point of view than that of a purely selfish and exclusive patriotism.

In any case is there not some inconsistency between the attitude of the above-mentioned English Liberals and Socialists towards the Russian Government and their attitude (or that of many of them) towards the German Government? The enthusiasm which so many English Liberals seem to feel for the German Emperor (witness, for instance, the "Daily News" passim) has always caused mild surprise in France. After all there are the same sort of objections to a rapprochement with Prussian Cæsarism as to one with Russian Tsardom, but one did not hear of any Liberals who objected to the reception of the German Emperor in England; on the contrary, the Liberal Press covered his Majesty with flowers. One was irresistibly reminded of the extraordinary attitude of the Whigs towards Napoleon, an attitude which has hardly been confirmed by the verdict of history.

Now, I do not suggest that the German Government has been guilty of atrocities (the word may be used in your columns, if not in the English Parliament) such as those which have been committed by the Russian Government. But I do suggest that neither the German Emperor nor his Government is a shining example of the "constitutional principle." The Palmerstonian policy would, therefore, exclude an understanding with Germany. In regard to the crimes of the German Government the English Press for the most part is silent. Yet the government of Prussian Poland is no small crime. THE NATION has protested against the iniquitous expropriation law recently passed, but there was scarcely a protest from the English Liberal Press when Polish children of tender years were being sent to prison and permanently separated from their parents for the offence of saying their prayers in their native language. And what of Alsace-Lorraine? Has the annexation of that province against the will of its inhabitants ceased to be a crime because it is nearly forty years old? Is it nothing that Prussia has not yet given to Alsace-Lorraine anything like the liberty that England has already given to the Transvaal? Someone ought to publish in England all the facts about the government of Alsace-Lorraine, with its vexatious restrictions on ordinary freedom, its petty persecution of the French-speaking people, and so on. It is an indictable offence to place a notice in the French language on one's shop-window, even in a place where few people speak any other.

If, then, we adopt the principle that a democratic country should be guided in its foreign relations by the character of the Government in other countries, England must eschew the friendship of the German Emperor, which seems to be particularly desired by many English Liberals. A Government which decides all questions of foreign policy, of peace or war, without regard to the elected representatives of the nation, is a despotic Government; and in Germany the representatives of the nation are expressly deprived of any voice in such questions. Moreover, the German Emperor is a far greater danger to democracy in Europe than the Tsar, who has not the power to be a danger. What is the pro-German policy of the Vatican but a recognition of that sufficiently patent fact? The advisers of the present Pope may not be very wise in some directions, but they are shrewd enough to see where lies the only hope of an effective barrier against the progress of democracy, that is, of "modernism" in the political and economic spheres.

In regard to the triple entente and its effect on our relations with Germany, the issue seems to be a simple one: Are we or are we not to be free to make what arrangements or alliances we please without the permission of William II.? The question whether we are to "isolate" Germany does not arise. The Triple Alliance still exists and, if Italy gives it only a lukewarm adhesion, who but the German Emperor is to blame for the fact? It has been made plain to Italy that the price of German friendship is hostility to England and France, and she declines to pay that price. Nevertheless, Germany has still Austria as a firm ally—or a faithful servant—and, that being so, she cannot be said to be "isolated." The real cause of German irritation is the final failure of her attempt to isolate France, which succeeded for so many years. No other country considers it a cause of offence that other nations should arrange their differences. The time has come when we must make up our minds whether we will submit to this intolerable interference of one Power in the affairs of every other. Nobody could be less militarist than myself, but, if war were the only alternative to submitting to a dictatorship of the German Emperor over the whole of Europe, I should vote for war.

I do not, however, for a moment believe that we have any such alternative before us. The bellicose remarks of the German Emperor, which have been carefully circulated by an arranged "indiscretion," are one more example of his incomparable mastery of the art of bluff. He succeeded in intimidating M. Rouvier, but he will find M. Clemenceau less easily frightened. On this occasion French opinion is perfectly calm, and it will support M. Clemenceau in asserting the right of France to form what friendships or alliances she pleases. It is not the Nationalists or the Royalists who support M. Clemenceau; on the contrary, such papers as the "Eclair" and the "Patrie" have been trying to work up another scare, and the "Gaulois" is hostile to the policy of the French Government. I sincerely trust that English Liberals will pause before they do anything to weaken the understanding between England and France, which is the best hope for the future of European democracy. —Yours, &c.,

"THE ANTI-INDIAN ENGLISHMAN."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Referring to Mr. Abbott's letter, published in your issue of June 6th, may I say that so far from denouncing the Indian's demand for a share in the government of his own country, I am, and always have been, in favor of increasing the already large and preponderating share which he has in this respect, nor have I ever recommended, as Mr. Abbott says, the suppression of English education, Western literature, freedom of speech, and the newspapers. If Mr. Abbott will kindly read my book instead of drawing conclusions, as he admittedly has, from what your reviewer wrote, he will see that these very comprehensive conclusions are not mine; hardly mine, magnified.

As to Mr. Gokhale, I merely meant that in Russia, whose rule it is the fashion now to compare with our own in India, he would speedily find himself in gaol if he spoke therein of the Government of the Tsar as he does of the Government of the King-Emperor in India.

Mr. Abbott surely must be unaware that all offices in India, except a very small number, are not only open to, but are filled, and, as a rule, very efficiently filled, by Indian gentlemen.

Is it too much to ask Mr. Abbott, however great the sacrifice may be, to read a book before he adopts an abstract of its contents, founded, if indeed it was founded, for I myself should not have said this, on your review?—Yours, &c.,

THE MEANING OF "BANDE MATARAM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his letter last week Mr. Rees persists that the patriotic Indian cry of "Bande Mataram" is a direct reference to the Goddess Kali, and not to the Motherland of India. For answer, I can only go back again to the origin of the song in Bankim Chandra's "Ananda Math," a historical romance treating of the Sanyasi or Fakir rising in Bengal at the time of Warren Hastings. One of the characters is introduced singing the now familiar poem that begins "Bande Mataram," or "Hail, Mother!" and when questioned as to the meaning of these words, he answers:—

> "We own no mother but our country. There is a saying, 'One's mother and the land of one's birth are high as heaven.' We regard the land of our birth as nothing else than our mother herself."

So the conversation goes on for pages, in which there is no mention of Kali whatever. Later on in the book the poem is spoken of as the "Hymn to the Motherland."

Or let us take a literal translation of the first few lines: "Hail, Mother! I bow before her who flows with pleasant water, is rich in fruits, and over whom the cool wind blows." The next two verses continue this description of a rich and beautiful country like Bengal. Then the poem speaks of the country's great population, and of their strength in arms. Then of her temples and images, of Durga, the triumphant goddess, of Vani, goddess of wisdom, and of Lakshmi, goddess of wealth, which are the forms or symbols of the country. And lastly, the poem returns to the praise of the land itself in almost the same words as the opening verses.

If in these lines the poet did not mean the Motherland when he used the word "Mataram," we may as well give up language, for it is impossible to express any meaning with it.

In a later scene in the story we are shown an act of worship to Kali as the symbolic goddess of Bengal, just as we are also shown an act of initiation to Vishnu. But the symbol is not the same as the reality; or when Mr. Rees sings "Rule, Britannia," is he worshipping the penny figure of a woman with a trident sitting on a shield?—Yours, &c.,

THE REVIEWER.

June 16th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his letter in THE NATION of June 13th, dealing with the review of his book, "The Real India," which appeared in your issue of May 23rd, Mr. Rees remarks, with regard to the meaning of the words, "Bande Mataram," that he has "yet to learn that any person with any claim to being a scholar has put forward the interpretation which your reviewer treats as if it were acknowledged to be correct." This interpretation was that the words, as used in the song from "Ananda Math," are a patriotic invocation to the Motherland, India, or, if I may so suggest, Bengal. Mr. Rees will perhaps accept the authority of Mr. S. M. Mitra, a Bengali gentleman, who is as staunch a supporter of the Government of India and of the policy of the partition of Bengal as he is himself, and who is therefore at least an unbiased witness. In his work, "Indian Problems," p. 67, Mr. Mitra writes as follows: "The Bande Mataram song is in praise of Bengal, and expresses the love of her sons for the mother-country."

These are the words of one who is spoken of in the introduction to "Indian Problems" by no less an authority than Sir George Birdwood, as "a philosophical and scholarly student of Indian politics," and whose claims to Oriental scholarship Mr. Rees will, I presume, hardly dispute.—Yours, &c.,

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Allow me to thank you for the courageous and outspoken article on this subject in your issue of June 6th. It exactly expresses the attitude of this Society, which was formed last autumn for the purpose of combining road-users in self-defence against the tyranny of motor vehicles. Its object is:—

> "The protection of the public roads and all who use them, and the owners and occupiers of roadside property, from the damage, danger, nuisance, and annoyance caused by the improper use of motor cars and any other vehicles."

Relief from the present intolerable state of things, which grows worse year by year with the increase of vehicles in number, speed, size, and weight, can only be obtained by combination; for, as you say, the Local Government Board is indifferent, the local authorities are largely composed of motorists, and the newspapers, with a few honorable exceptions, are entirely in the hands of the motor interest. They will publish nothing displeasing to the advertisers of motor cars, and they ignore the public interest. They are, in fact, debauched, and have flung away the liberty of the Press.

I enclose a pamphlet, stating the case for the public in detail, and I beg to draw your attention particularly to pages 23-28. In view of the gross hardships and injury to health inflicted on the poorer classes who live by the roadside, the absolute apathy of this Parliament, which contains so many professed champions of the poor, is noteworthy. It can only be explained by ignorance of the facts or by sheer hypocrisy.—Yours, &c.,

"AN INVASION OF LIBERTY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Will you allow a clergyman who has some experience of work in the East End to thank you for your excellent article on Mr. Gladstone's Prevention of Crime Bill, and to point out one or two misapprehensions under which Mr. J. M. Robertson seems to labor in his defence of that measure? Mr. Robertson, in his article in the "Westminster Gazette" and in his speech in the House of Commons, defended what he calls "the humanity" of the measure, but he seems to confuse the principle of the indeterminate sentence and the principle which will be brought into operation should the Bill become law. "The thrice-convicted offender," says Mr. Robertson, "will be sent to a special prison, where he will be considerately treated on the 'Borstal' lines, and will not be set free until, in the opinion of all those concerned in his supervision, he may be released without risk." The fact is that the thrice-convicted offender will be sent to an ordinary convict prison and there will serve every day of the sentence inflicted upon him, and only after the expiration of that sentence will he be sent to the special prison from which Mr. Robertson hopes so much. Again, Mr. Robertson seems perfectly satisfied with the provisions by which the liberty of offenders is entirely handed over to prison warders and officials—a class which, as every advocate of prison reform has always insisted, is least of all fitted for such a delicate task. What is wanted is not the addition of an indeterminate sentence to a fixed sentence, but an enlargement of the system by which offenders may, should their conduct justify it, be released before the expiration of their sentences.

Mr. Gladstone's Bill seems to many Liberals to be definitely opposed to every Liberal principle.

It seems, as you rightly point out, an infringement of the spirit if not of the letter of Habeas Corpus.

Although it introduces a principle of momentous gravity hitherto unknown in any European State, it has been introduced under the Ten Minutes Rule with the obvious intention of curtailing discussion.

It finds its strongest support from men of the type of Sir Ralph Littler and Sir Robert Anderson, who seem unable to use the word humanitarian without prefixing to it some depreciatory epithet.

One would have thought that Mr. Gladstone's tenure of the Home Office would have led him to consider the advisability of legislation which would render less likely another Beck or Edalji case, or which would put an end to the flogging of prisoners at the instance of a secret tribunal. Some such measure would be more in accordance with Liberal traditions than the reactionary Bill he has put forward.—Yours, &c.,

DOES THE SUGAR CONVENTION BETRAY FREE TRADE?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Every man now sitting on the Government benches would unhesitatingly have answered this question in the affirmative, had it been put when the Sugar Convention Bill was before the House of Commons in 1903, and the fact cannot be burked that there is deep concern in the country on account of the surrender by the Government of the vital principles underlying Free Trade by the renewal of this Convention; and it is certain that nothing that has happened since the General Election is likely to result in the loss of so many earnest supporters of the Government as this deviation.

The hundreds of thousands of staunch Free Traders to whom the fear of Home Rule was as nothing compared with their horror and dread of the sacrifice of those principles under which our country has progressed during the last three-quarters of a century, cannot look with complacency at this surrender, or be satisfied with the reasons for the same given by Sir Edward Grey.

The avowed object of the late Government in entering into the Sugar Convention was to keep alive the West Indian sugar industry, which was said to be imperilled by the low price at which sugar was finding its way into the homes of our people in consequence of certain countries, from which we imported sugar, giving bounties upon shipments to England. This was, at any rate, a frank avowal of a determination to lay upon the consumers of Great Britain the burden of keeping alive an industry in Jamaica not having the inherent strength to compete with outsiders unless thus supported—a taxing of the many for the benefit of the few—which is the bed rock of Protection. At the General Election the iniquity of this proceeding was prominently placed before the people as an example of the evils of Protection; and certainly no one could then have anticipated the renewal of the Sugar Convention by a Liberal Government having a special mandate to uphold the cause of Free Trade.

The attempt at justification made by Sir Edward Grey in the House of Commons on the 3rd inst. for the renewal of the Convention, that "the other Powers had agreed to our proposal that our ports should be thrown open," and in consequence of this concession "it was only reasonable that we should meet them to the extent of remaining parties to the agreement," was far from convincing. I do not remember ever before to have seen it suggested that the throwing open of our ports should be made contingent upon the approval of "the other Powers."

Mr. Villiers, at the foot of his letter in THE NATION, of the 13th inst., says "the matter will not be allowed to remain where it is." May this be taken as indicating that there is room for reasonable hope that this most remarkable volte face on the part of this Liberal Free Trade Government may yet be, in some way, remedied?

Earl Percy, in his reply to Sir Edward Grey, voiced the feelings at present disturbing the minds of multitudes of Free Traders when he said, "that the supporters of the Government had been badly served, and that it was impossible for any dialectical ingenuity to cover the fact that the Government had reversed the policy put before the country at the General Election."

To simple-minded people the position of Free Trade candidates at the next General Election appears to have been made most difficult by the action of the Government in the renewal of the Sugar Convention. It hardly seems likely that it will be regarded by the electorate as a sufficient defence to say that this was the act of the Government, and that their supporters in Parliament were not consulted and are therefore not responsible.—Yours, &c.,

WHAT DOES "VOTES FOR WOMEN" MEAN?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is satisfactory to note that neither of your correspondents who comment on my recent letter in THE NATION welcome the idea of the possible government of England by women, as both endeavour to argue that it is impossible. Miss Black insists that my assumption that the only direct way of achieving votes for women is by Adult Suffrage is unwarranted. The Prime Minister's statement in reference to this thorny topic was undoubtedly cryptic, but he distinctly said that his Government would only give facilities for a franchise for women on "a democratic basis." Whether he would consider such a Bill as that suggested by Miss Black sufficiently democratic it is impossible to say. Adult Suffrage could not be rejected on this score, and may therefore be fairly taken as the basis of an argument. As to Miss Black's statement that the number of women electors will remain inferior to that of men, this depends on her assumption that the Bill passed will be such as she describes. But such a Bill would be scarcely on "a democratic basis," for it would give the vote to a smaller proportion of the total number of women than of men, leaving the women with the grievance of being seriously under-represented. As to her argument that the opinions of women, varying as do those of men on many subjects, the only result of giving votes to the former would be that the country would be governed by a majority of men and women together. I cannot agree that this would avoid the danger I foresee, for this majority might well be dominated by a larger proportion of women than of men, and such men as composed it would probably share the feminine characteristics of judging matters by instinct and emotion rather than by reason and logic. I can imagine serious crises arising, especially in reference to sex legislation or warfare with other countries, when the vote of a considerable majority of women, acting under the impulse of sex antagonism or emotional excitement, coupled with the want of practical knowledge, would cause great disaster. As to women being more expert in many matters now discussed in Parliament than men, I cannot agree, and certainly not in the case cited by Miss Black. While a number of drunken and careless women assert this right to risk their children's lives through overlaying by having them to sleep with them, I can see no "opéra bouffe spectacle," but one for thankfulness when men, most of whom are fathers of families, endeavour to dispute such a right.

Miss Tomlinson has failed to grasp the meaning of my letter, and the question as to whether women are most likely to vote Liberal or Conservative is immaterial to my argument. As regards her final statement that numbers of the existing male electorate have neither administrative nor legislative capacity, surely, if this be the case, it would be unwise to add largely to this class by granting votes to women, who have still most of the arts of government to learn.—Yours, &c.,

FLORENCE TRAVERS.

Tortington House, Arundel, Sussex,
June 15th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his letter appearing in your issue of last week, Col. Grimshaw Haywood raises the question of married women voting in Parliamentary elections, were women entitled to vote on the same terms as men.

Every woman householder, whether married or single, would have a vote under the household franchise. A certain percentage of married women, whose names appear on the rate-book, owing to their husbands' disinclination to serve on juries, or for some other reason, would thus be qualified. Married women could also qualify under the property and service franchise.

With regard to the final paragraph in your correspondent's letter, I gather Col. Haywood to contend that, since the Premier has foreshadowed an Electoral Reform Bill to which it will be possible to move a Woman Suffrage amendment, there is no necessity for Suffragettes to press further their claims by continuing to bring pressure to bear upon the Government at bye-elections. But, as the leaders of the militant suffrage movement have explained, this declaration on the part of Mr. Asquith is by no means satisfactory, and so little faith have they in this exceedingly conditional promise of Government neutrality towards a speculative amendment to a problematic Electoral Reform Bill, that they are determined to continue their agitation with renewed vigor until they have Government assurance of the enactment of a Woman Suffrage measure.—Yours, &c.,

THE TRADE RETURNS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In my letter on this subject last week I advocated the necessity for the difference of values in years to be allowed. Since writing the letter I have received the White Paper of this Session, No. Cd. 4,115. It is a tabulated statement of the imports and exports from 1900 to 1907 inclusive. The former year is taken as a basis for the assessment of the values of all the others. I shall only take one instance as an example. The imports of 1900 were valued at £523,075,000, those of 1907 at £645,904,000. But, although 1900 was a "boom" year, and so was last year, the values of the goods of 1907 had inflated much more than those of eight years ago. Hence the Board of Trade experts, in re-valuing 1907 imports on the basis of 1900, reduce the former to £599,592,000, a reduction of 9 per cent. That still leaves an increase of 14·5 per cent., instead of 23·5 per cent., the nominal one. This position is proved exactly by the tonnages that carried these goods, which was in 1900, 36·1 million tons net register; in 1907, 41·4 million tons net register; increase, 5·3 million tons, or 14·4 per cent. This tonnage was for vessels, both steam and sail, British and foreign nationality, which brought cargoes only from oversea.

Of course, owing to variety of loading, it is seldom we get such a result down to a decimal point. In the present case it is so. It proves the accuracy with which this return has been prepared, and, incidentally, it confirms the position which I have taken up in THE NATION.—Yours, &c.,

THE PAN-ANGLICAN CONGRESS AND DIVORCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It seems regrettable that on an occasion of reunion such as that afforded by the Pan-Anglican Congress, such language as was yesterday used in regard to the remarriage of divorced persons should have been encouraged or permitted by any responsible person. Considering that for fifty years the ecclesiastical Courts of England actually granted divorces a vinculo, and for at least 150 years afterwards granted decrees of separation as stepping stones to divorce by Act of Parliament, considering also that the Bishops of the Church of England did not unanimously oppose the Divorce Act of 1857, it seems incredible that Mr. G. W. E. Russell should have ventured to denounce the re-marriage of divorced persons as being in theory a "doctrine of the devil" and in practice "legalised concubinage," which terms he also applied to marriages with a deceased wife's sister.

By what logical principle does Mr. Russell dissociate himself from the early Christians, who regarded the re-marriage of widowers and widows with the same abhorrence as Mr. Russell expresses in regard to the re-marriage of divorced persons?

On what theological principle does he fail to denounce the Roman Church for deriving money from granting dispensations for marriages which he stigmatises as being diabolical in character? On what ethical principle does he denounce the laws of his country? Many members of the Church of England, and many of those to whom the Church is dear as the Church of their country, cannot fail to be deeply wounded by expressions of opinion which are not only unsupported by any civil or ecclesiastical authority, but which are also as unreasoning as they are uncharitable. —Yours, &c.,

Hon. Secretary, the Divorce Law Reform Union,

THE CRUX OF "THE TEMPEST."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—While scarcely hoping to convince your correspondent on this subject, I cannot allow him to object to my making the singular pronoun "it" refer to "labors," when he himself puts on it the burden of a whole sentence something like "indulging in sweet thoughts" (I regret I no longer have his letter by me in order to quote his exact words, but I think I remember rightly). Several conjecturers (ranging from 1853 onwards) have, however, tried to square matters by dropping the "s" of "labors" or omitting "it" altogether, which proves, nevertheless, that I am not alone in my reading. As for the value of the Quarto in this instance, Mr. Aldis Wright does not apparently consider it of sufficient importance to include it among the various readings that he quotes in the Cambridge Edition, though he gives "most busie least" of Folios 2, 3, and 4, besides two columns of emendations.

"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" Shakespeare himself would smile at all this "throwing about of brains."—Yours, &c.,

"THE HISTORY OF THE VOLUNTEERS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his interesting notice of my book last week, your reviewer controverts my statement that the "Corresponding Society of London" was the central organisation in 1794 for the dissemination of republican views and for maintaining the connection with the leaders of France; and he cites the fact that Burke himself was a member of such a body fifteen years earlier as evidence that the patriotism of these societies could not be impugned. It may be largely a matter of opinion at the present time how far the societies formed many years before the Revolution with the object of furthering the cause of Parliamentary reform were responsible for the spirit of unrest which was growing up in England, Scotland, and Ireland during the years 1792-5. The Secret Committee appointed by the House of Commons in 1794 to investigate the matter were, however, unanimous in condemning the methods employed by the Corresponding Society of London in spreading seditious views and exciting the people to rise against the existing constitution. It was then clearly shown that that body was in sympathy and correspondence with the Republican leaders, and that the Paris Convention held constant communication with the branches of the society situated throughout the three kingdoms. It is, of course, open to anyone at this distance of time to maintain that the possible dangers arising out of the activity of the democratic societies in 1794 were exaggerated by the fears of the squirearchy. It is, nevertheless, certain that the original methods of these bodies had been supplanted to a great extent by others of a less constitutional order, and that the wholesale contamination of the lower classes by revolutionary ideas constituted in itself a serious danger to the internal peace and safety of the country. It was to counteract the spread of this evil, quite as much as to ensure the country against invasion, that the Volunteers of 1794 were called into being.

Your reviewer has himself supplied an excellent reason for my having "roamed" rather widely in my treatment of the subject, for, as he truly remarks, "the chief interest of the Volunteers is social rather than military."—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

IN THE PINE WOOD

BETWEEN the sombre pine tops lie
Blue strips of dreaming tranquil sky,
And flakes of fleecy cloudlets creep
Over the azure lakes asleep
Between the sombre pines.

Between the sombre pine tops flash
Long slanting sunbeam spears, which dash
Across the stately stems and throw
Their burning shafts down here below.
Into this silent shadowy deep,
Cascades of glittering sunshine leap
Down to the dusky floor, and flow
In golden-glowing pools below;
While in the branches' spreading net
Stray sunbeams captured, glint and fret:
In flickering threads some break away
Joining the busy shadow-play.

Beyond the pines, a quivering haze
Hangs over all the greenwood maze,
Where alleys dim, through secret shades,
Wind down to deep mid-forest glades.
Out in her Court of glimmering green
The slender silver birch is Queen;
And as the wanton winds come by,
The lordly pines look down and sigh
With envy, for the breeze has kiss'd
Her trembling tresses into mist.

These lofty pines shut in a pool
Of darkened Silence, deep and cool.
The stems rise through to upper air,
The woods beyond are all astir;
But here it is so very still,
That should the o'er-hanging branches spill
A single cone, it rattles in
From bough to bough with spreading din.
Stilled are these depths, but up above
Runs rippling from a brooding dove,
A murmuring monotone of Love.

All through the golden summer day
Within these aisles I gladly stay,
Between the spreading pillars see
The depths of His infinity.
I laugh with joy, I have no fear
Even of Him who is so near,
With each rapt sense, the Spirit's eyes,
I feel His presence, recognise
Behind the veil and splendid dress
The Vision of His loveliness.
And though He is great beyond all thought,
And I so small, so near to nought,
I dare to thank Him who has given
Through love of Earth, the joy of Heaven.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE news that Mr. Swinburne is at present engaged upon the final revision of what he regards as his greatest prose work, "The Age of Shakespeare," is certain to rouse expectation to a high pitch. In spite of intervals of unbalanced eulogy or vituperation, Mr. Swinburne's critical prose is far from being the least valuable part of his work. The fine enthusiasm shown in his studies of the Elizabethan dramatists has done more to revive interest in the great names of Elizabethan drama than has been done by any writer since Lamb. In its fire and energy of imagination, its passion for pure literature, Mr. Swinburne's mind is more akin to the Elizabethan age than to our own, so that his study of "The Age of Shakespeare" can hardly fail to be a remarkable book.

MAJOR MARTIN HUME has just finished a book called "Two English Queens and a Spanish King," which will be published by Messrs. Methuen in the early autumn. It is a history, drawn entirely from contemporary sources, of the efforts made by Philip II. to obtain control of English policy during the period from the death of Edward VI. to the catastrophe of the Armada. The relations during thirty years between Philip and Mary and Elizabeth are dealt with fully, and the gradual decline of Spain is explained as an inevitable consequence of the impossibility of maintaining the traditional alliance between England and the House of Burgundy in the new circumstances created by the adhesion of England to the Reformation. Much new information will be contained in the book with regard to Philip's action as King Consort of England and his life whilst here, the efforts he made to win popularity in England, and the consequent jealousy and disappointment of his own Spanish courtiers. The narrative also relates the personal efforts of Philip's various agents in England to attain their ends at first by pacific means, then by the promotion of rebellion and the plots for the murder of Elizabeth, and, lastly, by the attempted invasion and conquest. The material for this part of the story is drawn from the Spanish diplomatic correspondence which Major Hume has calendared for the Record Office, and from other contemporary manuscripts. Major Hume's former books prove that he does not belong to the school that regards dullness as essential to a serious historical work. His coming volume may, therefore, be expected to be entertaining as well as scholarly and authoritative.

AN unknown work by Ibsen has recently been discovered, and will probably be included in an edition of his unpublished pieces which is now in preparation. The title of the new discovery is "Song at Akershus," Akershus being the name of a fortress in Christiania. It dates from Ibsen's early years, and is in form a romantic tale. A plan for transforming Ibsen's house into an Ibsen museum has been put forward of late, and is said to have met with support, but Madame Ibsen, who still lives there, thinks that the time has hardly come for realising the project. Ibsen was fond of art, although perhaps no very fastidious critic, and his house contains a fairly large—not remarkable—collection of pictures, and, of course, numerous objects intimately connected with his life and work. It was furnished in his lifetime in a rather formal French style, hard and cold, but elegant.

As a sort of companion volume to his "Memories of Eight Parliaments," Mr. Henry W. Lucy has just completed a book of private reminiscences which will be issued in the autumn by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. The book should be full of interest. All Parliamentary men of note during the last thirty years have known Mr. Lucy, and he has known them, and his luncheon table has long been one of the most interesting of their resorts. He has also the rare gift of the diarist. The opening chapters will appear in the July "Cornhill Magazine" under the title "Sixty Years in the Wilderness: Some Passages by the Way."

ALTHOUGH the Australian bushrangers have formed the theme of innumerable novels—Boldrewood's "Robbery Under Arms" and Henry Kingsley's "Recollections of Geoffrey Hamlyn" will occur to everybody—no authentic account of their exploits seems to have been published. The subject is, however, to be dealt with in "The Story of the Australian Bushrangers," by Mr. G. E. Boxall, a book which Mr. Fisher Unwin will issue within the next few weeks. While of considerable interest for the light which it throws upon the old transportation system, the book should also appeal strongly to all lovers of sensational adventure. The careers of Pierce the Cannibal, of Jacky Jacky, the gentleman bushranger, of John Lynch, are as exciting as any novel, and these are only a few of the worthies dealt with by Mr. Boxall.

THE same publisher is about to issue an English edition of a Socialist novel by Mr. Ellison Harding, an American writer, which has had a great success in the United States. It attempts to describe a state of society in which Socialism has triumphed, and the author's aim has been to bring out the fact that the idea of the Socialistic state is not a cast-iron Utopia, but is continually undergoing development. The title of the English edition will be "The Woman Who Vowed."

MANY of the ladies who enlivened the Court of Louis XIV. can at least claim the posthumous merit of having given rise to a number of readable biographies. Louise de la Vallière, who preceded Madame de Montespan in the affections of the Grand Monarque, is known to most readers from her engaging but rather shadowy appearance in Dumas' pages. An excellent biography of Louise de la Vallière, by M. Jules Lair, has appeared in French, and as Messrs. Hutchinson are bringing out a translation in a few weeks, English readers will have an opportunity of learning the true facts about the lady whom Dumas made the playfellow and fiancée of Raoul de Bragelonne until the young Louis fell in love with her.

A WRITER in the current "Quarterly Review" remarks that "in the English language there will soon be as many monographs on Napoleon as there are German treatises on Hamlet." There certainly seems to be no slackening of the amazing interest shown in whatever bears even remotely upon Napoleon's career. Indeed, the demand for books in any way relating to him seems to be on the increase, and publishers are not slow to gratify this taste. Messrs. Methuen, for instance, have in preparation two important works, "The Men Bonapartes," by Mr. A. H. Atteridge, and "The Women Bonapartes," by Mr. H. Noel Williams, which will be published during the autumn. A feature of both books is to be the illustrations, which are to be many in number and carefully chosen.

MR. JOHN GALSWORTHY asks us to say that "Villa Rubein," announced as a new book on this page, is an early novel which was published by him under a pseudonym in 1900. It is now to be published in America for the first time with the author's name. This led to our mistake.

FRANCE AND ENGLAND.*

The impact caused by our country upon three Frenchmen so potential as Voltaire, Rousseau, and Montesquieu is a worthy subject for independent study. It might be treated in a variety of ways. The blend of two cognate systems of common sense, the philosophic consequences of the fusion, the point of view of comparative or evolutionary literature, might easily have been given a front rank in such a volume. Professor Collins is content to emphasise the biographical interest first of all. He considers the visits of the great philosophers as episodes in their careers, and he uses the episodes to reflect a little light upon certain aspects of English society when the century was in full swing. The obvious and common-sense method of treatment is, perhaps, after all the best. For as Mr. Birrell truthfully says, it is often so much easier to be odd, intense, overwise, enigmatic, than to be sensible, simple, and to see the plain truth about things. Mr. Collins sees the plain truth and puts it forcibly. He has put the same case to us before, and never without a frank and positive insistence upon the facts which he wishes us to underline. He sets the matter before us more fully, and, if possible, more conclusively, in the present volume, with three nice portraits and two indifferent views of Wooton Hall—at least, Mr. Collins calls it Wooton, the illustrator calls it by a name of his own.

To parallel the importance of what these three Frenchmen thought of England we should have in the nineteenth century to evoke Renan, Taine, and Hugo. The sum total of what Rousseau, Renan, and Hugo thought about England could be enclosed in a small parcel, but with Montesquieu and with Taine, and, above all, with Voltaire, the case is quite otherwise. Voltaire it was, of course, who set the example of crossing the Channel to take a graduate course in natural and political philosophy. Descartes, Pascal, and Leibnitz were great abstract thinkers, no doubt, but for modern applications and uses all Europe must henceforth sit at the feet of Newton, Locke, and Bolingbroke. The revelation is the more remarkable, inasmuch as sixty years had barely elapsed since the Roi Soleil had instructed his ambassador in England to make inquiries about the native literature, in very much the sort of terms that a government might instruct a consul at the present day to collect the runes of a remote island of Polynesia. The result in this case was the discovery of an epic poet preferred by the bigoted self-love of the rude Englanders to Corneille himself. His politics were unspeakably savage, and his chief work was a poetical Leviathan in the style of Du Bartas on the Fall of Man! Voltaire changed all this so completely that it became as much a practice of Frenchmen to take lessons in English liberty, and to breathe the strong air of equality before the law over here, as later in the century it became the practice of popular native writers, such as Hume and Smollett and Sterne, to ratify their reputations in Paris. But Voltaire went further than this when he decided that he would prosecute his observations to the point of focusing and summarising once for all the distinctive peculiarities of our national character. Shakespeare and the character writers, not to speak of Arbuthnot and Swift, had already attempted something of the sort, but it had never amounted to much beyond a caricature, brilliant or satiric it might be even to the point of genius, but never much more than a thumbnail sketch. Burke once said that you could not frame an indictment against a whole nation, and the same might be said of a normal national type. Voltaire, however, attempted it, and, in making the endeavour, initiated a type of literary composition far more amusing than convincing.

No type of book of the more recently evolved and complex order is more attractive to a student of history and human nature than this offshoot of the department of topography and travel. Few recent works have had more enthusiastic advocates, perhaps, than such as Taine's "Notes on England," the chapters which Mr. Bryce devotes to the colour and character of American life, Wallace's chapters on Russian idiosyncrasies, Smith's "Chinese Characteristics," Fielding Hall's "Soul of a People," Hamerton's "French and English"; a good many others could easily be cited, but these will suffice. Voltaire conspicuously set the fashion of making national character a thread on which to hang a series of observations on human life, penetrating, humorous, sardonic, epigrammatic, and occasionally wise. To a large extent he invented the Continental convention of the English character and the English climate. The Englishman became the typical eccentric and hypochondriac, the typical thinker and the practical man, and the politician par excellence. As to English history, "the hangman should be their historian, for he has generally settled their disputes," and he compared our countrymen to a hogshead of their own strong beer, the top of it froth, the bottom dregs, and the middle excellent. The praise of these laudatory foreigners, it must be admitted, is generally double-edged, and often rather cruelly so. We remember a Frenchman in conversation laying stress upon the fact that the English clergy were the most respectable in the world. And, when we pressed for further elucidation, his point was that their money credit was superior to that of any other priests, and would carry them farther in any strange house of entertainment. Very similar is Voltaire's praise when he insists that the English clergy are more virtuous than the ecclesiastics of France. English clergymen are educated, he points out, in the comparative simplicity and rustic remoteness of Oxford or Cambridge; it is late in life before they can reach the dignities of the Church, and by that time they have scarcely any other passion but avarice. Their manners are so awkward, and their opportunities for intrigue are so few, that it is a usual thing in England for a bishop, perforce, to be content with his own wife. Well-beneficed clergymen may go to taverns, for custom allows it, but if they get intoxicated, they will do so in a serious way which will cause no scandal whatsoever. Hearing stories of the licentious habits of French abbés, the Englishman may well shudder and thank God he is a Protestant. Commencing with his experience of Greenwich Fair one fine evening, and the King's birthday, when he took England for another Garden of Eden, Voltaire's impressions of England are persistently funny, flattering, penetrating, and amusing: but they bear evidence in every line of the absurdly narrow a priori basis upon which all such generalisations are founded. Who can read Emerson's "English Traits" without blushing at the disparity between Emerson's Englishman and the average Englishman of reality. Many good parodies of Taine's English notes have been penned, but none more exquisitely comic than some of his bonâ-fide observations upon subjects so little remote from his regular sphere of understanding as Oxford and Cambridge. Smollett's coarse abuse of the French in his Notes on France and Italy is perhaps not more extravagant than the eulogy of Taine, yet it provokes Frenchmen of to-day to convulsive laughter. The notes accumulated by Buckle for his drastic and comprehensive generalisations upon the Dutch, French, Scotch, and Spanish character are instructive from this point of view, and remind us of a clever French writer who reared a highly complex synthetic study of English characteristics from a placard exposed in the window of a small eating-house in the Tottenham Court Road, bearing the inscription: "As nice as mother makes it." The dangers and absurdities of jumping to conclusions about national character have led many thinkers into contradictory extravagances. Thus Jean Finot, in his able book on National Prejudice, came to the conclusion that national character was a thing so elusive and elastic as to become practically a nonentity. And he was almost justified by some of the attempts he made to elicit precisely what constituted the famous esprit français. To get it in its perfection, one man of letters wrote, you must apply to the English philosopher Hamilton, the Swiss Rousseau, the Italian De Maistre, the German Heine, the mulatto Dumas. The greatest French writers, such as Rabelais, Michelet, and Hugo, are singularly lacking in the sense of the mean, the nice taste and the lucidity which are supposed to be the infallible differentiating signs of it. Constant, Prevost, and Lamarck anticipated at many points Lyell and Darwin; it was the superior clearness and precision of the English writers which achieved for them the superior credit of discovery.

* "Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau in England." By Professor J. Churton Collins. Eveleigh Nash. 7s. 6d. net.

Such contradictions of received generalisations might be multiplied to any extent, and have led Hamerton erroneously, as it seems to us, to minimise the discrepancy between national types, and other more paradoxical speculators to turn the accepted symbols upside down. According to this theory, the typical Irishman is the cold, contemptuous, practical, impregnable Wellington, the typical Englishman is Lord Nelson. John Bull is the very image of your Welshman, while the perfervid Scot is an equal mixture of Figaro and Nick Frog. The results of all these attempts to depict national character are slender enough when the purpose in hand is not either compliment or abuse, but serious historic or ethnic study. But the form is an excellent one for an agreeable variety of literary exercises and diversions. In these Voltaire bears a highly distinguished part, and what he said of us, whether true or false, can be shown to have influenced the destinies and ideals of half Europe. What Montesquieu derived from England was mainly book knowledge and all that survives of the personal contact may be summed in one or two epigrams such as that "one should travel in Germany, sojourn in Italy, and think in England." Voltaire said more flatteringly that he half believed he was really meant to be an Englishman. Rousseau in England was a man dwelling not among facts and persons, but among dreams and illusions. He might just as well have sojourned in Kamschatka for all that he mastered of English usages or characteristics. Neither instruction nor amusement is derivable from the narration, but there are the elements of a painful story of mental derangement such as the author of "Dr. Austin's Guests" might have interpreted for us, and of these Professor Collins has made the most.

THE CONQUEST OF THE NORTH-WEST PASSAGE.*

Some of us had almost forgotten that the route for ships from the Atlantic to the Pacific by the north of America has been conquered for the first time by a brave Norwegian. On the monument in Waterloo Place is inscribed: "To Franklin and his brave companions who sacrificed their lives in completing the discovery of the North-West Passage. A.D. 1847-8." This inscription is inaccurate inasmuch as it gives an erroneous impression that the discovery of the North-West Passage was "completed" by Sir John Franklin and his gallant companions. Captain Amundsen was the first man to conduct an expedition successfully through Davis and Rae Straits along the north coast of Canada to Behring Strait. This book is a document of absorbing interest. Franklin and the Franklin expedition proved that a strip of open sea bathed the whole coast of North America, but neither Franklin nor his many skilled and hardy successors succeeded in tearing away the dark veil of mystery until Amundsen, in a herring boat launched thirty-two years ago, won the prize of victory. The desire to reach the Pacific Ocean by the North-West Passage has inflamed many noble minds. For nearly a hundred years, the British Parliament offered twenty thousand pounds for the discovery. The Royal Navy made many stirring and all but successful attempts to claim the money. From 1743 to 1818 the reward was unconditional, and in the latter year it was modified by a promise of £5,000 when 110°, 120°, or 130° West longitude should be passed. One of these payments was made to Sir E. Parry. Eight Englishmen were knighted for their efforts to navigate the North-West Passage, but Parry, Franklin, Ross, Back, Richardson, McClure, Nares, and McClintock successively failed where a young Norwegian skipper with six men in a herring boat has succeeded. Captain Amundsen does not tell us these things in his book, but they are true. He credits Franklin with signal capacity, but admits that the hopes of success confidently looked for from the expedition of the "Erebus" and the "Terror" were not realised. Amundsen attributes to Admiral Sir R. Collinson and to Dr. John Rae especial credit for the most important steps towards the final achievement of the North-West Passage. Sir Richard Collinson appears to him to have been "one of the most capable and enterprising sailors that the world has ever produced." It was Collinson and not Franklin who found the North-West Passage both practical and navigable for vessels of the size of the "Gjoa"—Amundsen's boat—but not for ordinary navigation. Dr. John Rae's work is admitted by the author to have been of "incalculable value to the 'Gjoa' expedition," while Admiral Sir Leopold McClintock predicted that if the North-West Passage were ever accomplished it would be through the channel discovered by Rae. Captain Amundsen writes of his predecessors and competitors with taste and modesty, and thus wins the sympathy of his readers.

The conquest of the North-West Passage was victory by the higher discipline. The crew of the "Gjoa" was a republic. Strict laws and red tape were banned. The work was done under a system of freedom. Every one was independent in his own sphere.

> "This," says Amundsen of the greatest of naval and military problems, "creates among sensible people a voluntary spirit of discipline of far greater value than enforced rules. Every one thus obtained the consciousness that he is a man who is depended upon as a thinking being and not as a wound-up machine. The zeal for work is doubled and so is the work itself. I can recommend to all the system adopted on board the 'Gjoa.' My comrades also seemed to value it, and the voyage of the 'Gjoa' was far more like a holiday trip of comrades than the prelude to a serious struggle lasting for years."

We have no space to describe the nature of that "serious struggle."

To accomplish that which brave men of all nations have vainly tried to do for centuries is, in itself, a distinction sufficient to place Amundsen in the ranks of Immortals from Drake to Nansen. To discover and determine by prolonged observation the magnetic North Pole is also a splendid service to science and humanity, but the most impressive feature in Amundsen's story is the unconscious self-revelation of victory over natural inclinations and the wisdom and gentleness that characterised his dealings no less with his companions than with the Esquimaux. The most interesting part of the book is contained in the chapters describing the inhabitants of the North-American coast-line and islands. When uncontaminated with civilisation they seem to be a simple and trustworthy, though an extraordinarily filthy, people. Amundsen won their confidence, learned enough of their language to obtain some knowledge of their ideas, and is able to carry us several thousand years back into the stone age, where manners and customs are determined by other considerations than those of fashion or taste. The Esquimaux mother performs the toilet of her baby as a cat treats a kitten, by licking it all over. They lick everything they wish to clean—these Esquimaux—even the teacups, when picking up the rudiments of civilisation.

The psychological moment arrived when Amundsen was off watch and had turned in below. He had been asleep some time when he became conscious of a rushing to and fro on deck and felt annoyed that his people should go on like that for the matter of a bear or a seal. Then Lieutenant Hansen came rushing down into the cabin and called out the ever memorable words:—

> "'Vessel in sight, Sir.'"

Amundsen says:—

> "He bolted again immediately, and I was alone.
> "The North-West Passage had been accomplished—my dream from childhood. This very moment it was fulfilled. I had a peculiar sensation in my throat; I was somewhat overworked and tired, and I suppose that it was weakness on my part, but I could feel tears coming to my eyes. 'Vessel in sight!' The words were magical. My home and those dear to me there at once appeared to me as if stretching out their hands—Vessel in sight!"

The vessel in sight is an American whaler, commanded by the senior Captain of the whaling fleet. She hails from San Francisco. The "Gjoa's" crew receives a present of potatoes and onions which became the centre of joy, dashed, however, by the report of war having broken out between Norway and Sweden. How Amundsen struggled through three Polar winters, how he and his fellows killed seals and bears, built snow huts, and conquered the forces of the inscrutable North, will be found in this book. Amundsen is a great commander, and reveals a personality of singular charm. The book is well illustrated and well printed, and ranks with the best books of travel.

LONDON IN THE 'FORTIES.*

When Mr. David Masson wrote his life of Milton, that great monument to a great man which we count among the glories of Victorian literature, it was frequently charged against it that the book was too long. Mr. James Russell Lowell, in particular, complained bitterly of the prodigious canvas that the author had used with which to present the poet of Puritanism. Be that as it may, Mr. Masson made up by an even undue restraint in the years that followed. There was no superfluity of words in his charming little book on Chatterton, nothing redundant in his "Life of De Quincey," or, indeed, in his finely edited set of De Quincey's writings; and now that he is dead one regrets that the first book published under his name is all too short. Of late years we have had many lengthy biographies and autobiographies of distinguished men who have been our contemporaries. Most of these books have been prodigious. Some of them made tedious reading. Six months after their publication they have frequently become mere waste paper. But there is not a dull page in "Memories of London in the 'Forties," as edited from her father's papers by Miss Flora Masson. One suspects a little, from casual notes, that the daughter has used the pruning knife too much. What remains is, however, delightful. There is a picture of Carlyle as we like to think of him. It shows him to us in his home with his wife by his side—the learned, sardonic man, the witty, sarcastic woman. Mr. Masson discovered in the lady a certain physical resemblance to Voltaire, and not a little of his nature. One learns from Masson, as from so many other quarters, that the two were really a devoted couple, in spite of the quips and cranks that misled Mr. Froude so entirely, and tempted a genius lacking in humor and discernment to a picture that for a time did real damage to Carlyle's memory. Here, also, we have by far the best portrait we have seen of John Carlyle, the admiring elder brother, who survives for us in his admirable translation of Dante's "Inferno."

From the chapter on the eating-houses of London one learns that Mr. Masson, who spent a large part of his life in and about Fleet Street in the 'forties, was only twice in The Cheshire Cheese. He does not tell us whether the tradition about Dr. Johnson's association with that hostelry had then been invented. Cyrus Redding's "Recollections," which first gave currency to the idea, were not published until the 'fifties. With so great a multitude of taverns around Fleet Street, there was no special reason why Johnson should have entered The Cheshire Cheese, and certainly there is no contemporary statement that he did so. Mr. Masson recalls a note in Peter Cunningham's "Handbook of London" concerning another restaurant. "For a chop or steak and a mealy potato," says Cunningham, "there is no place like Joe's in Finch Lane, Cornhill, but the beer is bad." He wonders whether the blame outweighed the praise in the eyes of the proprietor. But he himself does an injustice to another tavern. He records his frequent visits to the Cock when it was on the right-hand side of Fleet Street, stepping westward, at the time when Tennyson had written about its "plump head waiter" and praised its port. He suggests that it is extinct to-day; that the Cock has crowed his last. This is far from being the case. Most of the old furniture was removed to the opposite side of Fleet Street, and the Cock, whether the same bird or another we do not know, still shines resplendent in brass over the doorway. Budding barristers and busy journalists still partake of their noonday meals on the quaint, old benches upon which Tennyson and Masson may have sat; and, indeed, we have seen in these very rooms men who were to become Cabinet Ministers and judges while the rest of us still languish in the byways of journalism.

Many amusing stories are scattered through this volume, of which the following may be taken as an example:—

> "Two boys of strict Free Church parentage and upbringing in a Scottish town were comparing iniquities. One boasted that he had furtively been at a circus-show. 'Ah, but I have done worse than that,' said the other, 'for I have been once in the pit at the theatre and twice in the Established Kirk.'"

Mr. Masson gives us interesting glimpses of the London that he saw from Down Street, Piccadilly, where he lodged during those years. Perhaps, however, the best chapter in his book is that devoted to Mazzini, to whose single-minded enthusiasm of humanity he does full justice. The account, indeed, of the struggle of Italy for freedom throughout the life of Mazzini is most succinctly described, and Mazzini's share in that effort quite brilliantly stated. One wonders in reading this that the author could have been charged with treating another great fighter for liberty, John Milton, with too great a redundancy of words. Masson did not apparently know, however, of the great quarrel between Mazzini and Giovanni Ruffini, the novelist, whose work, "Dr. Antonio," is still read with interest. Yet there was such a quarrel, for which Ruffini was entirely to blame.

The final chapter of this pleasant book is devoted to London clubs, to some account of "Our Club" and of "The Garrick," of meetings with Thackeray, with Dickens, with Douglas Jerrold, and many another distinguished man who flourished in the 'forties. It was in Clubland that he met Mr. T. K. Hervey, who asked him to contribute to "The Athenæum" with the remark: "When I send you a book, say exactly what you think of it; and if you don't like it, if you think it bad, say so—even if it should be my own brother's." That "even if" recalls to us that Rogers once observed to a friend, "Why, you and Mr. —— live like two brothers." He replied, "God forbid!" In any case the most exacting critic would find it hard to withhold almost unqualified praise from "Memories of London in the 'Forties," although the notes are redundant and there is no index.

A STUDY OF SIN.*

Madame Viebig has, it is said, the reputation in Germany of being one of the most sober and accomplished of women novelists. For her novel, "The Sleeping Host," a study of an emigrant German peasant family in Poland, she has won, we are told, a position little inferior to that held by Thomas Hardy among us. It is a pity that Mr. Raahange has not prefixed to his translation a short critical account of Madame Viebig's writings, as our English public, not to speak of our reviewers, not infrequently judge a foreign work of art on too low a plane, æsthetic and spiritual. "Absolution" is not a novel for babes or sucklings, and, indeed, we do not commend its pages, some of which are terrible in their force, to any but cultivated and mature minds. But the best class of readers will be grateful for this sombre study of a woman's temptation and yielding to commit a nigh unforgivable crime.

Of the two attitudes to sin which may yield good fruit, the first is the healthy attitude of giving it a wide berth, and the second, which is very rare, is of understanding it. The superiority of the latter is that while humanising us by bringing us nearer to the sinner, it lays bare for us the whole chain of circumstances and causes which have generated the crime. And the man who has fathomed the dark workings of a criminal impulse is the last man likely to feel any attraction in the crime. In this respect, "Absolution," which is a boldly realistic, pure work of art, is extremely moral in its fidelity to life. We see Mrs. Tiralla's sin less as something monstrous and abnormal, than something of which even the finest among us carry the dormant seeds, and we realise that the sudden impulse and the violent fruit of a crime are of merely sensational interest in comparison with the slow sapping and undermining of principle all along the invading route of the waning and waxing temptation. In Mrs. Tiralla's case, her intense desire that her unattractive husband, whom she hates, shall die, and her abortive efforts to remove him by poison, spring from her mother's sin, who has sold her as a pious young girl of sixteen, "sold her like one sells a young calf," to the coarse, elderly, rich farmer, Mr. Tiralla. Her mother's sin has been generated by poverty, and the crime against nature which Mrs. Tiralla's marriage entails, is punished by fifteen years of suffering, during which the girl's acute wretchedness slowly crystallises into intense hate. The authoress has contrived, with admirable skill, to indicate how Mrs. Tiralla's feverish hunger for the happiness of love denied her, her ecstatic power of ardent religious fervour, her nervous intensity and refinement, all work together, with her misery, to deaden and annihilate her moral perceptions. It is a most remarkable feat of the creative imagination this placing us so intimately in relation with Mrs. Tiralla's despair, hatred, fervour, and devotion, that while we shudder at her mental processes, we can identify ourselves readily, and must, perforce, sympathise with her moods. Although the majority of English readers may dismiss the subject hastily as too painful or "repulsive," "Absolution" is one of those rare books which deepen and fortify the sense of our common humanity. Given this woman's temperament, her cold pride, her glowing ardours, her capacity for hatred, her spiritual exaltation, her mismating with her coarse, dense, stupid husband is bound logically to result in tragedy. How could this tragic web of sin and suffering have been averted? This is the moral problem to be considered, one that perpetually arises when the rigid framework of social law clashes with the inexorable laws of nature. The authoress is clearly of opinion that her Catholic faith, so far from hindering Mrs. Tiralla in her crime, is used by her as a sort of sleeping partner in her sin. The study of religious ecstasy in the dreamy girl, Röschen, Mrs. Tiralla's daughter, gives a meaning depth of tone to the picture, suggesting that in a neurotic family stock only a hair's breadth may divide the good impulse from the bad, and that the pressure of circumstance to which conduct reacts determines whether the saint in us shall give place to the sinner.

Turning from the moral problems raised by the novel from which both divines and doctors may learn a great deal, the psychological intensity of the book is masterly. Mr. Tiralla, this coarse, good-natured, stupid husband, who is infatuated over his Sophia, and knowing, subconsciously, of her desire to poison him, is yet hypnotised by his passion into giving the poison into her hands, is drawn with an extraordinary sureness of touch. The scenes between the uneasy and suspicious man, who fears to probe his own thoughts, and the coaxing, terrible woman, who changes from hour to hour, desperate, ingratiating, remorseful, gay, now "longing for innocence and purity, for a blameless, peaceful life," have the force of nature. The persistence of the woman's fixed idea of living a good and innocent life, after the happiness has come to her for which she is scheming, is the corner-stone of her crime. Once this is firmly laid, stone by stone does the edifice of her guilty impulses rise till there is no possible solution for her but that Mr. Tiralla must die, somehow his death must be brought about. Sin breeds sin, and the village schoolmaster, little Böhnke, who comes nightly to drink with the farmer, becomes a pliant instrument in Mrs. Tiralla's hands; then the handsome young Martin Becker, who comes to stay at the farm, in his turn is filled with pity for "the poor, dear woman," whom he yearns "to carry away from all this foulness," and at last Mrs. Tiralla drinks of the love for the sake of which she has descended into hell, and dragged her family after her. But still Mr. Tiralla refuses to die. By the irony of life it is his wife who saves him from suicide.

The title of the novel "Absolution" must, we think, be meant to bring home to us that the only absolution for our sins lies in our sufferings. And if the reader sets to work to picture the mental agony that Mrs. Tiralla lives in night and day, he, too, will echo the closing sentence: "Ego te absolvo a peccatis tuis." It is from her suffering that her sin springs, and it is through it that she is absolved, when her husband lies dead by his own hand, and her lover has fled away. The justice of man would be superfluous here, and nothing could strike deeper than the divine mercy.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"The Shakespeare Apocrypha," edited by Mr. C. F. Tucker Brooke (Clarendon Press, 5s. net), is a real boon to students of Elizabethan drama. It contains the fourteen plays which can, "without entire absurdity," be included in the "doubtfully Shakespearian class." These plays vary greatly in literary merit, "Arden of Feversham" being, as Mr. Swinburne said, a tragic masterpiece, while "The Two Noble Kinsmen" and "Locrine" contain passages of rare poetical beauty. Others, such as "Mucedorus" and "Fair Em," are specimens of Elizabethan drama at its worst, though Mr. Brooke tells us that both of them were bound together into a volume for the library of Charles II., with the label, "Shakespeare. Vol. I." Mr. Brooke seems to us somewhat hasty in ascribing "The Two Noble Kinsmen" to Massinger and Fletcher. So ripe a Shakespearian scholar as Professor Dowden upholds the Shakespearian authorship of some portions, and this view finds strong support from the metrical tests. In some respects one of the most interesting plays in the collection is "Sir Thomas More," which was discovered in a mutilated manuscript in the British Museum as late as 1844, and first printed by Dyce for the Shakespeare Society. The play is of value, apart from its artistic merit, for the glimpses it gives of Elizabethan domestic life, particularly in the scene where More is pictured in the midst of his family circle. Of the way in which Mr. Brooke has edited the plays there can be nothing but praise. His introduction is both fresh and scholarly, his text wisely conservative—all variants, not purely orthographic, in accessible sixteenth and seventeenth century editions and later emendations of value being registered in the footnotes. His explanatory notes have the great merit of brevity, and he adds a fine bibliography of works bearing upon the subject. We may note that Mr. Charles Crawford's articles on "Arden of Feversham," "Locrine," and "Selimus," referred in the bibliography to various periodicals, were issued in volume form by the Shakespeare Head Press in 1906. Both in plan and execution this edition of "The Shakespeare Apocrypha" is a contribution to English literature of sterling value, for which Mr. Brooke is entitled to the warmest thanks of students.

The autobiography of a man who, retiring from the Navy with the rank of captain after twenty-one years' service, entered Oxford as a married undergraduate, took two first classes, was elected Professor of Modern History, and remained for many years a unique figure in the academic and ecclesiastical life of Oxford, could hardly fail to be an interesting record. But, interesting as is the "Autobiography of Montagu Burrows, Captain R.N." (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net), the title raises hopes that are not fulfilled. Most of the book is taken up with an account of Burrows' life in the Navy, which, though readable and full of incident, is far less attractive than are the two concluding chapters which tell of "the Commander's" career at Oxford. Like other writers on the subject, Burrows describes the Navy in early Victorian times as "vicious and debased." There was much drinking, discipline was poor, and an officer who took his profession seriously found himself one of a small minority. Before Burrows retired from the service a change had set in, and most of his strictures would be unnecessary to-day. The happiest part of Burrows' life began when he entered Oxford. Though already of middle age, he took a first class in classics and in history, and settled down as a coach. He might now have seemed to have reached the summit of his academic ambitions, but in 1862, when the Chichele Professorship of Modern History was instituted, Burrows was appointed to the chair, although Froude, Freeman, and Stubbs were candidates. Bishop Wilberforce seems to have been responsible for this piece of flagrant jobbery. As a sturdy High Churchman averse from "ritualistic nonsense," and a violent Tory throwing himself heart and soul into University and general politics, Burrows filled his post to the entire satisfaction of those who engineered his appointment. Whether his tenure of the Professorship advanced the study of history at Oxford may be doubted. He was, however, a picturesque and breezy figure, honest, uncompromising, and kindly, and if he was not an ideal don he certainly was a popular one. "He was," says his son, who edits the autobiography, "accorded a University funeral, perhaps unique in the fact that the sword of a naval officer reposed on the coffin of a Professor, and that the flags at Portsmouth were dipped for a Fellow of All Souls."

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and of the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

possible exception of Pierre de Coulevain, who is read more in England and America than in France, have an established reputation in their own country. As a guide to their works, Miss Stephens' book is likely to serve a useful purpose. Her criticism is mainly "sign-post" criticism, but this is in accordance with her plan, and now and then we come on phrases showing that Miss Stephens has a real appreciation of the author under discussion. The best essay in the book is that on Anatole France, though we cannot agree with the verdict that "Histoire Comique" is "the only one of his works we could have done without." Félice Nanteuil is a fine creation, so is Trublet, and the whole book in its grim tragedy is undeniably a powerful criticism of life. With the view taken of Bourget—an estimate of that writer more generally held in France than in England—we are in perfect agreement. Bourget's later work is full justification for the phrase Miss Stephens applies to him, "the apostle of arrested development." Maurice Barrès, though in ideas almost as reactionary as Bourget, is a far more finished artist and his wonderful style places him side by side with Anatole France. Miss Stephens shows some want of power to appreciate an antagonistic point of view in discussing Pierre Loti. That writer's dislike of England and America is temperamental. In all his writings Loti is the egoist concerned only with his own sensations and impressions. His Anglophobia is an essential part of his temperament, and to be irritated by it is to lose the balance that a critic ought to preserve. Miss Stephens' book is a clear and, on the whole, judicious treatment of her theme. The English reader who requires a guide to contemporary French fiction can find nothing better.

"Judging by what Baxter on many occasions says, his great ambition from the outset was to reproduce mechanically, but artistically and economically, the painter's art." In this sentence from "George Baxter, Colour Printer: His Life and Work," by Mr. C. T. Courtney Lewis (Sampson Low, 6s. net) we have the indication of what really gives George Baxter his high place in color printing—namely, his success in "picture printing." He was, indeed, the pioneer of the cheap artistic reproduction, which was only less cheap than the German chromo-lithograph and infinitely more artistic; and this alone gives interest to his work at the present time, when we are immersed in the cult of the three-color and other processes. As to Baxter's patent, it is not at all clear, even after reading Mr. Lewis's interesting book, what it consisted of, or why exactly it was granted; for, though he was no conscious plagiarist, he seems to have employed very much the same methods as his predecessor, Savage, tried to practise, and Thomas Bewick preached; with this difference—that he not only brought the eye of an artist to his work, but also a genius for invention that enabled him to thrust aside the practical stumbling-blocks to achievement that had lain in others' way. It is his combination of the qualities of the painter and the practical scientist that gives his art its charm. Mr. Lewis writes eloquently and enthusiastically on the many phases of that art, and his Catalogue of Prints should be invaluable to the collector, whether he regards Baxter's output from the point of view of the artist, the historian, or the topographer. The catalogue is divided into chapters, and each chapter refers to the work either of a well-defined period—such as the Missionary Society period—or a particular class of subject. This arrangement has obvious advantages over the straight-away chronological one, and renders the volume a really useful manual of reference.

There is evidently a demand for English translations of French historical biographies, if we may judge from the number of such books that make their appearance. One of the latest is M. Louis Batiffol's "Marie de Médicis and the Court of France in the XVIIth Century," translated by Miss Mary King, and edited by Mr. H. W. C. Davis (Chatto & Windus, 7s. 6d. net). The book, says M. Batiffol, "aims at presenting the picture of a French queen surrounded by her Court, between the years 1600 and 1617, when Marie de Médicis was queen and queen-regent." With this end in view, M. Batiffol has brought together from historical documents and other sources such a mass of detail bearing even on the most trivial matters, that we are able to follow the Queen's progress from day to day almost from hour to hour. Indeed, were it not for M. Batiffol's marvellous power of arrangement and presentation, so much detail would be wearisome. As it is, the book is as entertaining as it is learned. Marie de Médicis herself is hardly an attractive figure. She had no sense of humor and she was cursed by a sulky temper, and both contributed in no small degree to her estrangement from her husband. Henry IV. had neither of these faults. It would be hard to write a dull book about that easy-going, mercurial monarch. We naturally see a good deal of him in M. Batiffol's pages, and we see something, too, of Marguerite of Valois, Henry's divorced wife—all three seem to have been on excellent terms—of Henriette d'Entraignes, one of his many mistresses, and of Léonora Galigaï, who through her ascendency over Marie de Médicis was for a time the most powerful person in France. Miss King's translation is remarkably good, and the book is produced in the excellent style which Messrs. Chatto & Windus have now taught us to expect.

Mr. A. MacCallum Scott has written a pleasant and, in some respects, a remarkable account of his journey "Through Finland to St. Petersburg" (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d. net). While we are not sure that the much abused "average British reader" thinks of the country "as a snowy waste where the few fur-clad inhabitants contrive to prolong their existence on whale-blubber," it is quite true that a good many erroneous impressions exist as to the rigor of its climate and the character of its people. Mr. Scott's book sets one right on these points and—half guide-book, half literary essay, as it is—gives information on topics that have not hitherto received the notice bestowed on Finland as a political entity or as a sportsman's paradise. The system of inland navigation that prevails in this Land of a Thousand Lakes, the natural features of the country, the varying characteristics of Abo, Helsingfors, Viborg, and other towns through which the writer passed, and the recent renaissance in Finnish art and literature, are all touched upon in this comparatively short volume. Finnish architecture, in its relation to that of the Orient, provides material for a most interesting study. The expression of a national genius that is even less European than is the Russian, it displays itself in domes, spires, and cupolas that seem to belong rather to Asiatics than to the people of a far north country. For this reason it has been denounced as an affectation, the riot of an unbridled imagination; whereas the truth is that it can be fully explained by the Turanian ancestry of the Finns themselves. They are as much aliens in Europe as the Moors in Spain, or the Tartars in Russia. Of the piecing together of the Kalevala, the great lost epic of Finland, and of the whole movement in Finnish folk literature which began with Porthan in the eighteenth century, Mr. Scott has much to say that is eloquent and instructive. The book, with its solid facts for travellers, its excellent and alluring photographs and its sympathetic style, contains no blemishes of importance.

The reader in search of a good travel book could hardly do better than take up "A Woman's Way Through Unknown Labrador," by Mrs. Leonidas Hubbard, Jun. (Murray, 10s. 6d. net). The country described is bleak and desolate in the extreme, inhabited by a few Indians and Eskimos who with difficulty manage to exist in that dreary climate. An attempt to explore the district was made in 1903 by Mrs. Hubbard's husband, accompanied by two guides. They mistook the Susan River for the Nascaupee, and, after meeting with many difficulties, had to retire. Provisions ran out, and Mr. Hubbard died from starvation when only twelve miles from safety. To prove that her husband's theory was right, Mrs. Hubbard, with three companions, set out on another expedition in June, 1905, and brought it to a successful conclusion the following August, having traversed 576 miles of unexplored country. The book is made up of the narratives of both expeditions, and is an interesting record of a spirited resolution to overcome great difficulties. From a geographical point of view the expedition was of some value, since Mrs. Hubbard surveyed and mapped the courses of the Nascaupee and George Rivers, discovered that Seal Lake and Lake Michikamau are in the same drainage

A Novel-Reader's Guide.—"The Black Bag." By Louis Joseph Vance (Grant Richards, 6s.). An excellent tale of mystery and adventure, which, unlike many books of the type, shows undeniable literary power.—"Chateau Royal." By J. H. Yoxall (Smith, Elder, 6s.). A vivacious romance in which a motor-car plays a considerable part. The author has a sense of humor, and shows skill in managing his plot.—"The Meeting of the Ways." By J. D. Baxter (Greening, 6s.). An historical novel of Roman Britain in the fourth century, touching on the wars with the Picts and the conflict between Christianity and Paganism.—"The Tavistocks." By E. Aceituna Griffin (Werner Laurie, 6s.). The theme is the perils attending wives temporarily separated from their husbands and the vices of smart society. The book is commonplace in plot, but shows some power towards the end.—"The Magic of May." By Iota (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.). A novel of character and analysis, feminist in tone, but not so markedly so as the author's earlier work.—"The Honor of X." By Graham Hope (Smith, Elder, 6s.). A melodramatic tale of a Russian prince who joins the Inner Circle of Nihilists with the object of betraying their secrets. The book shows a strong bias against the Russian revolutionists.—"The Shadow of a Vendetta." By Archibald C. Gunter (Ward, Lock, 6s.). This is a sequel to "Mr. Barnes of New York," written in the same style of semi-picaresque adventure. It will please those who care for novels of the type.

At the end of last week the American railway market was badly shaken by the news that the Erie was not yet through its difficulties, the decline in earnings having been so severe that it is unable to pay its fixed charges. In view, however, of reviving trade and good crop prospects, Wall Street is not disposed to regard the trouble as more than temporary, and after the beginning of the week the tone began to improve. Speculation, however, has been checked, and political uneasiness in Berlin and Paris has been another factor of depression. In London the new issues have been large enough to absorb a good deal of the money which would otherwise have supported a rise. Cheap money is still the main source of strength, and may yet prevail over unfavorable tendencies, especially if American investors are satisfied with the results of the Republican Convention; and probably they will be, as there seems to have been a general desire among business men for the nomination of Mr. Taft. The Berlin Bank Rate has been reduced to 4 per cent., but Paris is still accumulating gold—apparently for Russia.

Trade and the Crops.

The American harvest has now begun, but the last crop report of the Washington bureau is less satisfactory than its predecessors. However, apart from some unexpected disaster, the wheat crop of the United States should be good, and that of Canada exceptionally good. Indeed, the Canadian reports are so optimistic that there has been quite a strong rally in Canadian Pacifics; and even Grand Trunk stocks are recovering a little. It is almost certain that the wheat crops in Russia, Roumania, and Hungary will be far better than last year, while in Germany and France the weather has been favorable. Owing to last year's deficiency, stocks of grain are abnormally low, but the decline in the price of wheat during the last few weeks shows that merchants expect a gradual return to normal values. This must lead eventually to a recovery of trade, as the poor will be able to buy more of other things when their food becomes cheaper. As a Mark Lane authority put it: "I expect to see wheat go back to a thirty-shilling basis." Some people think that the American crops will be large enough to cause considerable pressure on the money market, but I doubt this very much. When general business is depressed and speculation dull, there is sure to be plenty of money to finance the crops. The English and Scotch harvests promise fairly well, and the hay crop is proving a very heavy one. So the farmers ought to have another good year, though it is to be hoped that they will not get such high prices for their corn as they secured last year.

Amalgamated Copper.

I fancy that, of all the classes of speculators who lost fortunes last year, speculators in copper and copper shares must have come off worst. And undoubtedly the violence of the break in price was due to the roguery of those who control and manipulate the copper mines of the United States. People who had the bad luck to buy Amalgamated Copper shares at 95 or thereabouts last July, on the faith of President Rodgers' statement that there was no reason to expect lower prices for copper, and three months later saw the metal selling at 12⅛ cents a pound, and Amalgamated quoted at 41¾, "will find little consolation"—I quote the City Editor of the New York "Evening Post"—"in the abbreviated and contradictory annual report." Recent changes in the Amalgamated board have led to the inference, in some quarters, that the management of the company has been turned over to the younger generation. The "Evening Post" observes that if it is the desire of the new management to have the securities of the company considered seriously by investors, no better way could be found than to issue quarterly and annual reports that will make a repetition of the 1901 and 1907 stock jobbery impossible. If, in addition, the "new blood" were to infuse a broad and intelligent policy in regard to prices, and were to manage their trade with a view to the copper market rather than the Stock Exchange, a genuine reform would have been achieved. The way in which copper was emptied out into Europe after the panic was remarkable. As soon as the price of copper collapsed, Europe began to buy, and exports from the United States increased rapidly from 9,036 tons in May to 37,685 tons in December. From the low mark of 11,729 tons in May of 1907, the visible supply of copper in Europe increased until it reached 26,643 tons on April 30th last, the largest figure reported since April, 1902.

Germany's Commercial Status.

Dr. Paul Arndt, a young German economist, who used to be Secretary to the Berlin Chamber of Commerce, has just published a brief but illuminating sketch of Germany's economic position in the world. It is called "Deutschlands Stellung in der Weltwirtschaft." Some of his conclusions are worth summarising: Nearly half of Germany's imports consist of raw materials, and food supplies make up a quarter of the remainder, while two-thirds of her exports are manufactured goods. Her chief dealings, both in buying and selling, are with the United States, England, Russia, Austria, and Holland. Germany has the largest railway system in Europe—56,477 kilometres—though Russia is not far behind with 54,974 kilometres. Both look insignificant beside the 351,000 kilometres of the United States, which is some 50,000 kilometres greater than the whole European total. England stands easily at the head of the world's shipping, with a proportion of 48·4 per cent., and Germany is a poor second with 10·6 per cent. But in 1898 the German share was only 7·9 per cent., and in 1875 only 5·2 per cent. The Hamburg-Amerika and Norddeutsche Lloyd hold the second and third places among the great international shipping companies with 605,954 and 546,056 tons gross register.

Since 1890, despite the movement of Germans to the United States and Argentina, the population has grown rapidly. In fact, "German territory has become too small for the German people. It is impossible for the existing population to win sufficient products from German soil for its support; it must be helped by other lands. Germany from her own resources cannot, even in the scantiest fashion, feed, clothe, and house her 61,000,000 children." No wonder that Dr. Arndt is a Free Trader.

THE WORKS OF ANATOLE FRANCE IN ENGLISH

IT has long been a reproach to England that only one volume by ANATOLE FRANCE has been adequately rendered into English; yet outside this country he shares the distinction with TOLSTOI of being the greatest and most daring student of humanity now living.

THERE have been many difficulties to encounter in completing arrangements for a uniform edition, though perhaps the chief barrier to publication here has been the fact that his writings are not for babes—but for men and the mothers of men. Indeed, some of his Eastern romances are written with biblical candour. "I have sought truth strenuously," he tells us, "I have met her boldly. I have never turned from her even when she wore an unexpected aspect." Still, it is believed that the day has come for giving English versions of all his imaginative works, and of his monumental study JOAN OF ARC, which is undoubtedly the most discussed book in the world of letters to-day.

MR. JOHN LANE has pleasure in announcing that he will commence publication of the works of M. ANATOLE FRANCE in English, which will be under the general editorship of Mr. FREDERIC CHAPMAN, with the following volumes—

1. THE RED LILY.	A Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS	(June 16)
2. MOTHER OF PEARL.	A Translation by the EDITOR	(June)
3. THE GARDEN OF EPICURUS.	A Translation by ALFRED ALLINSON	(June)
4. THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE BONNARD.	A Translation by LAFCADIO HEARN	(July)

DURING the autumn and next year will appear the remaining volumes, including JOAN OF ARC. All the books will be published at six shillings each with the exception of JOAN OF ARC. The format of the volumes leaves little to be desired. The size is demy 8vo (9 by 5¾ in.), and they will be printed from Caslon type upon a paper light of weight but strong in texture, with a cover design in crimson and gold, a gilt top, end-papers from designs by Aubrey Beardsley and initials by Henry Ospovat. In short, these are volumes for the bibliophile as well as the lover of fiction, and form perhaps the cheapest library edition of copyright novels ever published, for the price is only that of an ordinary novel.

THE translation of these books has been entrusted to such competent French Scholars as Mr. ALFRED ALLINSON, Hon. MAURICE BARING, Mr. FREDERIC CHAPMAN, Mr. ROBERT B. DOUGLAS, Mr. A. W. EVANS, Mrs. FARLEY, Mrs. JOHN LANE, Mrs. NEWMARCH, Mr. C. E. ROCHE, Miss WINIFRED STEPHENS, and Miss M. P. WILLCOCKS.

AS Anatole Thibault, dit Anatole France, is to most English readers merely a name, it will be well to state that he was born in 1844 in the picturesque and inspiring surroundings of an old bookshop on the Quai Voltaire, Paris, kept by his father, Monsieur Thibault, an authority on 18th Century history from whom the boy caught the passion for the principles of the Revolution, while from his mother he was learning to love the ascetic ideals chronicled in the Lives of the Saints. He was schooled with the lovers of old books, missals, and manuscripts; he matriculated on the Quais with the old Jewish dealers of curios and objets d'art; he graduated in the great university of life and experience. It will be recognised that all his work is permeated by his youthful impressions; he is, in fact, a virtuoso at large.

HE has written about thirty volumes of fiction. His first novel was JOCASTA and THE FAMISHED CAT (1879). THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE BONNARD appeared in 1881, and had the distinction of being crowned by the French Academy, into which he was received in 1896.

HIS work is illuminated with style, scholarship, and psychology; but its outstanding features are the lambent wit, the gay mockery, the genial irony with which he touches every subject he treats. But the wit is never malicious, the mockery never derisive, the irony never barbed. Often he shows how divine humanity triumphs over mere asceticism, and with entire reverence; indeed, he might be described as an ascetic overflowing with humanity, just as he has been termed "a pagan, but a pagan constantly haunted by the pre-occupation of Christ." He is in turn—like his own Choulette in THE RED LILY—saintly and Rabelaisian, yet without incongruity. At all times he is the unrelenting foe of superstition and hypocrisy. Of himself he once modestly said: "You will find in my writings a perfect sincerity (lying demands a talent I do not possess), much indulgence, and some natural affection for the beautiful and good."

THE mere extent of an author's popularity is perhaps a poor argument. Yet it is significant that two books by this author are in their hundred and tenth thousand, several are well into their seventieth thousand, whilst the one which a Frenchman recently described as "Monsieur France's most arid book" is in its fifty-eighth thousand.

INASMUCH as M. France's only contribution to an English periodical appeared in "The Yellow Book," Vol. V., April, 1895, together with the first important English appreciation of his work from the pen of the Hon. Maurice Baring, it is peculiarly appropriate that the English editions of his works should be issued from the Bodley Head.

Diary of the Week.

We observe with much regret the statements in the "Daily News" and the "Daily Chronicle" that invitations to the King's Garden Party at Windsor were deliberately withheld from certain Liberal and Labor Members of Parliament on account of their votes in the House of Commons on the Royal visit to the Tsar. If such an exception was made, we are sure that the King was not responsible for it, for it is contrary to his character, and to the spirit in which these gatherings were instituted. It is, of course, true that his Majesty invites, or abstains from inviting, whom he pleases. But we imagine that the idea of the fêtes was to establish an informal and pleasant relationship between the King and representatives of various parties and classes in the State, without any reference to opinion. This is clear from the inclusion of many members of the Labor Party in Parliament, as well as from the King's unstudied friendliness in greeting all kinds of guests. If, however, it is suggested that a Member's vote in the House of Commons, on a question of constitutional government, can affect the personal relations between the Sovereign and himself, the list of invitations will need sweeping revision. The suggestion is the more surprising, inasmuch as the King's personal action has never once been under review, either in Parliament or out of it, during the controversy on the Reval visit. That visit was a matter of State policy. Those who approved it praised not the King, but Sir Edward Grey; those who disapproved censured the Foreign Minister, and him alone. There can be no party of "King's Friends" to-day, because the King does not attempt to govern, and because his Ministers act for him.

The Shah has effected his coup d'état. Early on Tuesday morning Cossacks with guns stormed the Parliament House, and wrecked it and the great mosque of Teheran. Other buildings, including the palace of the Zill-es-Sultan, the Shah's uncle, were wrecked, and looting and killing were general. Some deputies were slain in the fighting, and many Nationalist leaders captured, two of whom have already been hanged. Others have taken refuge in the British Legation, the approaches to which are now covered by royal sharpshooters. The Shah has triumphed in Teheran, but the provinces—there has been fighting in Tabriz already—have still to speak, so that the struggle is certainly not at an end. The British and Russian envoys have intimated that they will not support the overthrow of the dynasty or the Magliss. It would appear that they have certainly taken no steps against the Shah, whose fighting general is a Russian officer, and who seems to have been able to get—and hardly from a native source—money to raise and pay troops. The Shah's attack on the Magliss was preceded by declarations on either side. On Sunday the Shah published his terms—the banishment of the Nationalist leaders, the closing of the clubs, the censorship of the Press, and the raising of a Palace Guard of 10,000 men. The Parliament replied the next day with an ultimatum requiring submission to the Constitution within twenty-four hours; but the Shah struck on Tuesday before the Nationalists could rally their forces.

The Birthday List of Honors, like all such lists, is necessarily commonplace. The Government has created four peers, eleven baronets, and twenty-five knights. The one peerage of distinction is that of Sir Antony MacDonnell. It seems a pity that so brilliant a mind and so remarkable a personal force should be lost to the House of Commons. The other peerages—those conferred on Mr. Whiteley, Mr. Philipps, and Sir Angus Holden—are tributes to great wealth and party services. The Privy Councillorships are all in the nature of recognitions of eminence or unusual talent in the public cause. They properly include Sir Thomas Whittaker. The outstanding feature of the baronetcies and knighthoods is the special favor shown to conspicuous figures in the Free Churches. Thus the baronets include Mr. Perks and Mr. Herbert Roberts, a son-in-law of the late Mr. Caine; the knights, Mr. Percy Bunting, the accomplished editor of the "Contemporary Review," and Mr. Richard Stapley, all in their way men of note and leading. The two figures which most clearly stand out on the ground of service are Sir Lauder Brunton, perhaps the doyen of contemporary physicians, and a man of large public interests, who is made a baronet, and Dr. Murray, the famous editor of the "New English Dictionary," who becomes a knight. The political consolations seem to have been judiciously administered.

Two considerable changes have been made in the Committee stage of the Old Age Pensions Bill. The "fixed income limit" has been replaced by a sliding scale, the details of which are not yet disclosed, but will be set out in a schedule to the Bill. As the House will have very little time to discuss this schedule, we trust it will be more carefully considered than some other points of detail have been. Mr. Lloyd George has not yet tabled his new schedule, but he has hinted that it would correspond nearly with a scale put forward by Mr. Goulding, the effect of which is to level up incomes above 8s. a week to 13s. The effect of this is to make all saving within these limits of income entirely useless to the individual. We would urge once again the more gradual scale, which would at every point yield a reason for thrift. For example, if incomes of 8s. to 9s. 11d. inclusive are levelled up to 13s., those of 10s. to 11s. 11d. could be raised to 14s., and so forth. This gives the man with 9s. a motive for reaching 10s. Any other method will, we are certain, be found to work out badly for the friendly societies.

Another large concession was made on Wednesday when Mr. Lloyd George withdrew the differentiation made in the case of married couples. Unfortunately, this concession was accompanied with a kind of bargain, or suggested bargain, that it should be taken as a quid pro quo for the exclusion of paupers. This is a much more serious matter. As the Bill will stand with the sliding scale adumbrated by Mr. Lloyd George, a man and wife with an independent income of 10s. a week each would be eligible for pensions of 3s. a week each. That is to say, an old couple with a combined income of £52 a year would receive a total pension of upwards of £15. Meanwhile, the widow of an agricultural laborer left destitute, say, at sixty or sixty-five, and driven on to the rates at seventy, will get nothing at all. The exclusion will undoubtedly press very hardly on the class which the pension scheme was primarily intended to benefit. The inclusion of outdoor paupers in the pension scheme, with refunding of the relief money by the guardians, would cost, according to Mr. Lloyd George, another million. This is within the estimate which we put forward last week. It is clear that the extra cost will have to be faced next year, and it will save much bitterness and misunderstanding if the Government make up their minds to it in advance.

Pudsey has been temporarily lost to Liberalism, Mr. Oddy, the Protectionist candidate, being returned by a majority of 113 over Mr. Ogden. The election, however, cannot be called a defeat for Free Trade or for the Government's social policy, which was equally supported by Mr. Ogden, the Liberal, and Mr. Benson, the Socialist. These two candidates together polled 6,735 votes, against 5,331 for the Protectionist. The seat was undoubtedly lost by the intervention of the Labor man, which, incidentally, ensured the election of an opponent of the Eight Hours' Bill for Miners. Mr. Benson's candidature was disapproved by the heads of his party, who, however, failed to secure his withdrawal. The General Election will, we hope, see a renewal of the Liberal-Labor understanding of 1906, but these interventions make bad blood, and weaken the prestige of the Government with the Lords. We note that Mr. Benson naïvely suggested that he would have been returned but for the non-residential vote, an anomaly which only a Liberal Government will remove.

The Pan-Anglican Congress came to a brilliant and impressive close on Wednesday, with a Thanksgiving Service in St. Paul's, opening with a procession of 250 Archbishops and Bishops, headed by the Cross, and wearing their rich Coronation robes. The service, which was not less simple in ritual than the opening ceremony in Westminster Abbey, ended with the Te Deum, and with the blessing of the great congregation by the Primate. Its main object was the presentation of a thanksgiving fund from the Anglican dioceses, amounting to £333,208. The result compares somewhat unfavorably with the Wesleyan fund of a million, and it is singular that the Diocese of London, which holds so large a proportion of the uncounted and uncountable wealth of the world, should only have contributed some £34,000. The results from nearly all the great urban dioceses were poor. We suspect that the flow of charity among the well-to-do is diminished by its association with amusement; also, a voluntary church has the habit and method of giving in greater degree than a semi-endowed body, which first looks to the State.

The really remarkable feature of the week's discussions has been the freedom and breadth of the debates on Socialism and Biblical criticism. On Socialism, Mr. Temple, the son of the late Archbishop, thought that Christianity would not be able to accept a competitive industrial system, while Mr. Selwyn said that much of "Hymns, Ancient and Modern" was "arrant nonsense," which workmen would not accept. Most of the speeches urged compromise with points of Socialist doctrine, and only one—that of Lord William Cecil—was absolutely hostile. On Biblical criticism the traditional views of Dr. Wace and Prebendary Webb-Peploe were opposed by almost the entire weight of scholarly and even episcopal opinion. The general tone of the Congress was also far more liberal than at the opening meetings.

The probability that the Lords will reject the Licensing Bill on the second reading is enhanced by Mr. Balfour's speech on Thursday at the Albert Hall. It was intransigent in tone, taking the familiar and contradictory ground that the Bill confiscates "property," and at the same time is hostile to "true temperance." Mr. Balfour's reason for this second argument is that the Bill deals only with on-licences, and takes no account of the trade in off-licences, and the unsupervised traffic in clubs. He declared that the scale of compensation was only one-fifteenth of that provided under his own Bill, which, he seemed to consider, reached the exact point when the reduction of licences promoted temperance without offending the moral sense. He spoke of licences as a property, ignoring his own statement on the Act of 1904 that they only involved "an equitable right to consideration." Mr. Balfour's only positive suggestion was that the public-house should be encouraged to expand on the lines of the Continental café or Bier-halle, a line of experiment to which the Bill will open the way.

The Kaiser has supplied a modified version of the semi-apocryphal Döberitz speech in a curious address at the dinner of the North German Yacht Club on Wednesday. He guaranteed the soundness of the scheme for the reform of German finance, hinting at a coming tax on "bachelors," at which so many highly civilised countries are aiming. He thanked the people of Hamburg for welcoming him with the "swelling strains of our old German war song" ("Deutschland, Deutschland, über alles"), interpreted it as meaning that the German people and he understood and sympathised with each other, and concluded that "peace with honor" would be maintained by the army and navy. The speech may be in the nature of a "storm-warning," but its immediate concern is probably with German, rather than with European, policy.

Mr. Grover Cleveland, twice President of the United States, died on Wednesday, at Princetown, New Jersey, in his seventy-second year. His career once brought him into sharp conflict with this country, but its main significance lay in its association with the revival of the Democratic Party and his ultimate failure to give that revival a national basis. Mr. Cleveland first came into power in 1884 as the conqueror of Mr. Blaine, one of the most brilliant, but not the most high-minded, of Republican politicians. The defeated party stood at its lowest in morale. Mr. Cleveland took a conservative view of the situation, declined to link his party with its more popular instincts and movements, and made no advance towards Free Trade. The result was that the control fell from his hands into those of Mr. Bryan, while the Republican Party, under Mr. Roosevelt, renewed touch with progress. An impulsive act in Mr. Cleveland's exterior policy had some profound consequences, hardly intended by him. His fiery message on the Venezuelan difficulty, for which Lord Salisbury's supineness gave some excuse, revived the Monroe doctrine in a form which seemed to question British sovereignty over Canada. The danger, thanks to a powerful peace movement in England, gave place to the Anglo-American entente, involving the cessation of naval rivalry between the two countries, and the final setting up of a limited rule of arbitration. The Monroe doctrine, however, remains in its application to Central and South America, while from the momentary peril of war with England arose the movement for a great American fleet. Mr. Cleveland was a man of strong and upright character, touched with waywardness.

M. Clemenceau managed on Thursday, by hard and brilliant riding, to force the Senate to debate his Bill for the State purchase of the Western Railway of France. The Senate, which is more anti-clerical than the Chamber, tends to the individualist view of questions of property. The critical vote occurred on that part of the resolution of the Railway Committee which postponed the Bill to the autumn sittings. This the Government opposed, and won by a majority of three, which may be reduced to one. M. Clemenceau took the general line which a Liberal-Radical Premier like Mr. Asquith adopts. That is to say, he repudiated collectivist doctrine, declaring that he was not an "étatiste," but insisted that the Republic must be progressive, or fall a prey to anti-social forces at home and enemies abroad.

On Friday the French Chamber discussed Moroccan affairs. The Government again secured a large majority, but one less by 150 votes than on previous occasions. The abstentions were by advanced Radicals, so that M. Clemenceau had to look for help to the Conservatives, upon whom he has repeatedly declared he will not rely for support. The terms of the motion and the tenor of the speeches were not less significant of the lack of Parliamentary approval of the policy of adventure, for both emphasised the necessity of non-intervention in the dynastic struggle. Mulai Hafid continues to absorb Morocco. Tetuan has gone over to him, and Tangier it is expected shortly to follow.

The second reading of the Eight Hours Bill for Miners was moved by Mr. Gladstone on Monday, the Government wisely permitting the adjournment of the debate. They also announced a large concession. As the Bill stands, it sets up an eight hours day from bank to bank, excluding one winding time. This change, however, is not to come into operation for eighteen months, during which time a nine hours' stage will prevail. Now the Government propose that for five years to come the working day shall consist of eight and a-half hours, the eight hours day, with the exclusion of one winding, then coming into force. This will seem to exclude the possibility of any appreciable rise in the price of coal, and should ensure the passage of the Bill, for it gives the coal owners ample time to adapt their industry to the change.

The Portuguese Cortes adjourned on Tuesday for a short recess after a series of stormy debates, which will be renewed when the Session is resumed. A Parliamentary Committee has been inquiring into the finances, and it has discovered some extremely ugly facts. The illegal advances made to King Carlos, which roused so much popular bitterness, were only part of a wholesale system of Treasury plundering. The Queen Mother, it is now proved, received illicit drafts to the amount of £200,000, although her legitimate annual allowance is only £12,000, and the "Seculo" says that other members of the Royal Family and their friends did the like, while loans were made to bureaucrats which they could not repay in a hundred years. What makes these revelations the occasion of Parliamentary disturbance is the fact that most of this plundering went on during previous tenures of office by the present Finance Minister, and with his approval. The Republicans and the Dissidents are pressing home these discoveries, and though they are ineffective in the Cortes, they are damaging the Monarchy in the country.

The Asiatic immigration problem has once more come up in Canada. The Lemieux agreement of last year is bankrupt. Under it Japan was to do her best to keep Japanese coolie immigration down to 600 a year. Already this year 3,500 are said to have entered, and the exclusion agitation in the West is being renewed. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has expressed his intention to denounce the commercial treaty unless the Lemieux agreement is observed, and the Japanese difficulty is likely soon to enter on a more serious stage. With Indian immigration Canada has dealt without ceremony. Not satisfied with setting the machinery of the Indian Government in operation, and with insisting on the unbroken passage, she has just directed that the Indian immigrant must have £40 in his possession.

The British Medical Association has decided to ignore the curious objections raised in certain newspapers to some nude male figures which adorn its new building in the Strand. There seems no moral or artistic objection to the posing or meaning of the figures, unless it be on ground which would equally apply to the David of Michael Angelo, or of Donatello. Sir Martin Conway, in a letter to the "Times," suggests, probably correctly, that the dislike of the nude in art proceeds largely from the instinct of a northern race, more accustomed to clothing than southerners. But it is fair to remember that Ruskin shared this dislike, and based it partly on the moral partly on the customary grounds of which Sir Martin reminds us.

Politics and Affairs.

WHAT VOTES FOR WOMEN SHOULD MEAN.

Our constitutional machinery affords no adequate means of testing the opinion of the electorate on any single question, and no means at all of testing the opinion of the unenfranchised. But, after the two great demonstrations of women—the procession representing professional women, and the great Hyde Park meeting the mass of women workers—we do not think that the existence of a widespread demand for the franchise among women can fairly be denied. Moreover, it is clear that the demand has strengthened greatly in the last two years, or that it is still growing. For our part we do not see how it can be said that the extension of the franchise to women on democratic lines is not fully in keeping with the general principles of Liberalism. Such an extension Mr. Asquith has gone far to accept. It is known that a large majority of Members of the present House of Commons are favorable to the principle of Women's Franchise, and when, under these circumstances, Mr. Asquith tells us that in their Reform Bill the Government will leave the question open to the decision of the House, provided always that democratic principles are safeguarded, it is as good as saying that he is prepared to accept the incorporation of a democratic form of women's suffrage in a Government Bill. The qualification is, of course, all-important. On one side a great part of the Women's Suffrage movement has been undemocratic, and even anti-democratic. It undoubtedly appeals to those who desire to see the property vote reinforced. This would in fact be the effect, though it may not be the intention, of Miss Pankhurst's proposal of votes for women on the same terms as men. The adoption of that proposal without any alteration in the basis of the male franchise would be a thoroughly undemocratic and reactionary measure. It would have no chance of acceptance at the hands of the present House of Commons, and the danger is that it may in the future be adopted in the interests of political reaction by a Conservative Government. As engineered by the Women's Social and Political Union, in fact, the suffrage movement is in danger of becoming a mere reinforcement of the power of the few. Seeing this danger, many Liberals have urged adult suffrage as an alternative. But adult suffrage, though so far as men are concerned it would introduce no important change of principle into our electoral system, would be a very large order for a beginning in the enfranchisement of women.

Fortunately, there is, as we pointed out long ago, a middle course. It is possible to enfranchise women on a basis which shall be broad and democratic without being absolutely universal. What is necessary for this purpose is to recognise that the simple logic of "the same terms as men" is, like most simple logic, quite delusive. The majority of adult women are wives who have every whit as good a title to a voice in public matters as their unmarried sisters, but who could rarely, except in the case of the wealthy classes, obtain a qualification on the present basis independently of their husbands. Supposing the "disqualification of coverture" removed, the man of property could obtain a vote on one of his houses and put his wife in as lessee of another. But the working-class couple who occupy a cottage and own no house property could, of course, enjoy no more than one vote. That vote would go to the husband as now, if, as usual, he pays the rent, and the wife would find herself disenfranchised. As a mother she has certainly not less "status in the country" than her unmarried sister. As a worker she has no less important a function to fulfil. If she does not earn the rent she saves it. Her management of the house is every whit as important a function socially, as valuable a function economically, as her husband's work in the factory or the mine. The occupation franchise is no longer effective, nor is it intended, as a property test: it is retained as a convenient basis for registration. Why should not husband and wife be recognised in electoral law as what they are in actual fact—the joint occupiers of the common house? Why should they not both be registered on one and the same qualification? The effect of this proposal would be to place women's franchise on the same basis as that of men, not in name, but in fact. Single women would be registered on their own qualifications, as men are, married women on the qualification on which their husbands now depend. Class relations and the influence of property would be unaffected. The enfranchisement of women would not be reserved for a small minority, but would be extended on wide democratic lines.

This reform, which has long since been advocated in The Nation, is explained in detail in an able pamphlet published by the Women's Co-operative Guild. The Guild is indubitably favorable to the suffrage, but unlike some notable suffrage organisations it practises the principles of democracy which it preaches. It is, in fact, a representative body. Its constituents are from 20,000 or 30,000 workers, women of the pick of the artisan class, the wives and daughters of the co-operators, who have built up that wonderful system of democratic enterprise which has done so much for the North of England. No one can suggest that the proposals of the Guild are put forward with the Machiavelian intention of wrecking the suffrage by making too big a demand. They are proposals put forward in the name of a serious and practical body of women, who have for years been concerning themselves with questions of women's wages and conditions, and who recognise clearly enough that those conditions are not likely to be improved by the enfranchisement of women of the middle class. They recognise, moreover, that in pleading with a democratic House of Commons, not a small but a large and democratic measure will most readily find acceptance. "The thin end of the wedge at present is not few women, but women of the class from which Liberalism and Labor draw their strength." They justly deride the narrow logic of the Social and Political Union. "At first sight it is an attractive proposal that women should vote on the same terms as men. It looks so like equal justice. However, the question is not whether it looks like justice, but whether it is justice in effect; and taking into account the fact that most women marry, it is no very great exaggeration to say that giving women the vote on the same terms as men is like admitting them to a choir on the same terms as men, by allowing them to sing tenor and bass parts."

The existing Suffrage Societies have done good pioneer work by insisting on the removal of the sex disqualification. This is the first point to be argued before the question could enter the arena of practical politics. But since Mr. Asquith's declaration the question has entered into practical politics, and the problem of ways and means at once becomes all important. There is no such thing as an abstract right to vote, whether for women or for men. The right of suffrage is based on, and conditioned by, the general good, and those who have the general progress of the community at heart are bound to look at every question of the franchise in all its aspects, and not in one alone. The great political question of our day is not the sex question, but the property question. It is the case of wealth versus Commonwealth that is being tried over and over again in the Press and on the platform, at the polling booths and on the floor of the House of Commons. Those of us who are for the Commonwealth are not going to walk with our eyes open into a plan for reinforcing the electoral army of wealth. We are anxious that women should take a direct part in the life of the community, and that their voice should be heard in affairs which interest them no less than men. But we are not prepared to pay the price of a shifting in the class balance of power. If in the name of democracy we are to give the franchise, let the franchise that we give be democratic.

THE SAVING OF SOUTH AFRICA.

It is a curious fact that when the British nation does a really splendid and striking thing, arising directly from the strength of its character and the truth of its political conceptions, it seems more or less ashamed of it. To most Continental observers, for example, the pacification and the approaching unification of South Africa seem to be in the nature of a miracle. They can hardly understand so quick a recuperative movement following on the waste and embitterment of the war. We on our side, proud of a war without glory, take little account of a peace full of honor. We fail to draw the full moral of this pregnant event, based, as it is, not only on essential principles of Liberalism, but also on a bold and right understanding of human character. The grant of free government to the Dutch States was, indeed, a plain act of good faith, a point of public credit. But it also involved a reversal of the spirit, and of most of the actual machinery, of Lord Milner's policy after the war. That policy was based on a definite and tenaciously pursued theory of ascendency for the British stock. It had three main instruments. The first was the suppression of the Dutch language. The second was the plantation, on a semi-Roman plan, of bodies of English or Australian colonists as a make-weight to the Dutch element. The third was the construction of a network of official machinery calculated to restrict the free working area of Colonial democracy, with its Dutch majority. All these purposes have been set aside. The equality, or the virtual equality, of the Dutch and English languages has been re-established. The free Colonial Governments have regained, or are regaining, control of their tariffs and railway services. The plantation policy, stripped of its perverse political coloring, has virtually disappeared.

What has been the result of the resolve of the Campbell-Bannerman Government to trust the Dutch? A success so astonishing that even the Canadian example is overshadowed by it. Mr. Rhodes once told a British statesman that if the Australians ever cut the painter, the Dutch would certainly come to the rescue of the Empire. To-day, thanks to the Boers, South Africa stands on the threshold of unity under the British Crown, and an historic aim of British statesmanship is in sight of its goal. The prime mover, the most powerful individual agent, in that result was the Commander-in-Chief of the Boer forces during the war. It is safe to say that without General Botha's constant and loyal forwarding of the project, the unification of South African government would have been impossible. No Progressive Government could have attempted it with the hope of success. But General Botha has not stood alone. Mr. Merriman and Mr. Fischer have answered with equal zeal for the adherence of the Cape and of the Orange Colony. The Prime Minister of the Cape was one of Lord Milner's most resolute opponents; Mr. Fischer, the ex-Secretary of the Dutch State, was a few short years ago a political exile seeking repatriation, and seeking it for some time in vain. Against two of these Governments, resting in the main, but not entirely, on Dutch support, the only charge of the smallest significance has been that in the reduction of the impossible weight of officialism which Lord Milner's recklessness imposed upon the new Colonies, too little regard was paid to the English element in the services. The charge is in itself untrue and absurd. The process of reducing the number of appointments with which Lord Milner encumbered the Transvaal and the Orange Colony was a necessary process. In several cases the cost of more than one department was multiplied sixfold or sevenfold. For example, under the old rule in the Orange Free State, the policing of the country was done for £300,000. Even four years after the war it was costing £230,000 a-year. The imperative need for economy in a country laid waste by drought and cattle disease, as well as by a devastating war, was perfectly understood by Lord Selborne and Sir Hamilton Goold-Adams, and the Commissions which instituted it, and whose work General Botha has continued, sprang from the period of Crown Government. Under it the cost of the South African Constabulary was cut down by some hundreds of thousands of pounds, and hundreds of British officers and men were "sent adrift" before a Dutch Ministry in the sub-Continent was thought of. With what face, then, can Lord Milner come forward, and, breathing out the bitterness of his disappointment on men whom he never tried to understand, affirm that the plea of economy is a pretence? The licence of Lord Milner's tongue has its uses. It serves as an illuminating guide to the incurable defects of his mind and heart.

Meanwhile, the three Governments, in whose hands the solution of the problem mainly rests, have acted in the matter of the National Convention on Confederation or Unification, which is to meet in October next, with the fairness and circumspection which has marked their general policy and their treatment of the interests, so lately sundered by war, now committed to their charge. The delegations from the Cape Parliament include, not only strong Opposition partisans of the type of Dr. Jameson, Mr. Smartt, and Mr. Walton, but moderate Progressives and representatives of the mercantile community like Mr. Jagger, while in the Transvaal not only Sir George Farrar, but the less temperate and balanced Sir Percy Fitzpatrick, are to be represented. The resolutions in favor of delegation at Capetown and Pretoria appear to have been unanimously carried, and no suggestion of unfairness found expression on the Opposition benches. The critical problems of the Convention lie, of course, before it, and must be remitted to its constituents. But we may take it that, in putting himself at the head of the movement, General Botha has done the British Empire an historic service. Without unity the economic failure of the Cape can hardly be avoided. Nor could there be any guarantee that an isolated Transvaal, leaning heavily on the Delagoa Bay route, and cutting itself free from the long thin line of railway from Capetown, would or could have remained a unit of British South Africa. Lord Milner did nothing to avert the tendency to disunion; his railway policy rather accentuated it. The railway difficulty calls for unification; and the movement for economy in administration lends weight to the plea for a form of unified, central government, rather than for a mere combination of the existing machinery. Two other problems are vital. The first—that of the constituent basis—may be easily settled. Population is no doubt the fairest ground for a federal franchise. But the basis of voters was taken in the case of the Transvaal and the Orange Colony, and if manhood, or, possibly, adult suffrage, were adopted, the country party might accept it. The second crucial problem is that of native policy. Can Cape Colony find a basis of agreement with the three northerly States? Can they be persuaded to give due weight to her experience of the possibility of a fairly successful experiment in a limited colored and black vote, backed by an imperfect, if honest, system of native education? Will a united South Africa consent to leave Basutoland in the hands of the Imperial Power, and to deal fairly with Zululand? Is the black man, who is as four to one of his white brethren, to have no direct voice in the government of the sub-Continent, which he supplies with most of its manual labor? Is he to pay a steadily increasing burden of taxation, while he reaps an infinitesimal share of the services which it sustains? We wish we could think that on this matter England and white South Africa spoke the same voice.

DEVELOPMENT IN THE CHURCH.

The later work of the Pan-Anglican Congress has certainly given cause for encouragement to those who are working for Liberalism in thought and social reform in action, and were concerned at its earlier tone and method. To these, the possible influences of one of the largest religious communities amongst the English-speaking peoples cannot be a subject of indifference. We cannot waive aside the Established Church and its allied communions beyond the sea as irrelevant and negligible, and, though the Church does not even now lead the battle for social reform, it is no longer fair to describe it as a useless weapon or an instrument of opposition in the unending "warfare of humanity." This Church, as all Churches, must ever remain, on the whole, a Conservative factor in public affairs. New faiths are always explosive; old faiths are always sedative. Napoleon restored religion in France because, as he declared, without the hope of redress in another world for the inequalities of present fortune, it would be impossible to maintain any tranquility amongst the poorer members of society. All Churches with thought directed beyond visible horizons exercise this soothing influence towards quiet and content. In Established Churches this element has been reinforced powerfully by a deliberate acceptance of, and adherence to, the recognised social hierarchy. The affirmation of the Divine right of Kings of the sixteenth century persisted for two centuries later in the affirmation of the Divine sanction for the established Order. It is only within the last sixty years that a spirit has arisen within the "Church of England" which finds in social inequalities a subject for penitence rather than for praise. That spirit is undeniably exercising influence at the moment. It has, we are glad to see, been powerfully reflected in the deliberations of the recent Congress. The section committed to the study of social questions occupied the largest hall, drew the largest audiences, excited unusual interest and discussion. Day after day assemblies of many thousands of persons, drawn from all parts of the world, followed intently discussions on Capital and Labor, Sweating and Luxury, Socialism, Unemployment, Monopoly Control, Poverty and its cure. The speakers represented the advanced wing: the more advanced the sentiment, the greater the approval of the audience. Labor leaders and clergymen equally advocated Socialism as the Christian ethic interpreted in its economic aspects. Representatives of the North of England guaranteed the existence of a new movement, spreading far and wide amongst the artisans of the manufacturing cities, of which London—that city of frivolity and random bewildered action—had no real apprehension. This Socialism, which has gripped hold of the younger men, and comes with the conviction and energy of a new religion, has come to stay. The priests and laymen of some poorer parishes, filled with generous revolt against the oppressions tolerated there, are openly proclaiming themselves it allies. They adopt its phraseology concerning the futility of the struggle between the two great political parties, its demand for legislative action upon social affairs. They are not afraid of the denial that men can be made moral by Act of Parliament, and insist upon the attention of the whole Sovereign people being diverted to an actual warfare against the diseases of poverty and starved human life. And the audience—international in character—endorsed this appeal, with Australians announcing—perhaps too complacently—that they had solved the problems still perplexing "this old Europe" by legislation for diffusing the materials of human comfort, and Americans complaining of the failure of the dream of economic freedom and universal happiness in their own land, and all recognising the serious concern of the Church in an international Social Discontent, which it is impossible for intelligent observers either to appease or to forget.

And if the tone was thus actual and even hopeful in the world of action, the signs on the whole were encouraging in the world of thought. Liberal ideas have not indeed advanced beyond a certain level; and many critical affirmations, commonplaces to all exact scholarship, still excite something like a shock in these large and miscellaneous gatherings. But on the other hand, a general attack on the critical method was everywhere severely discountenanced. A few years ago any oration could draw approving cheers from such multitudes by cheap sneers and denunciations of those "higher critics" who had disproved the Flood, or dissected the Pentateuch, or divided Daniel into fragments. To-day, such attempts, when essayed, evoked no corresponding approval. The audiences were revealed as representing a community, cautious, reserved, anxious as to the ultimate results of criticism of the Bible, clinging desperately and often defiantly to faiths and affirmations which have long been regarded as sacred. But it is a community also which has moved, and moved remarkably, both in the acceptance of results held to be heretical a generation ago, and also in toleration for the method by which such results have been obtained. This transition has been undoubtedly assisted by a change in the general character of the Church. As the High Church movement, gradually developing into a mixture of Broad and High, has prevailed over the old Evangelicalism, so the necessity for affirming the accuracy of Biblical inspiration has become less manifest. The idea of a Society has taken the place of an Authenticated Document. Rome has thrown itself back upon a doctrine of exact Biblical inspiration, unknown to the early theologians of the Christian Church. The Anglican Church appears to find possibilities of advance in the opposite direction. One hundred years ago it represented a religious body consisting of a section of the upper classes, allotted to the function of religious observance; protestant in character, individualistic in temper, limited in sympathy, an inveterate foe of the new movements of social aspiration. To-day it appears more in the likeness of a Society, catholic in temper, asserting its sacerdotal claims, but also turning its energies to social problems, and even tending in some quarters to find allies amongst the new Socialist and Labor upheavals. This change is heavily modified by the old conservative attachments, and in the end may not go very far. But there is certainly a section of the clergy which is more liberal than its laymen, and some Bishops who are more liberal than many clergy. The Church seems inclined to fight tenaciously for its own privileges, for the maintenance of its own schools, for the right to assert its own system of moral condemnations, for its clean-cut separation from other Christian communities, larger in numbers, and none the less excellent in good works. Its tone and temper are alike more generous and more arrogant, harder and yet more compassionate, more liberal and more intolerant, than the tone and temper of a past generation. If Liberals think that the extravagance of its exclusive demands are sometimes exasperating, and its pretentions to a particular and special privilege and enlightenment cannot stand, we can recognise also its increasing acceptance of Reason as a necessary ingredient in all vital affirmation of doctrine as a guarantee of wisdom, and its increasing occupation with the condition of the poor as some justification of power.

THE PLIGHT OF THE PERSIAN REVOLUTION.

That revolution is fortunate which contrives to time its real moment of trial, when popular opinion is fresh and hopeful. Two years ago the Persians were enthusiastic in the cause of their democratic reforms. They won their Parliament by a species of general strike; the priestly caste was on their side, and even the women in the harems gave their jewels to avert the sale of their country to the foreigner. It is hard to say how much of this enthusiasm remains. The Parliament has been engaged in an incessant struggle with the young Shah. Five times he has sworn fidelity to the Constitution, and five times at least he has broken his oath. Preoccupied with these intrigues, Parliament has done comparatively little for the regeneration of the country. The Treasury is still empty, the officials still unpaid, the army useless against a foreign enemy. Foreign complications darken the horizon. The Turks are still encamped on Persian territory along the Western frontier. From the North the Russians have conducted at least one punitive expedition, which burned a town and slaughtered peaceful villagers. More recently a Russian gunboat has been taking soundings at Enzeli, the Caspian port of Persia. Meanwhile, within the Parliament itself, the inevitable cleavage of opinion has taken place. Islam has always sat lightly on the mystical and speculative temperament of the genuine Persians, and the steady growth of Babism, in spite of savage persecutions, proves how weak is its hold on a race of poets and metaphysicians. The priestly caste, as commonly happens in Mohammedan countries, led the democratic movement. But no sooner had the Parliament come together than a powerful Left Wing was formed, which began to talk about toleration and the secularisation of the State, very nearly succeeded in admitting non-Moslems to the franchise, and did succeed in divesting the priestly caste of some of its most profitable functions as the interpreter of the law of inheritance. Meanwhile the Court Party recovered from its panic, and when, in December last, Parliament proposed to establish a fixed Civil List, all the underworld of spies and lacqueys and bravos, which swarms about an Oriental Court, urged the Shah to make a counter-revolution. He tried and failed. The Parliament barricaded itself; the people armed for its defence, and the soldiery proved to be on the popular side. Six months have passed, and the Shah has this week renewed his attempt, with more success.

It would be mere guesswork to attempt at this distance, with the meagre news before us, to explain why the Shah is stronger in June than he was in December. Possibly the failure of the Parliament to achieve reforms has depressed the courage of public opinion. Probably the priesthood has realised that its interests must ultimately range it rather on the side of the Court than on that of the people. It is possible, also, that the Shah is leaning on Russian support. He received a money gift from Russia when he first entered Teheran to ascend the throne; that favor may have been repeated. If so, it would be possible to explain why the Persian Cossacks—a native force organised and commanded by Russian officers—has transferred its loyalty from the Parliament to the Shah. His tactics have been confident and bold. He fled the capital, joined his army outside it, made a speech in which he declared that he would hold by the sword the throne which his fathers had won by the sword, and then proceeded to demand the surrender of the popular leaders—a claim which he has backed with cannon. A civil war has begun, and it remains to be seen whether the secret societies, which have arms and numbers behind them, are really prepared to fight. The capture of Teheran would not necessarily settle everything. It is an isolated town, with no ancient associations. The real power of the popular movement is at Tabriz, among the sturdier and denser population of the North-West, which is Turkish by race and language. One does not readily picture the genuine Persians of the South, whom Professor Browne has described for us—the literati who talk mysticism in rose gardens while they are sober, and sheer atheism when they are drunk—making a formidable revolution. But the Turco-Persians, like all peoples of Tartar stock, are positive, worldly, and Philistine. Every traveller, from Morier onwards, has descanted on the physical cowardice of the Persians. But there are mysteries about the valor of Asiatics which no European historian has yet set himself to solve. It was currently said in the early eighties among Englishmen that the Egyptians are cowards; yet under Mehemet Ali they defeated Turkish armies and Wahabi fanatics, and would certainly have overthrown the Turkish Empire if Europe had not intervened. There are similar passages in Persian history, for even so recently as the last century Persian armies have overrun Afghanistan and held Herat. One may say of such races that they have not the habitual and reliable courage of Europeans; but it is clear that, under favorable conditions, with a great leader or a great cause, they do develop bravery. The disciples of Babism certainly showed high courage, both active and passive. Events will show whether a purely political cause can call forth among contemporary Persians the same devotion and the same physical gallantry as did that deeply interesting religious movement.

But it is probably no mere lack of physical courage which led the Persian Parliament to temporise and compromise during the months when it seemed to have the people on its side and the Shah at its mercy. It might have deposed him in December. To-day it is counting the heaps of corpses at its doors. The main reason for its hesitation was its dread of Russian intervention. We are afraid that the Anglo-Russian Convention has made the Tsar the arbiter of Persian destinies. The Parliament may have preferred to face the risk of domestic reaction, rather than incur the graver danger of a Russian occupation. It understood that any civil turmoil must jeopardise foreign interests, and that this would be used in St. Petersburg as a pretext for a Cossack invasion. In spite of all its caution, or rather perhaps because of its caution, the disaster it dreaded has come about. As yet there is no active intervention. But the Shah has been informed by Great Britain and Russia that he is held responsible by them for the maintenance of order. The Shah doubtless knows what is the meaning of "order" in the Russian official vocabulary. His troops have carried out a manœuvre in Teheran, which almost deserves to be called a pogrom. They have looted, and slaughtered, and burned. It was for such maintenance of order that the Tsar thanked his own soldiers, after the scarcely less efficient pogrom at Bialostock. If these Russian-trained troops continue to do honor to their instructors, Persia may yet escape invasion. If, however, the provincial reformers, and more especially the secret societies of Tabriz should continue the struggle, and attempt to realise that other sort of "order," which depends on freedom, we may doubt whether the Russian Foreign Office will be equally satisfied. It is almost superfluous to enquire what our own Foreign Office thinks of these proceedings. It has recognised Teheran, and all the living north of Persia, as part of the Russian sphere of influence. Mr. Lynch is not too pessimistic, in the two able letters which he has contributed to the "Morning Post," in dismissing Persia, as already a dependency surrendered to Russia. The total result of Sir Edward Grey's Asiatic policy has already been sufficiently depressing. The alarms and suspicions of Afghanistan have cost us a frontier war. A remarkably hopeful reform movement in Persia has been sacrificed in Russia's interests. The gravest consequences of all will doubtless develop, as Mr. Lynch predicts, in Turkey. The more closely Russia and Great Britain unite in a league from which Germany is ostentatiously excluded, the more inevitable becomes the Sultan's dependence on the Kaiser. The old policy of supporting struggling nationalities has been abandoned for a series of "deals" between expanding Empires.

Life and Letters.

JOHN MORLEY AS INTERPRETER.

It is some testimony to the judgment and the moderation of our educated classes, as well as to the merits of the writer, that a political thinker and worker so persistent and outspoken as John Morley in his attachment to opinions and policies which the large majority of his readers probably reject, should have secured during his lifetime so firm and unquestioned a place among our standard writers. It is worth while seeking to understand how this has come to pass. That qualities of literary treatment go far in securing such a place is obvious, and certain special gifts of Lord Morley commend him particularly to the favor of his countrymen and enable him to handle many matters of hot controversy without offence. Vigor, lucidity, easy restraint, a liberty of brief discursiveness, these are qualities which establish confidence, enabling us first to pardon, then to admire, the richer qualities of utterance which may accompany them. We live in an age of so much bad writing that merely to assert of any writer that he never pens a paragraph that is tame, copious, ornate, uncouth, is to claim for him a high diploma of distinction. But we place Lord Morley on a higher level of literary distinction by claiming that his readers soon come so closely to identify the thought of his discourse with the style as to dismiss from their mind all separate consideration of the latter. Though we owe much to his earlier contemporaries among the great writers who have concerned themselves with current criticisms of life, to such men as Carlyle and Ruskin, Arnold, Goldwin Smith, or Froude, is there any one of them who has not tried at times to storm our judgment instead of convincing it, or has not bewildered our mind by some perversity or extravagance? This Lord Morley has never done; he never leaves us in doubt about his meaning, motive, or method. We always understand "where we are with him." The chief reason why he is a standard writer is that he is a standard mind, and at a time when standard minds are rare. Such a man gives us a sense of safety; making no pretence to possess a system of philosophy, he brings us to recognise that it is the temper not the formulæ that makes the philosopher; and his sparing use of wide generalisations and of regulation labels enables him to teach politics far more effectively than by wielding more scientific instruments. We feel that we are dealing with "an entirely honest merchant" in the traffic of ideas.

The scope of that traffic is clearly marked. Lord Morley has made his wide range of various learning and his many interests contributory to one main task, the performance of which will mark his place in the history of thought, namely, the interpretation and the defence of modern Liberalism, particularly in the field of politics. To this he set himself in his masterly studies of Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, and the moulders of the revolutionary thought in France, in the age before Liberalism was linked with any clear belief in progress, and long before progress had received its rational justification in any doctrine of social evolution. With widely informed mind, rigorous but sympathetic judgment, he sought to assess the tendencies of thought and feeling flowing through the representative men and events who went to the formation of the liberal conception of Society and State. The method employed throughout his work has greatly contributed both to its fruitfulness and its popularity. Handling facts and forces which, in their primary import, were mostly loosening and even destructive, he has, partly by historic evidence, partly by interpretative faith, extracted and exposed to thoughtful minds their binding and constructive values.

This could only be achieved in one convincing way, by showing the operation of these liberal ideas and sentiments in the character and work of typical modern Liberals whose faith was embodied in their lives. Though he fortified the result of his studies of great liberal thinkers and statesmen in France and England by other studies of a less personal and a less political nature, his eye and his heart never wandered far from his central theme. Though we may not all accept his exact appraisal of Burke, or even of Cobden and of Gladstone we recognise the happy union of circumstances and of choice which has given us such a linkage of political interpretation. The labors of none of our other modern political thinkers have been more profitably employed, for no one moving in such controversial fields has concerned himself so little with mere polemics. This has been due, we apprehend, partly to the necessity, upon which we have dwelt, of exhibiting Liberalism through its positives and not its negatives, involving a selection of sympathetic subjects, but partly also to a loftiness of mind which disliked and even disdained polemics. For Lord Morley is a man of intellectual peace, though not at any price. Not at the price of truth in things that matter.

That no one can fight better when fight is needed, is illustrated by one study in the new volume of his "Miscellanies" (Macmillan), just published, in which he deals out justice without mercy to Mr. Lecky's shallow and inaccurate book upon Democracy. But this is exceptional. The thought and even the writing appear to us to rise in value, as a rule, with the exact degree of active sympathy between Lord Morley and his subject. Nowhere in his earlier work, not even in his Burke, do we find more luminous and elevated thought than in the appreciation of John Stuart Mill, his friend, written two years ago for the anniversary of his birth. But even where his sympathy is less complete, as in the Romanes Lecture upon Machiavelli, reprinted here, it is the effort to explain and intellectually to justify the man and his work, rather than to confute and disparage, that gives power and conviction. A writer must realise the dignity, even the magnitude, of his subject to handle it with such elevation. It is here that the thing called "manner" comes in. Lord Morley can, upon occasion, lift his readers to a higher plane of appreciation by a single opening sentence. "The greatest of the Florentines has likened worldly fame to the breath of the wind that blows now one way and now another way, and changes name as it changes quarter. From every quarter and all the points of the historical compass, veering gusts of public judgment have carried incessantly along from country to country, and from generation to generation, with countless mutations of aspect and of innuendo, the sinister renown of Machiavelli." Who can resist such an opening?

We move with Lord Morley always on mountain paths, breathing an invigorating air, never sinking into the jungles of mysticism, or dragged along dull, weary high roads of platitude; if caution, or economy of power, forbids him from leading us to follow him up the inaccessible peaks of some intellectual Andes or Himalayas, even of these we get many admirable glimpses—and save our lives to boot. For in the related fields of politics and morals many grave problems are opened which he does not pretend to solve, and not the least profitable essays in this volume are those which suggest and state the doubts and dangers that lie ahead in the path of democracy. Education, the franchise, and the formal wielding of power by the people, have not achieved as much as was expected for the peace and inner prosperity of nations: shadows seem to fall athwart the future of Liberalism. Indeed, we may well apply to Lord Morley the words which he himself applies to Mill, when he says that "one of the objects that he always had most at heart, in his capacity of publicist, was to set democracy upon its guard against itself." This guardianship is especially apparent in the long concluding essay of this volume, reviewing Mr. Hobhouse's powerful work "Democracy and Reaction." Two dangers, indeed, may be said especially to occupy his mind; one which he dwelt on in the essay on Machiavelli, the recrudescence of "reason of State" as the paramount principle of politics; the other, not unrelated to it, the paralysing influence of bureaucracy. It is, perhaps, this latter fear which weights his judgment, as it did Mill's, against some of those movements in democracy which seem to involve a fuller and more complex activity for the State than earlier Liberalism foresaw or desired. It is this visible reluctance which has sometimes led labelmongers to style Lord Morley an individualist. But this much abused term, never truly applicable to the philosophic Radicals whose lineal descendant he is sometimes held to be, is quite inapplicable to him. He is no theoretical precisian, like Herbert Spencer, in assigning the right functions of a State and the limits of individual liberty. If he hesitates, as he evidently does, to don the new livery which some social reformers of his party recommend, it is because he distrusts the company of large, loose social doctrines and of bureaucratic practices into which he fears he may be led.

These apprehensions seem to us excessive, and to involve in some degree a failure to take adequate account of certain truths which in their earlier bearings Lord Morley himself has most profitably exposed. Of the revolutionary ideas in eighteenth century France he wrote: "How came these ideas to rise up and fill the whole air? The answer is that, with all their contradiction, shallowness, and danger, such ideas fitted the crisis. They were seized by virtue of an instinct of national self-preservation. The evil elements in them worked themselves out in infinite mischief. The true elements in them saved France by firing men with social hope and patriotic faith."

Is it not possible that Liberalism from time to time must continue to feed her hope and faith with new revolutionary ideas if she is to do her saving work? May not the failure of formal political democracy hitherto to fulfil the bright expectations of internal stability, growing collective intelligence, and international goodwill, be due largely to the tardy accomplishment of that economic democracy which has within two generations forced its way as the most exigent of the practical problems confronting Liberalism? We do not believe, and Lord Morley assuredly does not, that the work of that Liberalism, whose history during two centuries he has written, is done, or that the new modern belief in social progress, which he dates from Montesquieu, has won its full contents. It is the very temper of tolerant receptivity which has been Lord Morley's greatest contribution to the interpretation of the Liberal process in the past that is needed now. For, though the formal doctrines of social evolution in the mouths of Socialists or scientific sociologists are alien from the spirit of his inquiries, his political teaching is touched by no note of finality. "Nobody," he writes, "with an eye in his head believes that the accommodation of old social institutions to a state of society in which the political centre of gravity has finally shifted, is a completed task, or that the gravest problems involved in that task are not left outstanding and inexorable." The liberty of Liberalism to grow and gather new contents he leaves intact.

THE POWER OF THE VOICE.

More swiftly, perhaps, than anything else, a nice address commends the stranger to us. There is a rare power of the voice. The lips open, and in a moment we are conscious of sympathy, self-confidence, authority, timidity, insolence, menace, servility, or entreaty. Does the voice fall pleasingly upon the ear? It is a more immediate passport than face, figure, or attire. Of the first and late Lord Acton it was said that in his deep tones there seemed to sound the accents of history. Gladstone, rising at a Guildhall banquet at which the King of Greece was the chief guest, rolled out the titles in his splendid burr—"Your Majesty, Your Royal Highnesses, my Lord Mayor, my lords, ladies, and gentlemen"—and the listener was held forthwith. Who that ever heard it could forget the caress of Joseph Jefferson's voice in Rip van Winkle: "Here's your goot healt', unt your family's!" Many years ago, in his chambers in Grafton Street, Henry Irving read to an audience of two, in his quietest, most simple manner, some scenes from the play of "Vanderdecken," which he was then studying. The writer, the sole survivor of the three, recalls, after thirty years, every moving accent of the reader.

But good speaking, which includes accurate pronunciation and truth of accent, does not depend upon the voice alone. A true ear has much to do with it. Is it not through the ear that we learn our mother tongue? We speak by imitating. What is the main reason of our difficulty in acquiring a foreign language? It is that the ear is so seldom taught the exact sounds which the voice must reproduce. The printed word, the symbol of the sound, is nothing to us if we have never heard it pronounced; and if, when it is pronounced, the ear receives it imperfectly, we cannot speak it as it should be spoken. Many, if not a majority of, teachers fall into the error of beginning with the pupil's mouth instead of with his ear. They implore him to produce sounds that he has never really heard. The study should begin with the elementary sounds of the language, sound by sound; and the first duty of the teacher should be to open the pupil's ear and get these sounds in. Pronunciation and accent are not, of course, the same thing. No language can dispense with pronunciation, but many languages dispense with accent. Pronunciation is merely the employment of certain voice-sounds in certain combinations; accent, most simply considered, is the means of rendering syllables conspicuous. In Arabia, Persia, and elsewhere, quantity, or the length of the syllable, is the principle. Pitch is used to distinguish the syllable in Sanskrit, and it is generally agreed that pitch rather than accent guided the Greeks and Romans. We have pitch in our own language, but it concerns acting and oratory more nearly than colloquial speech. With us, pitch in speaking is allied to oratorical emphasis; and emphasis is to a phrase or sentence what accent is to a word.

A felicitous and exact pronunciation, which is a touchstone of general culture, does not come by nature. Speaking, as those who saw and listened to the remarkable oratory of Miss Christabel Pankhurst in Hyde Park last Sunday will readily discern, is among the fine arts. Morell Mackenzie used very properly to insist that it is also a physical performance, requiring both "wind" and "muscle." You cannot, he said, talk in a drawing-room until you have learned how to do so; in other words, the commonest conversational exercise of the voice implies an effort, apart altogether from its specialised employment in the pulpit, on the platform, or the stage. Thomas Sheridan (Brinsley's father), of whom it was facetiously said that he traced every evil of the Commonwealth to the neglect of elocution, invented a system with which, in 1758, he crossed St. George's Channel, to revolutionise British education. He has at any rate had the satisfaction of seeing it plagiarised in sundry modern manuals. Sheridan would suffer no one to speak or read a sentence until he had taxed himself with the question: "How should I deliver this?" and the great scheme (which was by no means an idle one) embraced a peculiar set of marks to indicate the different pauses and emphases. He applied it to the Liturgy, and not a few clergy might at any time with profit apply it to themselves. One eminent divine and rhetorician would, however, have none of it. Archbishop Whateley, he it was, insists in the "Rhetoric" that no system has ever yet taught anyone a good delivery; that we must therefore eschew method, and trust wholly to nature. The Archbishop had probably been bored by spouters. Nevertheless, since we all learn to speak in some manner, there must be rules for so doing, and it is better to study rules wisely than to flout them. But let us beware of affectation. As, in learning to dance, it is not necessary (with Sir Toby's leave) to go to church in a galliard and come home in a coranto, so, in seeking a correct delivery, it is not praiseworthy to give tongue at afternoon tea, while it is fatal to do so in the smoking-room. Still, in avoiding mannerism and the pedantic, we may justly aim at propriety.

The right utterance is hard, the slovenly is all too easy; and in many thousands of English speakers slovenliness has become an ingrained habit. Such persons are born into a language too good for them. An American gentleman, Mr. Phyfe, confronts us with a list of 10,000 words "often mispronounced"; but even mispronunciation is less distressing than the style which is habitually careless and deliberately vulgar. This style is not confined to the uneducated, the quarter-educated, or the half-educated. More rankly almost than anywhere else it flourishes in society called polite. A learned German, as we understand, has recently declared that he will import, or would like to import, Americans into Germany as teachers of standard and classic English. They do not, he says, talk cockney, as the English do. The Herr Professor, in his visits to this country, must have been oftener in fashionable than in academic circles. For, to be plain, it is not the instructors of youth who talk cockney, it is the errand boy and the smart set. Now, in the errand boy and others, cockney is really a traditional and inherited form of speech. In certain classes it is fixed and ineradicable. Forty years of board schools have scarcely modified it. In the smart set, on the other hand, cockney is a vice, studiously acquired and sedulously cultivated. The German gentleman, perhaps, did not appreciate to the full the fearf'ly rippin' time he had in this set, whose highest conversation is "a rippin' sort of lingo—what?" The vocabulary of this class is as limited as (and far less natural than) that of a Kentish laborer, who has scarcely one-third of the number of words which the peasant in the West of Ireland turns to such mellifluous account.

So far as mere pronunciation is concerned, we have to note that usage is always more or less in a state of fluctuation. One generation will accent certain words in one way, and the succeeding generation will accent the same words in another way. So completely in three centuries has the pronunciation of our own language changed that, whereas the printed plays of Shakespeare are as easily read as ever, he himself, were he to play the ghost's part to the Hamlet of Mr. Forbes Robertson or Mr. Tree, would be utterly unintelligible.

The grammarian lays down for us laws of pronunciation, and those of the compiler of dictionaries are even more precise; but neither the one nor the other can say that the laws are absolute. Like grammar, speech is in some degree a convention. It is of our own making, and is always undergoing alteration. Every profession, moreover, every trade, every calling, has peculiarities of pronunciation for certain words, which are sometimes in flat opposition to the authority of the dictionary.

It may be objected that the solecisms which offended the strict ear of Germany are not of the least importance; that the language is able in the long run to take care of itself. But no language is able to take care of itself. It is wholly at the mercy of those who make and use it; and in proportion as it is well or ill employed does it increase or diminish in strength, efficiency, and beauty.

If, however, there is no immutable, Median rule, if rightness of utterance is only, like grammatical exactitude, the established and prescriptive usage of "a particular body of speakers at a particular time in their history" (the phrase is Professor Sayce's), what should be the closing word upon the subject? Possibly this, that the usage of the largest body of speakers, if sanction by the most intelligent authority of the time, is the nearest approach to accuracy which the generation has attained, and therefore—so far as that generation is concerned—the best. Such an approach to accuracy should be the preoccupation of us all.

The slangy or slipshod manner, when it is not merely vicious, as it is with the smart set, proceeds in the main from a carelessness that admits of easy cure. "Is it not," a young actress asked of her teacher, "frightfully difficult to say 'Ham and eggs'?" "I should think," was the answer, "it would be frightfully difficult to say anything else."

THE SINGLE-FLOWERED ROSE.

Those who find delight in the sight of great trailers of dog roses sprawling over a hedge, with the grey-brown stems of hazels and the dark twigs of the wayfaring tree for support, will have open hearts for the exquisite single roses which the last few years have brought into popularity. These lovely flowers clothe arbours with glowing gonfalons, fling glittering sprays over pergolas, and touch the crinkled bark of larch pillars with gold.

The lightsome blossoms have all the attributes of youth and grace. The austere majesty of the great pines, the sombre gloom of the yew alleys, are lit with shining flower lamps. They come, they live their brief hour, and they are gone. To compare them with the mighty varieties of the show tents would be to compare shooting stars with planets. They flash out before the last snowflake of hawthorn has fallen, and they pass while the odours of the hayfields are still young. The single roses are children of sunshine. See a thatch of Paul's "Carmine Pillar" on the roof of a summer-house with a background of Austrian pines in the heart of a June day's splendour. Colour seems to leap from the flowers, as trout flash from water. The petals glow with life. Or survey a column of the Penzance brier, "Anne of Geierstein." Flowers cluster in hot, burning masses up the pillar which supports the plant. Every little twig or side shoot is ablaze. And over the top of the pillar is a slender twirl of soft young growth carrying triumphantly aloft its beacon of fire. But over all the single roses lies a veil of grace, of elegance. They please as sweet peas please, or Shirley poppies.

One of the earliest of the single roses is altaica, a species from Central Asia, with flowers that are sometimes white and sometimes lemon tinted. It is often in bloom in May, and it is a cold garden that does not see it in flower by mid-June. It is a hardy, free-growing rose, that needs no pruning. A little later, and even more beautiful, is macrantha, the large, flesh-coloured flowers of which are adorned with a prominent brush of yellow anthers. It is excellent for a pillar. There is a variety of Rosa Sinica called "Anemone," which is full of beauty and charm, and only requires to be known to find its way into a thousand gardens. Its myriad flowers are brilliant, shining pink. Its leaves are dark green, smooth and shiny, and they generally hang on the tree throughout the winter. "Anemone" grows with a lusty and refreshing vigour, rapidly flinging a cloud of shoots around its supporting pillar. Rosa lucida is hardly less admired for its warm, red foliage than for its bright flowers. Growers of tea roses know well what pleasure they get from the ruddy tints of the young stems and leaves in spring, and will agree that the rose is not to be admired merely for its flowers.

In a box of garden roses at a show one is sometimes fortunate enough to see a cluster of exquisite white single roses with yellow anthers, under the unfamiliar name of "Himalayica." This gem of roseland is a variety of the old Rosa moschata. It grows strongly, and may be cultivated successfully on an arbour or arch. "Electra" can only be included amongst single roses by courtesy, as it is half-filled with petals, and would be more correctly described as a semi-double. But "Leuchstern," bright rose with white centre, and "Paradise Rambler," carmine with white centre, are both pure singles. The latter was exhibited at the Temple Flower Show in 1907, and won the hearts of many rose lovers. "The Lion" is a splendid single, with crimson flowers in clusters. These are new roses, and they are taking the place of the old singles such as the "Austrian Copper," which rare John Gerarde grew over 300 years ago.

The briers (Rosa rubiginosa) will be grown alike for the beauty of their flowers, the perfume of their foliage, and the cheerful autumn colour of their bright red hips. The common sweetbrier is perhaps the most richly perfumed of all, but it cannot vie with Lord Penzance's exquisite hybrids in beauty of flower, and these, be it remembered, have fragrant foliage, too. The rose lover is torn by conflicting preferences in the presence of these charming flowers, and ends by growing them all—"Amy Robsart" and "Anne of Geierstein," "Flora Mac Ivor" and "Julia Mannering," "Lady Penzance" and "Lucy Bertram," "Meg Merrilies" and "Rose Bradwardine." And as he plants, perhaps, on some chill and sunless November day, the stirring scenes of Scott's great dramas pass before his eyes.

Some beautiful single roses are late bloomers. There are, for instance, the varieties of the hairy Japanese rose, rugosa. There is Rosa Wichuriana, that glossy-leaved, strong-caned rambler, which will cover banks with a thicket of foliage and flowers. And there is a trio of Hibernian hybrids, "Irish Beauty," "Irish Glory," and "Irish Modesty," the first white, the second pale pink, the third coral red, which have large and beautiful flowers. These will carry on the torch which altaica and "Carmine Pillar" have lit.

Short Story.

A SAINT.

The days of saints are past. We never see them in these latter times. Our eyes are just as slow to mark them as were the eyes of those who slew and tortured them in days gone by, giving them thus the chance of immortality and of a place apart, in calendars.

I knew one though, that is, if stripes and prisons oft, the scorn of men, a life of poverty and a pure nature, with a soul afire at all injustice, constitute a saint. As many of the breed were born in most unlikely places and surroundings, so was the one I knew, for I feel certain that he was a saint in truth, in deed, and thought and life, although no church has canonised his name. The race has sprung before, in palaces, in hovels, farms, in armies, convents, and again in towns, in country districts, and perhaps in gaols. But Cadiz, "Improba Gades," the laughing, whitewashed, sea-bound, salt-ringed town, which rises from the waves and seems to float, just as a nautilus lies rocking in the trades, does not at first sight strike one as a cradle for a saint.

The little town of Hercules, built on its tongue of land jutting far out into the sea, and with the great black shoal, Las Puercas, standing sentinel just in the fairway of the port, with its long rows of dazzling houses chequered with bright green jalousies, its streets in which a crowd is never seen, in which the tramp of horses is not heard, sans trade, sans manufactures, peaceful, and seeming far removed from all the troubles of the world, does not seem fitting for the birth of one destined to struggle all his life.

Your perfect rebel, and there can be no saintliness without revolt in some shape or another against the myriad meannesses that dwarf mankind, makes his own struggle, if he but strives against himself. Easier far it would have been to have sunk into mere resignation (by that sin men have fallen deeper than even angels fell by pride), and to have found all fair, as did the Lord in Eden, till man appeared to break the spell. In the soft wind-swept, sea-lapped town, where stars come out like fireflies, pale, and sink back into the sky, and where day melts into the night as imperceptibly as if it were a tide, it is so easy to forget.

Dressed in his unsubstantial, southern children's clothes, made out of stuff like bed-ticking, he must have gone to school, to some poor starveling schoolmaster (the hunger of a schoolmaster is a stock jest in Spain), or some old snuffy priest. Still, in his youth he could not but have showed the promise of his life, just as musicians and great painters composed and painted as soon as they could speak, for saintliness is of the nature of an art.

Even in Cadiz, with its quiet ways, its streets so shady in the heat, so sunny in the cold, its grass-grown plazas and its air as of a woman, fair in youth and yet more beautiful in age, the ordinary injustices of life must have revolted him.

The over-laden ass, girth-galled and patient, treading its weary Calvary which leads it to no heaven except the rest from toil that death affords, must have stirred all his blood. Cats tortured and dogs stoned no doubt set all his childish nerves a-tingling and his sympathies on edge, as they do those of many children, but with the difference in his case that the indignation lasted all his life, and did not settle down into that careless acquiescence that makes cowards of us all.

Whether he stood and whispered at the grated window, when he grew older, to some girl half seen, or, standing on the pavement, formed with his lips dumb words to some fair Gaditana on a balcony, I do not know, but I imagine that his only love was his old mother, and that, although throughout his life he never knew the name of fear, with women he was timid and did not know the worth of his timidity in women's eyes.

Fortune had given him a little manufactory of playing cards, left by his father, which in a year or two of philanthropic management soon went to ruin, though I remember now and then, long years ago, to have remarked upon the ace of gold, in Cadiz packs, his name, and to have thought the cards were dingy and looked like blotting paper. This hindrance to his life having been thus removed, the way was clear for him to run his course. Never again did he own property or any money, but what was necessary for the subsistence of his mother and himself and that from day to day.

Thus being independent of the world, he naturally, after the fashion of his brother-saints, set out on his career to redress injustices, make things grown crooked, straight, and generally to court the martyrdom mankind is ever ready to inflict on all who do not put their necks beneath its yoke.

How he became an anarchist, that is to me unknown; but probably, after the fashion of his countrymen, more by experience of life than by long poring upon books.

In such a little town as Cadiz, where everything is known, nothing but vice is possible to hide, and that but by the complicity of others, who shield their fellow-sinners for the need they have of them, his views were known to all, and he became a sort of bugbear to the population, who, in the vegetarian dreamer, saw a dangerous revolutionist, and yet received a pleasurable qualm as he passed by, feeling a pride their city had produced so terrible a man. As he walked through the streets, dressed in his threadbare suit of shoddy Barcelona tweed, a soft grey hat upon his head, with his weak eyes shielded by neutral tinted spectacles, people stepped off the narrow pavement on to the cobble-stones and murmured, "there goes Antichrist." Strange rumours that he maintained a correspondence with the murderers of the Czar gained ground, and sounded terrible to those who had the vaguest of ideas what a Czar really was, and in what portion of the globe Russia was situated. The police began to dog his footsteps, and to endeavour to get proof against him of some mysterious crime. Was it not patent to mankind that one who lived on bread and milk, who never smoked, or went to bull-fights, and whom no soul in Cadiz had ever seen emerge from out the narrow lane that leads down from the Paseo de Apodaca to the house where dwells La Barquillera and her nymphs must be a man who cherished dark designs? No Christian ever would have taken to his house lost dogs or kittens, or stopped light-hearted boys from putting out cats' eyes, and pouring paraffin upon them and setting it ablaze. Such practices the church itself does not condemn, at least by precept, for it knows well that animals are not endowed with souls, and he who seeks to mitigate the torture of their lives is a mere heretic and well deserves the stake.

So, by degrees, the hero of my tale became unpopular with all right-thinking men, and though he shared his pittance with the poor, the very men he helped distrusted him, for charity, although it suffereth long, is never popular.

A famine broke out in the south, with lack of rain for months, so that the earth dried up and cracked, and in the cracks millions of field rats bred, that, issuing from their holes, devoured the remnant of the crops that locusts and the drought had spared, and the sun turned to fire. Month after month it blazed upon the fields, drying the springs and rivers, and parching up the trees. Water was dearer far than wine, and in the little laughing town a hush fell on the streets, whilst in the country hunger stalked abroad and struck men to the ground. Then came the movement of "La Mano Negra," and the authorities, anxious to pay in full all that they owed to one who, in and out of season, always opposed all governments, arrested him and shipped him off incontinently to the Peñon de la Goméra, with shackles on his feet.

For years he sweltered in the sun, wearing the blue and white striped drill in which the Spanish Government dresses its convicts, on the coast. The little money that his mother sent him he laid out to buy tobacco for the other convicts, who, used to what they called "the vice," were mad for want of it, and by degrees his fellow prisoners grew to know him as The Saint. The school he started, teaching the rudiments of education on an old slate, is not forgotten in the wretched little place, which stands up like a miniature Gibraltar, united to the shore by a mere tongue of land.

Somehow or other he escaped, and wandered up and down for months amongst the tribes upon the Riff. Though as a general rule the Moors give up all convicts, except those who, as the phrase goes, "throw away their hats" and join their faith, they seem to have been impressed with the inherent goodness of this prisoner in especial, and passed him on from one tribe to another until he reached Tangier. The Spaniards, in their human, careless way, did not repatriate him to complete his sentence, but let him live as best he could by writing, teaching, and the other little industries of the unlucky man of education compelled to toil for bread.

Something took place in Spain—perhaps the unnecessary birth of some unnecessary prince, the marriage of a princess, or the like event of national importance, and what is known as an "Indulto," that is, the letting out of prisoners (who should never have been sent to gaol) occurred, and once more he was free. His name was growing as a saint, that is, a man who had no vices and spent his life in doing good, but still was quite unfitted for the world he lived in by his outrageous love of truth.

Then came a half rebellion, and though the saint of Cadiz was not in the town, some speeches he had made, served as a pretext to arrest him, and, once arrested, he was doomed to be condemned. Again he found himself in prison, though with the feeling of half Spain upon his side, after his speech in his defence.

Years dragged along, and though from time to time accounts leaked out of all that he endured, he might have rotted and been buried in a ditch had not a general pardon once more taken place. Broken in health and prematurely aged, he wandered back to Cadiz, just as a wounded animal returns to die where it was born, and as instinctively.

Those who had shunned him all his life now stopped him in the street, and warmly wrung his hands. Prosperous citizens saluted him, and he became an object of respect, just as a conqueror is worshipped, after the victory is won.

As the sun rose he walked down to the beach, bathed and then basked a little in the sun, and wandering back again, ate with good appetite his bread and milk; and, sitting down to work, translated English scientific works for the Madrid or Barcelona Press at miserable pay.

Death took him quietly, coming as a friend, and in his only clothes, a worn and battered shoddy suit of tweed, his mother seated by his side, dressed in the livery of black that Spanish widows wear, her worn merino shawl setting her walnut-coloured face in a dark frame, he lay upon his bed.

All Cadiz blocked the street, and through the little white-washed, flat-roofed house a long procession filed. Ladies in mourning, and workmen in their ordinary clothes, passed through and gazed at him and his mother sitting silently.

Some kissed his hand, and others, patting his mother on the shoulder, essayed to comfort her, just as a horse nestles its nose against the shoulder of its fellow, when he sees it is in pain.

Outside the house the "Comrades" waited in the sun, smoking and talking and spitting in the dust, without the show of grief we in the north affect, but taking everything as natural which happens to a man.

Juan, Pedro, Gil, and Saturnino, taking off their hats, shouldered the bier, still smoking, and the procession took its way through the dark street of Columela, to the cemetery. Emerging on the alameda by the sea, where espinillo grows, that calls back Entre Rios, and the sandy crossings of the streams in Corrientes, it halted, and another band of "Comrades," brown, bullet-headed, and with their cigarettes either behind their ears or in their mouths, relieved the bearers, pushing their way through the thick crowd that swarmed on every side. Women in black, on every balcony, gazed silently, and as the body passed, signed themselves with the cross, making it first upon the breast, and then in miniature across the mouth. Again the bearers changed, and as they passed the cemetery gates, the civil guards, sitting like figures cut in walnut, on their high crested horses from Jeréz, saluted almost as if by instinct, their captain looking vacantly before him, so that discipline was saved.

Pushing its way through the dense mass of people, the bier arrived before the grave.

Around it stood a group of workmen, with here and there a person like a schoolmaster out of employment, dressed in black, faded clothes. When the grave had been filled, the sandy soil falling like hail on the cheap coffin lid, a man stood out, and plunged immediately into a maze of words about the virtues of the dead, the rich, the poor, the social revolution, and the glorious red flag. He ceased, amid some rather faltering applause, and a rough comrade took up his parable, his eloquence at times just touching folly, and his folly rising occasionally to eloquence. He finished, sweating and hoarse, muttering, " . . . he was a saint . . . Adios Firmin . . . long live the social revolution . . . long live anarchy."

The ground was beaten in upon the grave, on which the blows of mattock and of spade fell heavily, just as the blows of fortune had descended all his life on the man resting underneath. The crowd dispersed, and in an hour, once more the town had taken on again its air of emptiness, and in the streets the women walked swinging and balancing upon their hips, just as a square-rigged vessel sways and balances before a gentle, leading wind.

Letters from Abroad.

THE GERMAN WAR PERIL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The written constitution of the German Empire contains in its eighth article a paragraph saying that there shall be formed in the Federal Council of the Empire a Committee for foreign affairs, consisting of the representatives of the kingdoms of Bavaria, Saxony, and Würtemberg, and two representatives of other Federal States to be annually elected by the Federal Council, and that this Committee shall be presided over by the representative of Bavaria.

There is nothing said about the rights of the Committee, but if its creation was to have a sense at all it could only mean that the board was to exert a controlling influence on the direction of the foreign affairs of the Empire. Such an influence had been claimed in 1870 by Bavaria as a condition of her entrance into the proposed German Confederation, and the claim had been met by the insertion of the paragraph in question. But it was only a concession on paper. In fact, there is nothing of such a control, the Committee for foreign affairs is a mere shadow, it has never had a real existence. When, in December, 1874, the Bavarian Catholic leader, Joerg, in criticising in the Reichstag Bismarck's foreign policy, ventured to ask whether the Committee was going to be put to life or not, Bismarck made a most violent speech, which provoked quite a Parliamentary scene, and during the Chancellorship of the father of the Imperial Constitution nothing more was heard of the Federal Foreign Committee. It was again talked about in 1900 on the occasion of the Chinese trouble, this time with less dramatic effect, but with the same negative result. Prince Buelow, then in his first year as a Chancellor, made one of his obliging but non-committal speeches, and the matter rested where it was. The Imperial Foreign Office lets the Governments of the Federated States of the Empire have transcripts of the important reports and documents it receives, and of the circulars and notes it issues, but of a deliberating Federal Board on Foreign Affairs there was no more in 1900 and is no more in 1908 than there was in 1874.

Now, it is easily understood why four years after the foundation of the Empire people were not very eager to see the so successful Iron Chancellor controlled and possibly handicapped by a body of officials of doubtful proclivities. It is different to-day. On the one hand, Bavaria, Würtemberg, and one of the two States nominated for the Committee by the Federal Council, Baden, to wit, have democratised their Parliaments so that an influence of the democracy could be exercised on the representatives of these States in the Federal Board. On the other hand, the foreign policy of William II. and his present Chancellor is far from being particularly successful, and its ways are distasteful to a steadily-growing section of the nation. And since the Reichstag has never shown decision in discussing foreign affairs, their eyes turn again to the Parliaments of the States for such criticism and for the demand of some control over the whims and the vagaries of the manager of the foreign affairs of the Empire. His recent utterance—the famous Döberitz speech—has caused Bavarian Socialists to consider the advisability of asking the Bavarian Government whether it has duly insisted on the rights conferred on it in this respect by the Constitution of the Empire. The question has not been decided yet, but the Berlin "Taegliche Rundschau," the only Berlin paper, it is said, which is read by William II. daily in full, whilst of the other papers only cuttings are submitted to him, writes with a broad hint to Münich: "We presume that the Bavarian Government will insist on its Constitutional right not to reply to questions only suggested by a desire to poison the political wells." The unreality of the Federal Committee on Foreign Affairs cannot be better illustrated.

But I doubt whether the Committee, even if it was put on a true working status, could or would do much to impede the present personal direction of Germany's foreign affairs. Quite apart from other reasons, its official character would prevent it from being more than a political circumlocution office. If the Bavarian Socialists interpellate their Government only good can result. For the discussion will turn out to be a demonstration for peace and goodwill between the nations. But otherwise the step will prove futile. The Bavarian Government will, in fact, if not literally, act as the "Taegliche Rundschau" suggested. There are stronger means wanted to protect the safety of the nations against the consequences of the follies or artifices of those at the helm of States and Empires.

For the present an inspired article published on Friday night in the semi-official "Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung" takes pains to persuade people that the conduct of the foreign affairs of the German Empire is in the best possible hands. It declares as absolutely unfounded those intimations which accuse the German Government of provoking the Turkish Government to a warlike attitude, of treating secretly with Muley Hafid, of sowing anarchy in Persia, sending military agents to Afghanistan, and inciting the Islamic world at large to resistance to Europe. It denies emphatically the rumour of an intention to revoke Baron von Marschall from his post at Constantinople, and to replace him by Baron von der Goltz, the General Instructor of the Army, and it declares that William II., in his speech of Döberitz camp, has said nothing of encircling and of bringing to bay, but has only "expressed his conviction that the Army, faithful to the spirit of Frederick the Great, will remain equal to its task."

So far, this sounds pretty well, but the question remains how the said rumours could arise, and—which is of greater weight—how they could find so many believers that an official denial was considered necessary. I will not lay stress on the somewhat cheap adage that there is no smoke without fire. The article of the "Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung" itself furnishes the explanation. Its language is not reassuring. It begins with stating that "it would be a mistake to deny that precarious diplomatic discussion may arise," and it ends by pointing out that "we will not shut our eyes to possible dangers. Our soldiers do not carry on their caps the unwarlike motto of the Hildesheim section of the former Imperial Army, 'Da pacem, domine, in diebus nostris.' The consciousness of our strength can give us the confidence and the tranquillity which alone behoves a great peaceful nation." A strange way of silencing disquieting rumours. The language recalls almost to the letter the notorious strophe: "We don't want to fight." At the Stock Exchange it has caused almost a panic. Was it necessary, people asked, to refer to the—supposed—warlike spirit of the German Army? But this has always been the language of William II. and his Chancellor. Nobody doubts that they are perfectly alive to the dangers and risks of a war with one of the Great Powers, and will not lightheartedly adopt measures that would lead to such a conflagration. But they cannot resist the temptation to rattle the sword lest the world may forget that "we are a great and strong nation." In this way they always foster Jingoism anew when people begin seriously to reflect upon the costs of military array.

This seems to me the very danger of the moment. Nobody knows for certain what our diplomatists will brew at the end, and with contentious matter being heaped together and the medieval conception of honor everywhere driven into the mind of the makers of public opinion, an international crisis is possible at any time. Articles like that of the "Norddeutsche" are not of the kind to reassure us in this respect, and possibly they are not written for the purpose. But, all things considered, war seems not more probable than it was at any time in the last two decades. Too little is to be won and too much to be lost by it to make the thought of it very attractive. Much more serious is the danger of new increases in the costs of what is now euphemistically called peace.

It appears that each new move of our diplomatists tends to be accompanied by a new increase of the War Budgets of the nations. Papers are full of reports about the construction of new implements of war, first of all of the new giant battleship with gas engines which England is building. If all these reports and statements are true, we are sure to hear soon of new demands for Army and Navy. The German "Flottenverein" will look to that. This powerful organisation which in numbers and means leaves the British Navy League much behind it, has last week had in Danzig its General Assembly, and made its mind and aspirations known by stating in a motion that it refuses to be regarded as a mere appendix to the Imperial Naval Board, but insists on its right to propagate its own views on the acceleration of the growth of the Navy. This means that the "Flottenverein" will continue to work public opinion in favor of still more and bigger ships than the Government dares to demand. These people are surely the most dangerous enemies of the peace. It seems quite unthinkable that, if political conditions remain as they are, the increase of the burdens of armaments can go on much longer without driving the nations to the desperate attempt of making an end of it all by means of a war.

And where are we at present? Herr von Lydow, the new Chancellor of the Exchequer, is still on the look-out for new sources of revenue to cover the big deficit of about 400 millions of marks. Apart from some extension of the Imperial succession duty which, however, if such as proposed would not bring more than the sixth part of the money wanted, one hears only of new taxes on articles of consumption. In particular tobacco and spirits are to furnish higher contributions. With spirits this would be quite possible without any harm to the consumers, if only the existing unjust mode of taxation which benefits the agrarian producers at the expense of the State and the consumers would be reformed. But this the agrarian friends of the Government will not permit without being fully compensated, and instead of it, a kind of monopoly of the sales of spirits is planned which is likely to have rather obnoxious features in increasing the influence of the officials. To turn to cigars they are, it is true, not quite as highly taxed in Germany as in England. But they are here in a much higher degree a luxury of the masses, and to make them dearer than they are would be the more unjust since the German people has to pay already such high taxes on life's necessaries. Besides, an increase of the duty would greatly damage a most flourishing trade, which at present occupies more than a hundred thousand workers. But with the strong aversion to an Imperial income tax and proper death duties it will, with the present Government, always be either enhancing the price of some food or enjoyment of the masses or sacrificing some trade, or both. The failure of the so-called financial reform of 1906 which went on these lines is regarded as no sufficient reason for ceasing experimenting in the same direction. One of the greatest failures was the tax on railway tickets. It drove people by hundreds of thousands into the lower railway classes. Incredible as this may seem, it is now reported that the fault shall be put right by an imposition on the fourth railway class—the class of the poorest people—which had been left free.

In this connection English readers may be warned against accepting too willingly the glowing accounts of the great surpluses the Prussian Exchequer draws from the nationalised railways. It is, of course, only just that the railways should belong to the community, and experience has shown that the old prejudices against State management will not hold in our days. But it must not be overlooked on this account that the big surpluses of the Prussian railways are, in a degree, made possible by low wages for the railway employees. According to a table drawn by a member of the Prussian Diet, Herr Macco, of the 291,369 employees of the Prussian State railways, 160,445 had an annual income of less than £52. Even the average income of the 61,625 more or less skilled workers employed in the railway works of the State was not more than £60 a year. Engine drivers are paid from £70 to £110 at the highest. If you consider that bread, meat, and other foods are now considerably dearer in Germany than in England you will admit that a good deal of the surplus the State makes is the result of the underpayment of its employees. The same is the case with the revenue from State mines. The workers of these are paid less than those occupied in mines of private owners or companies. The State is, in Prussia, far from being a model employer.

Unfortunately, the reactionists are almost as strong in the new Prussian Diet as they were in the old one. With the exception of one division, where a Freisinniger and a Social-Democrat fight a second ballot, the elections are now everywhere over, so that a balance could be struck. It shows that the three decidedly anti-Democratic groups—the two Conservative groups and the National Liberals—although they have lost ten seats, command still 274 votes in a house of 443 members. The principal winners in regard to seats are the Catholics, who have 105 seats where before they had 96. The Freisinnige have won four seats, and the Social Democrats will be six or seven where formerly they were wholly unrepresented. Altogether a shifting of the centre of gravity towards the left side of the House, but not strong enough to make the balance go down that side. It could have been otherwise if the Freisinnige had co-operated with the Social Democrats. Their flat refusal to coalesce with the working-class Democracy is, in the first instance, responsible for the maintenance of the plutocratic and clerical character of the Prussian Parliament.—Yours, &c.,

The Drama.

THE IMMORTAL SNOB.

THERE is an interesting description in the "Times" by Mr. Walter Harris, of what he calls the "vast, inappropriate, and expensive conglomeration of useless and inartistic trash," which the half-deposed Sultan of Morocco accumulated in his palace of Fez. It consists, according to Mr. Harris, of a great assemblage of refuse, including > "a studio packed from floor to ceiling with warped cameras and decaying photographic materials; a state coach, moth-eaten within, which the damp and rain of three years have almost turned to pulp . . . an enormous collection of biograph films, many of subjects which the London County Council would never permit in London; cases of imaginary and fantastic uniforms invented and evolved by expensive tailors; stores full of broken mechanical toys . . . ladies' underclothing and false hair; pianos, harmoniums, and street organs; stuffed birds, and a thousand other miscellaneous atrocities, one and all corrupted by moth and dust, eaten by rats, and covered with mildew and cobwebs."

Mutato nomine, this is a truthful catalogue of the material of which the fashionable British drama is largely made up. Every season scores of new plays appear, produced at enormous expense, stuffed with the dresses and furniture of the hour, filled with its slang, echoing its gramophone thought. Thousands of articles appear, criticising these works, praising them, discussing them at enormous length. Inexhaustible as is this product, it has one characteristic. Born of the hour, it perishes with the hour. A few months cover it, like the rubbish-heap in the Sultan's palace, with "moth and rust"; and the interminable procession of shadows—Merry Widows and Belles of New York, Mimosa Maids and Muscular Christians, Toddleses, Explorers, Flag Lieutenants, Prisoners of Zenda—vanishes like the figures on a bioscope; to give place to other figures similarly constructed. As with the season's plays, so with its songs and its books. All are constructed on a few models, like the women's hats from Paris. Some show a certain degree of adaptive or imitative skill. But nearly all minister alike to pride, sensuality, or ennui; despise Nature and Truth; are unfeeling, or shallow-feeling; are utterly bad as art.

And now and then, in the midst of this brouhaha of nonsense, there appears some profound and sincere conception of the dramatic art, distinguished from its false companions by its directness, its simplicity of method and apparel, its appeal to the affections of men, its clear realisation of the evils or the follies of their society. And this work of genuine art survives, even when its meaning, like the meaning of the Bible, is obscured by much repetition. Such a work is "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," now being played at too rare intervals at His Majesty's Theatre by M. Coquelin aîné and his company. It is quite impossible that the London theatrical season can witness anything so perfect as this play, or any dramatic representation which approaches that of M. Coquelin as M. Jourdain. And yet our dramatic critics do not devote to it one third of the space which they give to the absurdities I have described. One of these gentlemen, indeed, carries the average naiveté of his profession to an excess when he informs us that "an Englishman may read the play without feeling at home in it," that "the period and the society are foreign to our habits of mind." Now "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," being a satire on Snobbery, probes the specially English foible, the central vice of character and deportment which paralyses the English hand and atrophies the English brain and heart. It might conceivably be said that France, with her Revolution and her levellers, had made Molière's masterpiece obsolete. But it is too much to hint that the pranks of M. Jourdain have nothing to say to us—with our Court, our Dorantes and Dorimènes, our very House of "Mamamouchis" gloriously flourishing through the centuries, and still securely enthroned in the centre of Imperial democracy. Let us at least confess our kinship with M. Jourdain while he drives in troops through Bond Street, occupies whole streets and squares in the neighborhood of Hyde Park, stores them with acres of pictures and tons of furniture, sups with Dorimène at the Carlton, begs for a baronetcy at Westminster, and makes the "troisième révérence" at Buckingham Palace, and so long as we keep a public school system for the express benefit of Jourdain fils, and discipline his little mind in the principles of the famous lesson in orthography and the polite arts.

It is not necessary, therefore, to regard "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" as out of date or out of harmony with the most cherished forms of our civilisation. Molière, indeed, most inveterate of preachers and lecturers, chose, as all great artists choose, themes that are permanent, that belong to the web and woof of human nature, not merely to social artifice. He had also a gift of gentleness, rare in the satirist, and it is this special quality which M. Coquelin so delightfully illustrates. M. Jourdain is not the Snob Particular so much as the idealised, the universal Snob. There is nothing vulgar about him; he is engaged in an act of ritual, culminating in the Beatific Vision of himself as a Mamamouchi, who has at the same time been mercifully delivered from the haunting spectre of a draper-father. This exquisite process is reflected in every tone of M. Coquelin's voice and every line of the wonderful comic mask that he puts on. The whole man is absorbed in such revelations as of the true nature of prose. His lips are parted, his cheeks deep-lined with care or puckered with desperate earnestness. Now and then M. Coquelin, rogue that he is, must turn his solemn face, rapt in the great business of ceasing to be a man and becoming a gentleman, and show it to his audience, so that they may see the joy that transfigures it. But this is not often. M. Coquelin's art is too refined to be prodigal of such devices. The play, full of agreeably bustling action as it is, has its centre in the progress of M. Jourdain though the enchanted domain of Snobbery. The more extravagant his follies, the more contained is the actor's expression of them. At the critical passages of the immortal lesson Coquelin's voice hardly rises above a whisper, and it is with a certain dignified tolerance that he pushes aside Madame Jourdain's suggestion that it is more important to talk sense than to know what name the learned give to the faculty of speech. In the Mamamouchi scene, with its burlesque of ceremony, he is as a man entranced. The unreality of the Snob's existence penetrates him. The absurd has become to him as natural as Nicole's shriek of laughter at his "gentlemanly" appearance seems unnatural. He is the pure, the sublimated Snob, disinterested in his worship, and even ennobled by it. And in this he resembles us. Napoleon revived Snobbery as a mere instrument of government. We retain it for the joy of it, for the "thing in itself."

In such representations, therefore, appears at once the whole purpose of dramatic art, and it is only a sign of the decline of our own drama, that we who, as a nation, live most by trade, and are at the same time most ashamed of it, can produce no satiric reflection of this great national fault, and cannot even perceive the relevance of an immortal representation of it, designed, as it was, for other times and other manners. Contrast, indeed, the whole apparatus of such a play with the garb assumed by our own feeble and prostituted art—the simplicity and clearness of the action and dialogue, the absence of all elaboration in the scenery, the due subordination of each actor, even the greatest, to the lines and tone of the general dramatic picture. And examine the wealth of M. Coquelin's repertoire, as compared with the poverty of resource displayed by our leading artists. We have Shakespearian players in abundance. But who among our actors of the first rank plays Shakespeare, and Goldsmith, and Sheridan, and (let us say) Congreve at his best, and aims at exhibiting the general riches of our store of dramatic literature, as M. Coquelin exhibits the wealth of the French theatre? Such a range and choice of effort will never come under our present managerial system; we must look to the coming National Theatre to ensure it. H. THE HYDE PARK DEMONSTRATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Such a crowd had never been seen in Hyde Park, not even for a Tyburn hanging in the good old days when no woman claimed a part in public affairs Perhaps no such crowd had ever been gathered in the world's history on so small a space. It was as big as the German first line that in case of war would spread from Trier to Mühlhausen. It was as big as a dim barbaric host into whose flesh the Roman sword hacked its way for days together. The women in the processions had come from all the winds of the island and all the famous cities of our home—from Edinburgh and Newcastle, from Halifax and Manchester, from Carnarvon, Exeter, Portsmouth, Canterbury, Colchester, and half a hundred more, bringing with them in the names of their old fortresses and the dragons and mottoes on their flags a long memory of our persistent conquest of freedom. As an army with banners the Social and Political Union, and many outside supporters, converged upon the Park in seven great columns from the stations and mustering points of the largest city. Thirty special trains had brought the country people up, three thousand standard bearers carried their flags. Punctual to time they came, and exact in place, without fluster or excitement, quietly ordered by general, chief marshals, group marshals, banner marshals, and banner captains without the aid of men. When Mr. Haldane's Territorials can throw two Army Corps through the streets with as little fuss, the British voter's confidence in his right to sleep in peace should be restored.

Women from all classes had come—graduates and writers, wives of "professional" men, clerks, shop-girls, factory hands, tailoresses, sweated things, workers in all the trades and labors which have produced the wage-earning woman of our cities—an appearance still new in the world's history. Driven by an obscure or sharply realised sense of wrong, they had come to maintain the words inscribed on the French banner—"La Solidarité des Femmes." It was a new "Insurrection of Women," a new appeal, not to a helpless Monarch in Versailles, but to a power that is supposed to guide the world. Surely thousands on thousands of human beings, touched with a sense of wrong, whether obscure or sharply defined, could not appeal in vain to the power of justice that, however roughly, is in the end supposed to guide the world! With drums beating and banners flying, the seven divisions entered the awaiting crowd and were merged in it. Like the currents of streams pouring into a lake, they were distinguishable for a little way, and then they disappeared. The banners were rolled up, the music ceased. The processions became inextricably mingled with that enormous audience. Only on the twenty platforms were seen the speakers, marked out by the purple, white, and green of the Union that had done it, and almost the only banner that remained unfurled displayed on its purple, white, and green the words, "From Prison"—the means by which the thing had been done.

It was those two words that had brought together the greatest crowd of our history. They were the ultimate appeal to the power that is supposed to guide the world. Two years ago, how many citizens of London, or free-born voters of our islands, would have cut two minutes off their Sunday dinners to attend a meeting for Woman's Rights? Now the moderate estimates tell of 300,000, and one or two want to double the number. Most of them, to be sure, had come for something to do, for something to talk about. They had come in hopes of seeing something queer, or because it was a fine day and the Park was not far. They camped in families round the outskirts, and put the children to sleep on the nice dry grass, by mistake for the country. They sang, and sucked sweets, and wandered up and down, and struggled, and pushed, and made love, and tried to hear the speeches, and gave it up, and walked round again, and talked of people's dress and people's faces, and sat down, and smoked, and ate oranges, and laughed to defend themselves from seriousness, and behaved as a London crowd always would, whether on Derby Day or the Day of Judgment.

That was the crowd—casual, careless, afraid of something new, weaker in their contagious mass than any man or woman among them—the same as other crowds, only larger. But "at the back of their heads," as it were, lay a sense that something unusual and significant was happening, a feeling that this was a day in history and things would never be quite the same again. They dimly knew that a cause for which people are prepared to suffer anything without counting cost or comfort or shame has to be considered, and there were the words, "From Prison," to remind them. As usual, their private opinions about methods and tactics and lawlessness and unconstitutional ways had been obliterated by penalties freely suffered for crimes that the Irish call "clean." For some high and unselfish cause alone the offence is not only expiated by the punishment, but glorified; and everyone in the crowd knew in his heart that it was so. Here, in this Park, another step was being taken in the long effort of mankind to free itself from the trammels which it had unconsciously imposed for its preservation through long-forgotten ages of savagery. It was a step like the rebellion against the absolutism of tyrants, or the oppression of nobles, or the inquisition of priests. Those evils also had their roots in some far-off necessity by which for centuries they were justified, and on the banners of those who shook the grasp of them loose from the world were also inscribed the words, "From Prison." For in all such contests there is a point where reason has done its work and it is only by action and a willingness to suffer everything that the assurance of faith can be demonstrated to a world that cares very little for reason by itself.

The contest signified by that incalculable assembly sprang from a still greater depth in the forgotten strata of history out of which we have emerged, for nothing is so slow to change as the common ways of daily life. There before the very eyes of the crowd was exemplified the stage that the ancient difference between might and right had now reached. On one of the platforms stood the woman who had brought the cause to the front of political life—slender, frail, possessed immovably by her idea. On another stood her daughter, humorous, imperturbable, an orator such as hardly a man in our generation has been. And close around both platforms were gathered organised bands of youths from political clubs and shop-assistant common rooms—pathetic testimonies to the overwork and deprivation and hardship that their mothers had undergone. Such as they were, they represented might. With rattles and bells and toys and whistles, and songs in chorus, they illustrated in concrete form the philosophic argument of the "Times" and the "Spectator" that only men can have the vote, because only men go out to war. With laughter and clamour they appealed to the chivalrous instinct on which we are told society is founded, that it is unwomanly for a woman to have a voice in the laws that govern her, but not unwomanly for her to empty the morning slops.

Dimly the crowd was conscious of all this. As the hour and a-half of speaking went by, all the platforms but one conquered an audience as far as a woman's voice could reach. They heard uncomfortable things they had not known or realised before—things about the English laws on women, and workhouse cases, and the sweating wage, and children whom their own mothers may not claim as their own. But it did not much matter what they heard. The look of things was more persuasive than any words. To be sure, it is disconcerting to have an unquestioned and unconscious idea disturbed when it has seemed to lie in the very nature of man, like the inferiority of women, their want of seriousness, their incapacity for politics, their inability to fight. But there the proof was before all people's eyes. Inability to fight? Well, men were incapable of motherhood, a more useful and a more dangerous service; yet men had the vote, though often they were obviously as incapable of fighting. Inferiority, incapacity for politics? Look at the platforms and the thing became ridiculous. And as for seriousness, there stood the banner inscribed, "From Prison." It was all very disturbing, and in a disturbed, uneasy mood men and women went home to tea when the bugle had sounded and the biggest of meetings passed into history.—

WORKING WIVES IN COUNCIL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—This year, when the insistence of Woman Suffragists has forced into prominence all matters affecting the lives of women, the annual Congress of the Women's Co-Operative Guild has received the recognition it has always deserved. Coming away from it, one is conscious of having gained two chief impressions from the deliberations of these married women workers—the majority of them were wives and mothers—an impression of their sincerity, and an impression of their practical common sense. Here were eleven hundred women who had carried on the struggle for existence almost as long as they had been conscious of existence, sitting in council to discuss the factors that make the struggle so hard and so incessant, and determined with the instinct of the mother to make that struggle less hard for those who came after them; it was not conceivable that they should be anything but practical and sincere in their manner of tackling things. So there was no time wasted over eloquence, no attempt at making an effect; the literary tricks of the half-educated would have fallen lamentably flat in this assembly of political housewives, who had met to seek a solution of real problems. Yet the interesting thing was that the eloquence was there all the same, and that the effect was made as surely as if it had been rehearsed beforehand.

It is not easy to analyse the temper of that packed audience of women workers. There was nothing tense about it; good humor, good fellowship, unfaltering attention were its prevailing characteristics. But now and then a flash of plain truth from the platform, that went straight home simply because it was true, sent a wave of emotion all over the hall that you could not call approval or indignation or dissent; it was just a human cry. One of these dramatic moments was reached during the debate on unemployment, when one of the speakers said simply, "You know what life means with that terrible fear of unemployment always before you"; another, when child labor was mentioned, and it was declared to be "deplorable that we have so many children among us to-day that it tears the heart to look at"; or again, when a Northern mother, making an appeal for the children to stay longer at school, though the mothers might have to work harder to keep them there, said parenthetically, "God knows we are hard worked enough just by being mothers." More eloquent than literary periods was the remark of the woman who, trying to voice her advocacy of Government workshops, added quietly: "I don't seem able to get the power of speaking, but I know what I say is true." And the same sense of unanimity was in the air when true facts were given about sweating, the seizure of wives' savings by their husbands, the bitterness of waiting for an old-age pension, and then losing it through being in receipt of poor relief. And while all these matters were discussed from the woman's point of view, any hint that this meant no antagonism to the men was always received with loud approval.

Perhaps it is natural that the outlook of those who are always grappling with a certain set of life's difficulties should in some respects be less broad than that of the intellectual and leisured outsider. One felt this slightly in the education debate, when the feeling of the Congress was by no means unanimous as to the desirability of raising the school age. The economic obstacles, being ever present to the mother of wage-earning children, not unnaturally blind her to the ultimate advantage to be gained; and the only wonder was, in this case, that so many delegates appealed earnestly for the better education of girls, and that a resolution calling for the full discussion of this by all Guild branches should have been unanimously carried. It was impossible not to feel sympathetic with the dissentient who, crying out against someone who had called upon them "to work their fingers to the bone to keep the children at school till they were sixteen," said grimly: "Most mothers' fingers are at the bone already when the bairns are but fourteen."

The Woman Suffrage debate, again, when a resolution was passed with only a few dissentients, calling upon the Government to enfranchise women "on terms that will include the married working-woman," showed, I thought, a similar disinclination to see beyond what was wanted to what might ultimately be gained. The women were good enough politicians to see that the time was not yet ripe for full adult suffrage, though most of the speakers were adult Suffragists in theory; but the point of view of those who, while equally anxious that working wives should be enfranchised, claim that an immediate demand for their enfranchisement would probably postpone the prospect of any woman being enfranchised, was not really put before the Congress. I thought this a pity, because, just now, when all the Suffrage Societies, except the adult Suffragists, are asking for the so-called Limited Bill, on the grounds that to ask for more would not be practical politics, it would have been interesting and helpful to hear on what grounds the Women's Co-operative Guild support the expediency of the wider scheme. The vote taken seemed to me consequently an academic vote, a mere statement of the measure of enfranchisement that co-operative women would like to have, and not their opinion as to whether this was the most practicable measure to ask for. It must be added, though, that their real expression of opinion with regard to Woman Suffrage was only to be gathered from attending all their meetings. The Congress was itself a two days' Suffrage debate. Again and again, speakers said, amid enthusiasm, that this or that question would never be settled until women had votes—whether it was a matter of unemployment, wives' savings, old-age pensions, a minimum wage for Co-operative women workers. One heard it in speeches and in conversation, during the Congress, and after it, coming away in the train. It is a fact that has burnt itself into the consciousness of the woman worker.

I should like to touch finally on the International side of Co-operative work, as the women see it. It was impossible not to be struck by their readiness to accept the idea of international citizenship. They listened in heroic silence while friendly foreigners spoke to them in Finnish, Swedish, Hungarian, and French; they applauded generously when such utterances were translated and found to contain many references to the Women's Guilds that have been formed in other countries on the model of our English one; they rose to a fine point of enthusiasm when Mr. Naitila, of the Finnish Co-operative Society, stammered out an English farewell, or when Madame Renaud, the French Socialist, made them understand by a kind of magnetic impulse what she meant when she said: "Compatriotes! je dis compatriotes, parce que pour moi il n'y a pas de frontière!'" They sent away the foreign delegates wondering why the English race is said to be shy and reserved; and if I have said that in some respects the outlook of the working mother may be slightly limited, let me end by saying that in others it is a good deal wider than that of the intellectual observer—and it is nearly always more human.—Yours, &c.,

EVELYN SHARP.

Letters to the Editor.

THE PAN-ANGLICAN CONGRESS AND DIVORCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Pray give me space for a brief reply to Mr. Gates. When I spoke at the Albert Hall, I did not apply St. Paul's phrase—"doctrines of devils"—to the re-marriage of divorced persons, but to the glorification of Prostitution. I did not apply the phrase, "legalised concubinage," to marriage with a wife's sister, but to the re-marriage of persons having a husband or a wife still living. Mr. Gates should be careful to quote accurately before he protests.

Mr. Gates goes on to ask why I "dissociate myself from the early Christians," why I "fail to denounce the Roman Church," and other conundrums. The answer applies to them all—because my speech was limited by rule to fifteen minutes.—Yours, &c.,

WHY PUDSEY WAS LOST.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The loss of a Government seat, never previously captured by the enemy, is very galling at this juncture, especially in view of the fact that at the General Election the Liberal majority was 3,502.

The last election must, however, be totally omitted from any consideration of the circumstances of the case. Exceptional everywhere, nowhere was that election more so than in the Pudsey Division. Mr. Whiteley, who had considerably strengthened his hold on the constituency during the five and a-quarter years since the "khaki" election, was opposed by Col. Ford, who came forward at the eleventh hour, virtually unknown to a single elector, who did not display any great political sagacity during the contest, who was handicapped by a ludicrously inefficient organisation and by a neglect of registration work as great as that of the Liberals in East Wolverhampton from 1906 to 1908. In all these circumstances, with his prestige as the newly-appointed Chief Whip, and with the tide running so strongly in favor of Liberalism, it is hardly to be wondered that Mr. Whiteley polled two to one.

The proper comparison is with 1900, when the Tories fought under much the same conditions as now, with a strong local candidate who had been nursing the constituency for some little time, with the backing of an excellent organisation, after careful attention to the register, and with public opinion for the time being in their favor. How is it that a Tory minority of 549 in 1906 has been turned into a majority of 113 in 1908?

It was not, as in some of our recent losses, due to neglect of the constituency. Mr. Whiteley had been, especially considering the claims of his arduous post, assiduous in his attention to it. It may be doubted, indeed, whether any Chief Whip has ever visited his constituency so frequently when, as in this case, he lived at a distance from it. Nor had there been any supineness on the part of the local organisation. The Tory activity was not allowed to go uncounteracted, and much spade-work had been done during the twelve months preceding the election. A visit from Mr. Lloyd George had even been arranged for, but was postponed on account of the railway dispute calling for all that Minister's attention. Registration, too, had been as thoroughly looked after as if the Liberal majority had been only 350 instead of ten times that figure. I must pause here to pay a tribute to the work of the Liberal agent, Mr. J. H. Linforth, one of the ablest organisers the Liberal Party possesses. It may be doubted whether there is any constituency where the registration work is done better than in the Pudsey Division or in the City of Leeds, for which Mr. Linforth is also responsible. Nor was there any mistake in the choice of candidate. Mr. Ogden, it is true, did not please everybody—what candidate ever did?—but the number of abstentions on the Liberal side on personal grounds would fall far short of one hundred.

He enjoyed the advantage—possessed in both its aspects by neither of the previous Liberal candidates—of being a resident in the division, and also of being in business in Leeds, of whose City Council he is a prominent member, having been chairman of the Waterworks Committee (now engaged on some huge extensions) for the last two years with conspicuous success, so that he was well calculated to appeal to the Leeds freeholders. In the division itself he was, generally speaking, remarkably popular, and to great political knowledge he added a rare gift of oratory.

Nor was there any over-confidence on the part of the workers. Every one, from the Chairman (Mr. P. H. Booth, W.R.C.C.), and Mr. Linforth downwards, recognised the stiff nature of the contest, and worked accordingly. The only defects that can be pointed out in the management of the election are that, as at Manchester, the Liberals were rather late in replying to the glaring misrepresentations as to the effect of the Miners' Eight Hours Bill, and that too much attention was paid to the Tory attack and too little to the Socialist; but the latter point was one of those instances where it is so much easier to be wise after the event. Rarely, at any election anywhere, has there been a more thorough canvass. Without going into committee-room secrets as to exact figures, it may be safely said that the proportion of voters of whom the canvassers gave no report was ridiculously small.

Was the reverse, then, due to a feeling of disgust with the Government? The most bitter opponent of Liberal policy will hardly contend that the Licensing Bill, the Education Bill, and the Miners' Eight Hours Bill, all taken together, have brought more odium on the Liberal Party than the South African War did, and Mr. Oddy only polled twenty more votes than Mr. Beckett Faber, swimming on top of the khaki wave, did, out of an increased poll of 669.

It may be suggested, however, that the Liberal candidate was handicapped to a greater extent than previous Liberal candidates had been by the Leeds freeholders' and outvoters' votes. As the Liberal Agent stated at the outset of the contest, the electorate consists of freeholders in the appalling proportion of 43 per cent., and the Tory Agent made the most desperate efforts to bring these up to the poll. The Leeds freeholders were circularised almost every day—I had nearly said almost every post—during the last week of the contest, and the outvoters were all wired to on the eve of the poll. But, though this proportion is probably only equalled in the two hopelessly Tory constituencies of Wimbledon and Hornsey, in which the South and North London freeholders respectively vote, it is by no means such a handicap to Liberalism as might be imagined. Of all the large towns in England, Leeds is probably the most Radical. At the General Election of 1895 it was the only town returning more than two members to send a majority of Liberals. It would have done the same in 1900 but for a split in the Progressive vote in the Eastern Division. In 1906 it shared with Manchester the distinction of being the only town returning more than three members which sent an unbroken Progressive representation. This attitude of the city at large is shared by the resident freeholders, and, to a lesser extent, by the outvoters. At the General Election they gave Liberalism an estimated majority of 500. Of what other body of freeholders except, possibly, those of the Stretford Division of Lancashire, could the same be said?

The abnormal circumstances which have marked all recent English bye-elections, of course, swelled the Tory vote among the occupying electorate, but the total increase in the Tory poll being, as shown above, only twenty over that of 1900, when they had an adverse majority of 549, it is clear these factors did not avail, of themselves, to put Mr. Ogden in a minority. The respective—and conflicting—claims of the Tariff Reformers, "the Trade," and the Suffragettes to the glory of Mr. Oddy's victory thus fall to the ground. The last-named, indeed, were even more ineffective than in South Leeds, where competent observers estimated they did not influence a hundred votes. Only in one small township, comprising two per cent. of the electorate, can they be said to have done the Liberals any harm.

Having thus discussed and, with good warrant, dismissed all the above possible causes of Liberal defeat, there remains one, and only one—the presence of the third candidate.

Of course, surer ground is wanted on which to rest this assertion than the Socialist Party's own declaration that it was they who put Mr. Oddy in—for nobody talks more twaddle of the "alone I did it" type than your average Socialist—and it can be found. Throughout the contest, I estimated that the Labor candidate would draw two-thirds of his poll from the ordinary Liberal voting strength, and one-third from the Conservative. This opinion was confirmed by estimates, arrived at quite independently, of other members of Mr. Ogden's election committee. As matters have turned out, the estimate is probably too low, for, of the four townships from which the Labor candidate drew his chief support, two were, in the past, Liberal strongholds, and in the other two, Liberalism had, at any rate, always held its own, if no more.

In all likelihood, Mr. Benson drew 1,000 of his votes from the Liberals and only the odd 291 from the Conservatives. Take the estimate as it stands, however, and we find that the Conservatives lost 430 votes to the new party, and the Liberals lost 861. In other words, but for Mr. Benson's presence in the field, the Liberal majority would have been 318, or not greatly below those of 1895 and 1900.

The Labor candidate, of course, stood for Free Trade, popular control of Education, Licensing Reform, Old-Age Pensions, and the Eight Hours Bill, so that, however much ink the Tory Press may shed in trying to prove the contrary, however disingenuously they may manipulate the figures of the contest in the same way as they do those on the fiscal question, the fact remains that the majority of the constituency backs up the Government on these questions; but, owing to the split in the Progressive vote, that majority fails to make its voice heard in the House of Commons. The Labor Party has, of course, a perfect right to contest Pudsey or any other constituency in which it can get ten voters to sign a nomination paper, but all things which are lawful, we know on excellent authority, are not expedient.

It is not merely inexpedient, it is positively idiotic, to sacrifice the welfare of the people at the present juncture by running a candidate who has not the remotest chance of election, and it is a strange way of supporting the Miners' Eight Hours Bill, on the eve of its second reading, to help to return a candidate who makes opposition to that measure one of the chief planks in his programme.

The heads of the Labor Party wisely recognised this, and declined to indorse Mr. Benson's candidature, but a negative attitude is hardly sufficient. On similar occasions Liberal headquarters have taken pains to spread broadcast through the Press their repudiation of the locally selected candidate, while prominent Liberals have taken sides against him.

As Labor, equally with Liberalism, stands to suffer from ill-considered action, it is not too much to ask that similar steps shall be taken by the heads of the Labor Party in all future cases where a third candidature, without benefit to Labor, threatens to injure, not merely Liberalism, but the commonwealth.—Yours, &c.,

THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Whoever wrote the article called the "Lost Liberty of the Road" in your issue of June 6th was supremely ignorant of the subject which he was discussing. I will first deal with the actual mis-statements of fact. It is not true that the horse vehicle, the cyclist, and the pedestrian are almost driven off some of the main roads, as he could see if he knew the main roads as well as I do. It is not true that property is depreciated. Personally, I have never heard of a butcher's boy being punished for furious driving, though I quite agree that he often deserves it. It is not true that twelve miles an hour is the utmost limit of pace in towns and villages that is consistent with the comfort and safety of the public. It is not a most necessary change "to substitute imprisonment for a fine at the third offence"; it is already the law. It is not any longer true that motoring is a form of sport. It is not true that the average respectable motorist belonging to the natural aristocracy behaves like a hooligan road hog.

After this absurd exhibition of prejudice and ignorance of the subject he is dealing with, I cannot wonder that the writer of your article goes on to suggest that the Press is corrupt because it is "in the hands of motorists"; that the Magisterial Bench and the County Councils are corrupt for the same reason; that Mr. Burns and the Local Government Board are indifferent to the common rights of the people, and that the present law has completely broken down. I can only tell him that he will find no one who knows anything about the subject, whether he be motorist, magistrate, or chief constable, to agree with a single one of his propositions, and if your readers like this sort of exaggeration, it is perhaps hardly worth while dealing with it.

To this sweeping indictment I ought to make one exception. When he says that prosecutions ought to be for driving to the common danger instead of for exceeding an artificial speed limit he is on firm ground. This is what everybody who knows the subject has been crying out for, and the powers under the existing Motor-Car Act of 1903 are ample for the purpose. Once a man is convicted of driving to the common danger, it is possible to fine him, and it is possible to suspend his licence and to remove him from the wheel of a motor-car for any period the magistrate thinks fit. No motorist denies that there are some drivers who ought not to be on the road, and the 40,000 organised motorists of this country, consisting in the main of considerate drivers, have over and over again urged this course of conduct upon the police. The writer of your article should learn something of the subject. Let him familiarise himself with the conditions obtaining in Surrey, where the towns and villages are left unprotected, and where motorists are forced into the lanes and byways because every straight, open, and safe stretch of road is infested by concealed policemen, put there not to protect the public but to convict the motorist, considerate and inconsiderate alike, of technical offences and rake in fines. This conduct on the part of the police does more to encourage inconsiderate driving than anything else, since it turns every motorist into an enemy of the police in the county.—Yours, &c.,

RUSSELL.

June 15th, 1908.

[The writer of the article lives in Surrey. He is himself a cyclist, and finds himself driven off the main road, and practically debarred from cycling as an amusement. The depreciation of property on main roads is a fact familiar to everyone but Lord Russell. If he has never heard of prosecutions for the furious driving of horses it is quite possible he is equally ill-informed on other subjects. His denial that motoring is any longer a form of sport can only cause a smile. As to the substitution of imprisonment for a fine, we are concerned less with the law than with its administration. Lord Russell seems to think that no one but a motorist has any experience on this matter. He ignores the bitter difference between the experience of the man inside the motor and that of the man outside. We must add that the manner in which he deals with the whole subject most aptly illustrates that very spirit among motorists which has caused the growing demand for stricter administration of the law.—ED. LIBERALISM AND PRISON REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If the moral value of the judgment of "A London Clergyman" is to be gauged from his assertion, in your issue of June 15th, that the Prevention of Crimes Bill "has been introduced under the Ten Minutes' Rule, with the obvious intention of curtailing discussion," there can be small profit in discussing with him. I have seldom seen a more wanton aspersion. As you, sir, are well aware, a Bill might be introduced without any speech at all; and Mr. Gladstone's Bill has been very fully discussed at the proper time—on the second reading; while the Committee stage is yet to come.

Your correspondent alleges, quite erroneously, that under this Bill "the liberty of offenders is entirely handed over to prison warders and officials"; and then asks for "an enlargement of the system by which offenders may, should their conduct justify it, be released before the expiration of their sentences." And how is that now done, save on the testimony of warders and officials?

I am perfectly aware that the present Bill does not fully and strictly apply the principle of the indeterminate sentence; I have expressly said so. But, in view of the kind of criticism that is being passed upon the Bill, it is abundantly clear that British intelligence is not yet prepared for the systematic application of any rational principle to criminal treatment. It is being denounced, with all the confidence of a first impression, by people who have evidently never before considered the problems involved.

I have some little difficulty in believing, on the authority of your correspondent, that you have declared the Bill to be "an infringement of the spirit, if not the letter, of Habeas Corpus." Is it possible that you suggested that a writ of Habeas Corpus would not run in a Borstal Institution? Or that while a death sentence and a sentence of imprisonment for life are compatible with Habeas Corpus, an indeterminate sentence is not? I must confess myself mystified.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

June 24th, 1908.

[We do not see the grounds of Mr. Robertson's mystification. We think it is contrary to the spirit, though not to the letter, of Habeas Corpus to keep a man in prison indefinitely, while not alleging against him a definite crime for which he has not yet received punishment.—ED. NATION.]

NATIVES IN THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Rees complains that I have misunderstood his views. If so, I am deeply grieved. I know how annoying it is for a writer to find himself criticised for opinions which he never entertained. But the blame for the misrepresentation, if misrepresentation there has been, is not mine but your reviewer's. What I said was frankly based on what I read. Nevertheless, I offer to Mr. Rees my sincere apologies for my share in the injustice done to him.

This, however, is a minor issue. My criticism was directed not at Mr. Rees, but at the views attributed to him; and, as those views are widely held among the representatives of British rule in India, I see no reason for modifying my attitude towards them. To come to matters of fact, I am not at all unaware, as Mr. Rees supposes, that "all offices in India, except a very small number, are not only open, but are filled, and, as a rule, very efficiently filled, by Indian gentlemen." Yes, they are filled to overflowing—so much so that I venture to express the opinion (I hope agitators in India will not act on the hint) that, if those Indian clerks chose to go on strike one morning, the whole of the administrative machine in India would collapse before noon. But this fact does not in any way meet the case. The grievance of the Indians is not that they are excluded from the Government service, but that they are excluded from a share in the control of that service. The legions of Indian clerks employed in the public offices confers upon them no more share in the management of the State than the legions of sailors and servants employed by a navigation company confers upon them a share in the management of a ship. The percentage of natives in really responsible positions is infinitesimal when compared, not only with the percentage of European officials, but with the number of natives who consider themselves qualified to fill such positions. That is the point of the whole argument and the gist of the Indians' demand—to raise the percentage of native members on the higher grades of the Civil Service in proportion to the advance of native education.

The only genuine exception to the exclusion from high employment, of which the Indians complain, is offered by the judicial branch of the administration. A fair proportion of seats on the Bench is filled by Indian judges. This, I believe, is a privilege that might very well be extended to other branches. One often hears that the Indian lacks many of the qualities for rule upon which the Englishman prides himself. Among these qualities are a high sense of duty, impartiality, incorruptibility, independence of judgment, and moral courage. Now, I submit, no better test for the possession of those qualities could be devised than the placing of the Indian in a position which demands the constant display of those qualities. Such a position he already occupies in the Law Courts. Every day the Indian judge is called upon to pass sentence in a variety of cases calculated to test his sense of duty, his impartiality, his integrity, his independence of judgment, and his moral courage. How has he stood the test? By the confession of every European in India—including, amusingly enough, those who deny to the Indian the possession of those virtues—the Indian judge is not a jot inferior to his English colleague. The admission of the Indians to the Bench forms a practical experiment, the success which has attended that experiment ought to supply a precedent. When that precedent has been followed on an adequate scale, then Mr. Rees will be perfectly justified in pointing to the numbers of Indians in the Government offices as an index to the measure of the Indian's participation in the management of his own country.

How the Indians who, apart from the Judicial branch, enter the Civil Service through the ordinary competitive examination annually held in England, acquit themselves I do not know. In the course of three years' residence and travel in India I never met one. During the same period I met, up and down the country, dozens of old English college acquaintances, in addition to scores of new faces. Of the existence of Indian members in the Indian Civil Service proper I am convinced, as I am convinced of the existence of microbes in the water of the Indian tanks—by hearsay. In both cases the statement could only be verified by the use of a microscope.—Yours, &c.,

THE RATING OF PUBLIC HOUSES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It has been stated in the course of the controversy on the Licensing Bill that licensed property is rated at three times the amount the same property would be rated at if unlicensed; and, relying on that statement, an appeal is made to ratepayers to oppose the Bill for "pocket interests." With a view of ascertaining what truth there is in the above statement I have prepared a return for all the houses in the county of Herts, the renewal of which has been refused since the 1904 Act.

It will be seen from the enclosed return applying to forty houses that they were assessed as follows:—

Sch. A. When Licensed.	Sch. A. When Unlicensed.	Gross Value Poor Law Licensed.	Gross Value Poor Law Unlicensed.
£902	£847 18s.	£840 5s.	£740 7s.

The compensation paid amounted to £23,701.

Numerous deductions may be made from these figures, but the appeal to the pockets of the ratepayers will, I think, lose its force, anyhow, so far as county districts are concerned—indeed, the result of this looking into matters may be that the ratings of licensed premises, and certainly Schedule A, will be raised, and the ratepayers may thus get relief instead of alarm by the passing of the Bill.—Yours, &c.,

WHAT DOES "VOTES FOR WOMEN" MEAN?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—"Votes for Women" means another twenty years of Tory Government and all that that means. If the movement had been engineered by Mr. Balfour, it could not have been more effectively designed to carry him back to power. The only measure of Woman's Suffrage likely in any case to pass the Lords is the limited one which would present the Tory Party with a million new voters and prepare the way for its triumph at the next election. If the Government insist on a suffrage on a "democratic" basis, and go to the country on that question, disaster awaits them, and the triumphant Tories would certainly pass the limited measure and thus further buttress up their power. To get manhood suffrage would be difficult enough, to load the question with adult woman suffrage would be to court annihilation. It is not the vocal people who attend meetings and organise demonstrations and arrogate to themselves the name of Public Opinion, that form a majority of the populace, but it is the man in the street that decides elections. And depend upon it, the man in the street won't hear of adult woman's suffrage. The utmost he would do would be to extend the franchise to widows and women householders.

Such being the facts, is there any way out of the difficulty? Why not concentrate on a purely household suffrage—one household, one vote? Extend the franchise to women householders, taking steps to prevent the manufacture of faggot votes, but balance the matter by abolishing the property qualification, plural voting, joint occupation of houses, and such like. If the so-called lodger franchise went also, I do not think much would be lost.—Yours, &c.,

J. Abberley.

Ipswich, June 22nd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent of last week says that under adult suffrage, as the votes of women would outnumber those of men, "Great Britain will be governed by women." But what ground is there for assuming that on any political question all or most women would be united against all or most men? On the contrary, women are as much divided into political parties as are men. It would be as reasonable to divide Great Britain by an imaginary line north and south so that the population to the east of the line outnumbered by a million that to the west of the line, and then to say that Great Britain was governed by the east.

It is stated that women "have no experience at all of the sterner side of life"; tell this to the five-and-a-half millions of wage-earning women—most of whom are engaged in physical toil—and they will laugh at you.

If women "know nothing of finance and of the sources of the great trade of the country," neither do the enormous majority of men from their own experience; while women have as much opportunity as men of informing themselves upon such matters. Nor with regard to finance must it be forgotten that women contribute their share to the Exchequer exactly as men do.

To have served upon a jury is not at present a necessary electoral qualification; there are thousands of male voters who have never done so. But women as well as men commit crimes and suffer from their committal by others, and should, therefore, have a voice in criminal legislation.

As for social questions, in what sense are men more interested in them than women? More women than men are engaged in social work among the poor; and social legislation in so far as it affects the home and the children is the special interest of women.

The vast majority of male electors "have not been and are not likely to be soldiers, sailors, or policemen"; and the same is true of the members of Parliaments and Cabinets who decide "questions of peace and war, the movements of armies and fleets, and the preservation of order." Women as well as men pay to maintain the Services.

In short, women are responsible human beings, and, as such, they desire to be full citizens.—Yours, &c.,

"A DISTANT DRUM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your excellent article on Henley ("A Distant Drum," June 20th), do you note that the writer drops unconsciously into blank verse?

> "That did not matter. Henley had hit the ideal
> That every man of peace should wish to be . . .
> To catch the City train no more, no more
> Bring home the skewered basket with the fish,
> But, sword in hand,
> Stride slaughtering through a free, lascivious world,
> Strike to the heart, and feel the hot life spurt."

Perhaps this alliterative and metrical prose is likewise a "protest of the uncontrollable spirit of man against his confines"; but the protest against Henley and Mr. Kipling might have been more effective in more sober style.—Yours, &c.,

THE PAN-ANGLICAN CONGRESS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I, as a Liberal speaker and worker of some years' standing, and as a subscriber to The Nation, express my regret at the unsympathetic and ill-informed article, entitled "The Weakness of Anglicanism," which appeared in your last week's issue? I say unsympathetic because your writer's complaint as regards the impulse towards reform is that the Church "follows society, and does not conspicuously lead it." Well, the circumstances under which society became interested in social problems certainly reflect no discredit on the Church, and if—as one well may do—one defines society as a congeries of churches, what happens when one compares, say, the general tone towards Socialism and social questions of the great Pan-Anglican meetings of June 22nd with that of the series of articles which such a representative Nonconformist paper as the "British Weekly" has lately been publishing on the subject of Socialism? Which of these two parties has its face more clearly towards reform?

And I say that the writer was ill-informed because his general idea is that the chief matter before the Congress is one of authority, and of relation between the Roman and Anglican Churches, which, as a matter of fact, was a side issue in an unimportant section; and because he states that "the Congress can hardly come to any dramatic decision as to unity," whereas the fact before his eyes was that the Congress existed for discussion and conference alone, and could not come to a decision on any point because no vote could be taken.

Finally, I would urge these two points. Whatever the attitude of the Liberal Party towards the English Church, it was quite unworthy of the leading Liberal weekly to take this cold and negligent attitude towards the largest representative religious conference ever assembled in this country, and to place the expression of its opinion in the hands of a badly informed and, presumably, Romanist correspondent. Secondly, that this attitude of contempt towards the Church means the indefinite postponement of all Liberal legislation. Whatever may happen when a gust of popular feeling blows, there are not enough non-Church Liberals to keep the Liberal Party in power. And that there are certain constituencies which never go Liberal simply means that in them the electors have been taught, sometimes by Tory squires and parsons, but much more often by the Liberal Press, that a Churchman cannot be a Liberal. I had looked to THE NATION to do something to root out this heresy, and I found its article on the Pan-Anglican Congress.—Yours, &c.,

The University, Durham, June 23rd, 1908. G. H. GODWIN.

[We print Mr. Godwin's letter, but we do not admit that the article of which he complains was "unsympathetic," and we are quite sure that the writer was not a "Romanist." As to the question of the Church's attitude to social reform, while we gladly admit a signal advance, to which, indeed, we refer elsewhere, we would ask what great social movement, from the abolition of slavery to the reform of the penal law and the Factory Acts, was initiated by the Anglican Church?—ED., THE NATION.]

THE PROBLEM OF MEDICAL RELIEF.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In these days, when so many schemes are being discussed for State support and relief of the poor, it is refreshing to read the letter from "G. C. C." in your issue of May 23rd on the above subject.

"Charity has somehow gone wrong" when you find that during last year there were more attendances in the out-patient departments of our great London hospitals than half the population of London. Of course, they were not so many separate individuals, but it may well be that "G. C. C." is correct in saying that "something like a million persons in London attended, practically saying that they were unable to pay for the smallest amount of medical attendance."

The sad part of it is that the hospitals seem proud of it, and each one tries to outdo the others by advertising the great number of their out-patients. But I do not quite agree with "G. C. C." that all these persons "say they are unable to pay." I believe it is the fault of the system rather than the fault of the man. The belief that hospitals are "free" institutions, open to the public, is almost universally held in London, and it is small blame if the belief is acted on.

But surely there is a better way, and one which should be universally preached—that it is the duty of all to lay by something for the inevitable day of sickness. The Metropolitan Provident Medical Association (5, Lamb's Conduit Street, Bloomsbury, W.C.), of which I have the honor to be chairman, has twenty-three provident dispensaries scattered throughout London, with a membership of over 30,000. For a payment of 6d. a month members can get the attendance of first-rate medical men, of their own choice, either at the dispensary or, in bad cases, at their own homes.

Besides these twenty-three, there are perhaps twenty or twenty-five other provident dispensaries scattered throughout London, and I trust that in these days of grave financial stress of the London hospitals there may be far more attention paid to these provident dispensaries than there has been in the past.—Yours, &c.,

POLICEMEN'S WEEKLY DAY OF REST.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Committee appointed by the House of Commons to consider this question has commenced its sittings, and everyone who wishes to see the police justly treated will take an interest in its proceedings.

When a man from the higher ranks of the artisan class thinks of joining the Force, he finds on inquiry that he has to give up fifty-eight days, or two months' holidays, in the year. He has to give up fifty-two Saturday half-holidays, which equal twenty-six days; Christmas Day, Good Friday, and four Bank holidays, equal six, and instead of fifty-two Sundays, he receives thirteen and thirteen weekdays, which mean a loss of twenty-six days. So that he loses 26 + 6 + 26 = 58 holidays.

There is no class of skilled labor whose duties are more dangerous or delicate, and that require greater courage and resource than the work of the police, and they have the right of equal treatment with their fellows.

In some of the counties in Wales it is almost impossible to get recruits.—Yours, &c.,

Poetry.

THE PINE BY THE LAKE.

By fair Killarney's greenest mead,
Long since, there grew a lofty pine,
Which well could serve a diver's need,
When boyhood's golden hours were mine.
For on one ample branch at eve
My giddy station I would take,
With shining body bared to cleave
The surface of that silver lake.

The summer sunset's fading glow
Dwelt on dark wood and fairy isle;
And forty headlong feet below,
I saw the beckoning waters smile.
A moment 'neath those flushing skies,
Glorying in youthful might I stood,
Then with tense limbs and covered eyes,
I plunged into the crystal flood.

The circling eddies sank to rest—
But I was in a darker world,
With groping arms and laboring breast;
Down where the nixie spreads her coils
Of water weed along the deep,
To seize and strangle in those toils,
The bold intruder on her sleep.

But I had found my earliest school
And kindest teachers in the wild;
The chill recesses of the pool
Had been my playground from a child.
And fearless could my practised strength
Yon dim and shadowy realm explore;
Till from its twilight depths at length
I rose upon the pebbled shore.

The pulses of that glorious strife,
Beat in my temples like a flame,
As swift and warm the tide of life
Rushed back into my glowing frame.
I seemed to breathe enchanted air:
A brighter azure shone the sky;
And every cloud that floated there
Swam in a heaven of ecstasy.

O youth! O passionate trumpet song!
O golden days, supreme, superb!
When life was like a courser strong,
Achilles' hand could hardly curb!
A higher and a deeper joy,
My hastening years may yet attain;
But not the wild heart of the boy,
And not his reckless bliss again.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

AN interesting feature in connection with the Edgar Allan Poe centenary next January is to be the revival of "The Southern Literary Messenger," the magazine which Poe edited, and in which so much of his best work appeared. We learn from an American source that the revived periodical will aspire to be the chief literary organ of the Southern States. Poetry, criticism, history, biography, and fiction will all be dealt with in its pages, and as a large number of Southern societies have promised to support the project, it will start under favorable auspices.

IN the meantime American critics are bewailing the downfall of the short story, the literary form with which Poe's name will always be associated. A writer in "Harper's Weekly" gloomily looks forward to the moment when the short story will "fall into class with the despised and rejected 'best sellers'—the modern cheap, flimsily-built novel." Of the majority of short stories this is already true. The demand created by the popular illustrated magazines has called into existence a mass of machine-made short stories which may be divided into less than a dozen well-defined groups, the stories in each group differing from each other in little except the names of the characters. But this is no ground for urging that the short story is a literary form doomed to early extinction. We have still amongst us M. Anatole France, two of whose short stories, "Le Jongleur de Notre-Dame" and "Le Procurateur de Judée," are among the finest short stories ever written. Of English writers there are Mr. Joseph Conrad, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Mr. Galsworthy, and Mr. Masefield, all of whom have produced work of a quality that shows the form is still a living and effective artistic medium.

THE discussion on "The Church and Literature," opened by Canon Rawnsley at the Pan-Anglican Congress, cannot be said to have dealt in any illuminating or effective manner with the subject. The spread of indecent books is a serious evil, but it has not yet assumed the proportions which Canon Rawnsley imagines. To say that "the sale of the nasty novel was not only developing, but neutralising education, poisoning the home, and endangering the very existence of the nation by tending to reduce the birth-rate," is a wild exaggeration. Pornographic novels form a very small proportion of the total output of fiction—certainly not more than the one per cent. at which Mr. McClure estimated it—and, were it not for the advertisement given to such books by well-meaning but scarcely judicious persons, their number would be even smaller. The Congress would, as the "Times" points out in an able leader, have done a service to religion and to life if, instead of concerning itself with minor evils, it had asked why the great books on our shelves are secular, and why the religious are so seldom great, save in their capacity as books of religion. It is a significant fact that the greatest imaginative writer of our time, whose books no member of the Congress would deny to be religious, is outside the pale of any orthodox communion. There is something wrong in the relations of the Church and literature when Tolstoy's services to Christianity are unrecognised by the Church.

THE Fabian Society is bringing out a new edition of the famous "Fabian Essays in Socialism," first published twenty years ago, with a new preface by Mr. Bernard Shaw which aims at co-ordinating the Socialist ideas of to-day with those expressed by the essayists. It will be remembered that Mr. Shaw was the original editor of the book. He contributed two essays to the volume, the other contributors being the late William Clarke, Sir Sydney Olivier, Mr. Sidney Webb, Mrs. Annie Besant, Mr. Graham Wallas, and Mr. Hubert Bland.

WE learn that Mr. George Moore is at work upon a book which, under the title "Hail and Farewell," will give his views of Irish life and society, the Irish literary movement coming in for special notice. The book will, we believe, take the form of an autobiography covering the period of Mr. Moore's stay at Dublin. As he met most of the figures who take a leading part in modern Irish life, and as Mr. Moore writes both with a free and a frank pen, the coming volume is likely to be of great interest.

"THE Sphere" announces that one hundred and thirty-eight new poems by Emily Brontë have been discovered in manuscript and that they are to be issued in a volume by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton within the next few weeks. This is a great addition to Emily Brontë's poetic output, since only about sixty of her poems have been published up to the present. Should the coming volume contain anything as fine as "The Stoic" or the famous "Last Lines," it will be a valuable addition to English poetry. Dr. Robertson Nicoll, who, according to the same authority, has nearly completed his biography of Ian Maclaren, is preparing an edition of "The Complete Poems of Emily Brontë," which may be expected in the autumn. These works, together with Mr. Clement Shorter's "The Brontës: Life and Letters," also announced for the autumn, will probably exhaust the amount of Brontë material still unpublished.

IN "The Magic Casement" Mr. Alfred Noyes has hit upon a delightful title for his coming anthology of fairy poetry. Anthologies have been rather overdone of late, but Mr. Noyes' idea is a fresh one. His choice will cover the whole field of English poets from Elizabethan times to our own day, and the right to print several copyright poems has been secured. The appearance in book form of the final section of Mr. Noyes' "Drake: An Epic Poem," may be expected during the autumn.

ALTHOUGH M. Maurice Barrès has long been a combatant figure in French political life, he does not intend to give up literature for politics. He has just finished a new novel, which is a sequel to "Au Service de l'Allemagne" and with that work forms part of a series of which M. Barrès formed the conception some years ago. "Colette Baudoche" is the title of this new novel. The scene is laid in Metz, and the book is mainly concerned with the fortunes of a young girl in that city. It will probably be published early in October.

A BOOK likely to provoke criticism is "The Hundred Best Hymns," which is to be added to Messrs. Routledge's series of "Golden Anthologies." The editor, Dr. Cullen, has made his own selection, but he has added in an appendix some thirty hymns that have been included by others among the hundred best. Most people will be inclined to think that Dr. Cullen's difficulty will not consist in excision. To find a hundred hymns that are even passable is a heavy task.

A VICTORIAN RADICAL.*

The active life of George Jacob Holyoake was, roughly speaking, co-extensive with the whole reign of Queen Victoria. He was born in 1817 in the troublous period succeeding the Napoleonic war, when the problems of modern democracy had as yet hardly been broached; he died in 1906 during the elections which resulted in the second triumph of Free Trade and the new Liberalism. In most of the great social movements which have reconstructed the industrial and civic life of England Holyoake played a part. A many-sided man of boundless energy, a participant in social work in London and the provinces, a keen journalist, an organising politician, he was one of the men who cannot be lost sight of in history. In a certain sense he was the embodiment of early Victorian Radicalism. History tells us vaguely of the thousands of working-men whose hardships and discontent nearly precipitated revolution at the time of the first Reform Bill, of the Chartist riots, and throughout the "Hungry 'Forties." There were thousands of poor men like Holyoake who endured and hated the tyranny of the industrial machine, of the Church, and of an oligarchic Government which stamped out the free expression of opinion; but history speaks of them en masse; at the most they are statistical figures, or the efficient causes of changes in government and new departures in policy. That is why the life of a man like Holyoake is important. He is one of the few in whom the many become individual and vocal. By his energy and personal character he rises head and shoulders above the rank and file of the agitators and their sympathisers who revolutionised England; but it is through him, and such rare men as him, that the rank and file become intelligible.

Mr. McCabe does not altogether realise this aim of the biographer—to show the man for what he was as an individual, and what he stood for as a type. Let us admit at once that his work is a peculiarly difficult one, for the life of Holyoake is very nearly the history of English democracy in a peculiarly complex epoch. From this intricate web of history the author has to disentangle the part played by his hero. It is no wonder that he often loses his way; that he sometimes repeats himself; that he goes backwards and forwards in time to the destruction of continuity; that he finds it hard to emerge from the mass of detail; and fails to emphasise the relative importance of events. The nature of Holyoake's work in the co-operative movement is never sufficiently made clear. Mr. McCabe gives us a scrap here and a scrap there, and leaves us, from his scattered narrative, to piece together for ourselves the real character and extent of Holyoake's work. And again, in reference to the occasion when Palmerston had brought in a Conspiracy-to-Murder Bill, directed against French refugees, when his huge majority and Government were overthrown largely through Holyoake's Anti-Conspiracy Bill agitation, Mr. McCabe admits that this "was the most triumphant piece of agitation in which Holyoake was ever engaged." Yet he dismisses the matter in two pages in the middle of a miscellaneous chapter! However, though the biography is confusing, poorly proportioned, and excessively bulky, the author is to be congratulated for the industry with which he has collected so vast a body of facts and the enthusiasm with which he throws himself into his subject.

We are reminded that Holyoake was born two years after Waterloo and two years before Peterloo, in the very year in which "the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended, and his Majesty's officers were empowered to imprison any subject they thought fit, without a trial." Though he himself, the son of an artisan, did not in extreme youth suffer from severe poverty, his life in Birmingham brought him into direct contact with the distress caused by factory life, insanitary conditions, dear food, and a repressive, inept system of government. One of the first things that impressed him was the discrepancy between religious professions and religious practice. Fined half-a-crown for being in arrears with the Church rate, his mother, alarmed lest the furniture should be removed, left her sick child at home, hurried to the office to pay, was kept waiting for five hours, and returned to find her child dead. Before he was twenty Holyoake had ceased to believe in the Christian religion, and he had come to identify himself with the Owenite principles of co-operation in industry and the improvement of material conditions of life as the best means of perfecting character. Here we have already in germ the principles which guided him throughout life; freedom from tyranny was his first rudimentary ideal—freedom from the captain of industry who controlled the bodies of his workmen, from the bigoted and generally ignorant clergy of his time who claimed to control the soul, and later, when he became a Chartist, freedom from the arbitrary decrees of a Government which was out of touch with popular feeling.

His regular employment at Birmingham he gave up when he found himself drawn to the study of social questions. He had already schooled himself in mathematics, science, and especially that "social science" which was anathema in the eyes of the authorities. At length he threw himself into the propagandist work of the Owenites and became lecturer at the "Hall of Science" at Worcester, which was the rendezvous of "the new moral world" in that city. His followers "met twice on Sundays for service in it. A few naturalist or humanist hymns (poems by Shelley, Elliott, &c.), and a reading from some edifying work, preceded the lecture." "They fraternised with the Chartists everywhere, and often worked in the anti-Corn Law movement." "Nearly a century ago," says Mr. McCabe, "Holyoake—> advocated infant schools of a kindergarten type (the first London infant school was founded by his disciple, Wilderspin, in 1820) and the legal suppression of child-labor; an eight-hour day for the adult worker; co-operation in production and distribution; the general diffusion of the elements of science and art; the corrective treatment of the criminal, and the reform of jails; the substitution of arbitration for warfare; greater freedom and a wider life for woman; the emendation of the divorce laws, the poor law, and the licensing law; the suppression of the national lottery; the collective ownership of the land; and the admission of Jews, &c., to Parliament."

Later, when the Owenite movement was decaying, Holyoake's colleagues sometimes reproached him for diffusing his energies over so wide a field, and not concentrating them on the general principles of the society. Mr. McCabe contends that he knew the movement was already decaying, and that he even hastened its end by putting forward other and more immediate reforms. In like manner, in the early 'fifties, it is suggested that Holyoake, by his insistent moderation, "precipitated the fall of Chartism," and that, "in his half-conscious acceleration of its dying he was acting in the spirit of progress." Holyoake was of too active and alert a mind to remain in one groove of thought when times and circumstances had changed. He cared more for principles than for methods, for the success of his objects than for worn-out party cries. Certainly, till the end of the 'fifties he continued to develop with the spirit of the time, and from being a revolutionary agitator readily adjusted himself into a constitutional Radical.

In the matter of religion, however, he never escaped from the natural prejudices of his youth. He had been only twenty-five when he had suffered imprisonment for expressing his views. In addition to our taxes, he had said, "we are charged twenty millions more for the worship of God. This is Utilitarianism versus Divinity, and I appeal to your heads and your pockets if we are not too poor to have a God? If poor men cost the State so much, they would be put like officers on half-pay. I think that while our distress lasts it would be wise to do the same thing with the Deity." He had been imprisoned for six months, and declared by a visiting magistrate to be the "worst felon in the jail and the most atrocious."

It is not, perhaps, surprising that he should have continued to be a militant atheist, or, as he preferred to call himself, a Secularist. He was driven into this position, not so much by an independent study of theology and philosophy, as by hatred for the exactions of the Church, of the privilege for which it stood, and the fact that it seemed to be in the way of moral and social reform. When some of these reasons for hating the Church were removed, his old hostility remained. The subject is the occasion of many interesting letters. One is from Mr. Gladstone. Another, of no less interest, from Mazzini, who writes:—

> "We widely differ as to the how and why. You, sir, are a Secularist. I can scarcely understand the word. Everything seems to me meaningless, worthless, unintelligible, unless it be a step to something higher usque ad infinitum, a line of the everlasting Power which extends from the depths of creation to God. You find before yourself a form of creed spurning earth, and you answer by spurning heaven. Heaven and earth are to me the two poles of the axis. I spurn neither. I want to relink them both. You reject God as a mystery. I feel myself surrounded by mysteries, life being the first of all. I do not pretend to solve them, but I cannot deny them. They are to me like rays coming down from far-distant stars, which neither naked eye nor telescope can now discover. You do not understand Immortality: I do not understand Death."

But if for the cry of "No Popery," Holyoake preferred to substitute "No Poverty," he remained true to his ideal. Flinging himself with all his energy into the promotion of the Radical cause through journalism, through lectures, through committees, whilst never forgetting the co-operative societies which he had help to start, or had encouraged, he championed in turn the cause of free speech, a free Press, and the freedom of foreign nationalities. In the course of time he became the friend of nearly all the distinguished people who were interested in progress and social reform. He was more successful in protest than in constructive work, so that he figured somewhat less prominently in the later Victorian period than in the earlier. At the end, in a hale old age, he remained a picturesque figure who reminded the world of the fierce conflicts through which this country had to pass before it secured its present moderate prosperity.

There is one serious neglect for which the author is hardly to be excused. Holyoake's letters are vigorous and interesting, but Mr. McCabe has cut them down to the most meagre proportions. We could well have sacrificed some of the new text for the convincing virility of the original letters.

THE STORY OF JERUSALEM.*

One has only to read the full title of these volumes in order to realise that they belong to the small class of books which cannot properly be reviewed except by an expert familiar with some restricted portion of their field or by a comparative outsider who is content to sum up the general impression which their eleven hundred pages leave upon his mind. In the latter case, the verdict is easily reached. Richter once observed that the German sentimentalism of his day "inculcated a universal love for all men and all beasts—except reviewers." Professor Smith is no sentimentalist, and he will probably have little difficulty in cherishing affection, even for his reviewers. Not many of them are fit, even were they willing, to trouble him. He has produced a work, not only rooted in scientific and historical research, but flowering with literary charm. It is a supplement to his standard volume on "The Historical Geography of the Holy Land," and the same combination of scholarship and verve distinguishes the later as the former work.

The first of these handsome volumes is devoted to the intricate and debatable problems of the topography, the economical and the political features of the city. The second volumes covers the chequered fortunes of Jerusalem from its capture by David down to the opening of the first century A.D. Most readers will regret that Dr. Smith has been obliged, by considerations of space, to stop short of the Roman siege in 70 A.D. It is to be hoped that the author has only postponed a treatment of this dramatic period. A third volume upon the story of Jerusalem under the Romans, from Titus to Hadrian, would form a singularly apt subject for Dr. Smith's historical imagination, and we trust that he will be persuaded by his publishers to embark upon this further and congenial enterprise.

Perhaps the uppermost feeling in the mind of a reader, as he lays down these volumes, is the comfortable sense of having been in the company of a trained scholar, who, for all his original contributions to the subject, has no private theories to push. Balance of judgment, in a subject of this kind, is rarer than width of reading. The geography of Jerusalem, in particular, has been a zone of contention for many years. But Dr. Smith has the courage to abstain, where necessary, from being ingenious or dogmatic at the expense of fairness. Thus, he declines to adopt any of the rival theories as to the site of Calvary and the sepulchre of Jesus. "It may disappoint some readers that I offer no conclusion as to this. But after twenty-seven years' study of the evidence I am unable to feel that a conclusion one way or another is yet possible, or, perhaps, ever will be possible." A similar temper of judicial caution characterises his discussion of recent criticism upon the Nehemiah period and of Professor Budde's metrical theory—to name but two instances, taken at random from different sides of the subject Professor Smith is too accomplished a critic to be the partisan of any school, and, however one may venture to disagree with some of his judgments (as, for example, upon the character of Jeremiah), the tone of his writing is octaves apart from those facile generalisations or outré exaggerations of detail which betray an untrained, ambitious writer. It is a great thing for an historian to inspire enthusiasm. It is greater to inspire confidence. It is greatest of all to inspire both, and Dr. Smith accomplishes this feat.

If any part of these volumes is to be singled out as of special value to modern students of political and economic problems, it is the section assigned to the industrial aspects of the city. Jerusalem became the capital of a kingdom, after starting as a petty highland town, fed by her local trade. She also gathered the worship of the nation gradually within her walls, so that her scanty resources, in water and finance, had to meet a double drain which only a site of greater economic fertility could be expected to stand. The problems of administration which thus arose form a topic of supreme interest which has been strangely overlooked, and they are allied to the internal growth of a strong democratic spirit within the city herself. Dr. Smith once more calls attention, in the latter connection, to the remarkable services rendered by the prophets with their protest against the unfair land-laws of the aristocracy and their religious support of all measures for the political enfranchisement of the masses. "It was with reason, therefore, that the pioneers of democracy in Europe appealed for their principles and sought their precedents rather in the Old Testament than in the New (which does not concern itself with the liberties of a nation), and chiefly in the history of Israel under the Kings. The pilgrim to Jerusalem from the free communities of the West, as he contemplates the few remains of her ancient walls or treads the great platform on which in face of the temple her people once gathered to listen to their prophets, and make covenant with their God, cannot but be stirred by emotions even deeper and more grateful than those aroused upon the Areopagus or among the ruins of the Forum. The student of the prophets, as he realises their equal insistence upon the Word of God, upon the need of strong and just rulers, upon the religious and economic rights of every common citizen, and upon the substitution for confidence in ritual of the ethical service of men, must recognise principles, of which all social philosophies and systems since constructed present only the fragments and details" (vol. i., p. 439).

It will be obvious, from this quotation, that Professor Smith's history, crowded as it is with the minutiæ of linguistic and archæological research, is more than a dry, detached piece of historical investigation. It is interesting, because, for all its stiffness and demand on the mind, it opens problems, civil and religious, which affect civilisation still. And the literary power of the author—the distinction and freshness of his style—has made it comparatively easy for the reader to travel untired through the rough, long passages of the city's story. The renderings of Hebrew verse are particularly fine. We have only space to cite that of Jeremiah ix., 16-21, but it will serve as a specimen of the author's skill in this department of his work.

> "Call ye the keening women to come,
> Send for the wise ones,
> That they hasten and sing us a dirge,
> Till with tears our eyes run down,
> Our eyelids with water. . . .
> For death is come up to our windows,
> And into our palaces;

ANGLO-IRISH.*

Since Tennyson's death there has been nothing in our imaginative literature to compare to the influence of the Irish spirit and the appearance of the Irish poets who use our language. Of course, they may say they have no more connection with our literature than the American writers have; but we should be sorry to assume that amount of separation, and, indeed, the Irish poets seem inclined to be generous, since they allow their work to be included in British anthologies like the "Oxford Book of Verse." What we shall do with the poems many of them are now writing in their own language is another question. Perhaps we shall all take to learning Irish for the pleasure of reading them, and that would be useful, too, if in ten years' time English is used over there only for business and tourists.

It is not so very long since Irish poets used to write English as a foreign language. In prose the Anglo-Irish have often been masters, but for verse they accepted an artificial style as properly poetic. Burns did the same when he was not writing Scots; and Moore, with all his real beauty and pathos, never entered the heart of the English as Wordsworth did, or even Byron. He has a false estimate of the value of our words, as all foreigners have, and even Mangan showed complete mastery of our language only three or four times. It is different now. No English poet uses English with more subtle intimacy than Mr. Yeats, the chief of Anglo-Irish poets, or than the Mr. Russell who writes as "A. E.," and some half-dozen more of the younger men. It is in prose that they are departing from the true genius of our language now; not that they have a false notion of English, but that, like Lady Gregory, they insist on deliberately writing it as though it were Irish, which it never will be.

Mr. Graves, who now publishes his collection of "Irish Poems," stands between the old and new—one hand stretched out to Moore, or rather to Lover, the other to Mr. Yeats. Every Irishman acknowledges his great service to his country's literature. He was a pioneer; he did the pioneer's rough work, and he shares the rough destiny of pioneers. After a life spent in trying to reveal the charm of Irish poets to a patronising audience that remained quite unruffled in its self-complacency, he now sees himself dragged along in the trail of a movement which has far surpassed anything he could have expected, or, perhaps, have wished. He describes these songs as written under the influence of the Gaelic Revival, and Dr. Douglas Hyde, whom Irish people delight to think of as the Craoibhin Aoibhin, is kind enough in his preface to say that the poems show a significant and suggestive change, which he traces to the growth of the Gaelic spirit. But, to our thinking, it is very seldom the change appears. Mr. Graves remains what he has always been, one of the most facile and charming writers of Anglo-Irish songs, a model poet for music, and so touched by a rather superficial side of the Irish manner that no one can wonder his verses are welcome in English concerts and homes. With what a swing his versions of "Awake, awake, Fianna!" or "The Return from Fingal" go to the old marching tunes, or his "Flight of the Earls" to "The Boys of Wexford"! And if you want an Irish story, told in the easy-going, old-fashioned canter, you can begin:—

"O, the happiest orphan that ever was seen,
Was Norah Maguire at the age of eighteen."

and so on. The poem has all the pleasant qualities that the English call Irish because they are so rare over here.

As to the versions from the real Irish language everything of the sort is of interest, especially if the poem has come down from the great days before St. Patrick arrived. Take this on coming winter, the original of which, we believe, dates from the age of Fionn, not much later than the time of Christ:—

"Take my tidings!
Stags contend;
Snows descend—
Summer's end!

A chill wind raging:
The sun low keeping,
Swift to set
O'er seas high sweeping.

Dull red the fern;
Shapes are shadows;
Wild geese mourn
O'er misty meadows.

Keen cold limes each weaker wing
Icy times—
Such I sing!
Take my tidings."

That is very pretty, but still we prefer Dr. Sigerson's old version, which keeps to the eight lines:—

"List my lay: oxen roar,
Winter chides, summer's o'er,
Sinks the sun, cold winds rise,
Moans assail, ocean cries.

Ferns flush red, change hides all,
Clanging now, gray geese call,
Wild wings cringe, cold with rime,
Drear, most drear, ice-frost time."

Mr. Graves does not know Irish, so that at best his versions are at second-hand. But that would not so much matter if it were not almost always, as we think, a mistake to translate the poetry of one language into the poetry of another, especially into rhymed poetry. Good as these versions generally are, and well as they sing, we should, for ourselves, rather have the bare and simple prose, as Dr. Hyde often gives it in his "Love Songs of Connacht." Mr. Graves has condensed a long Irish poem into four verses, one of which runs:—

"She is my glittering gem of gems,
Who yet contemns my fortune bright;
Whose cheek but glows with redder scorn
Since mine has worn a stricken white."

It is all clever—the way the middle rhymes are kept and all. But how much finer is the literal prose:—

"She is my treasure, oh, she is my treasure, the woman of the grey eye, she like the rose, a woman who would not place a hand beneath my head, a woman who would not go with me for gold."

There is an inner depth, a magic enchantment—something "on the phantom verge of things"—about Irish thought and in the recent Anglo-Irish poets to which Mr. Graves only seldom approaches, steady as his devotion to one phase of the Irish genius has been. As to the Irish, take two verses from Lady Gregory's prose version of an Aran girl's grief:—

"It is late last night the dog was speaking of you; the snipe was speaking of you in her deep marsh. It is you are the lonely bird through the woods; and that you may be without a mate until you find me.

"You have taken the east from me; you have taken the west from me; you have taken what is before me and what is behind me; you have taken the moon, you have taken the sun from me; and my fear is great that you have taken God from me!"

And for Anglo-Irish, remember any of the great lyrics sung by the poet of the "Rose of all Roses, Rose of all the World," or some of "A. E.'s," such as the verses of "Dana" beginning, "I am the tender voice calling 'Away.'"

Or, for another example of what the Irish spirit may do with the alien tongue, read the new little book of Miss Alice Milligan, one of the strongest of the new Irish singers. It is hard to choose, but among the best we should put "The White Wave Following," the two Wake Feasts, and "A Benediction"; or, perhaps, for best of all, "A Country Girl"—just a simple scene of what is called domestic service, with Ireland waiting at the table. Some of the poems ought to make us poor Saxons feel rather uncomfortable, but under the charm of a magic spirit in our own tongue we somehow forget to be Saxons, and savagely join in denouncing the oppressor. The separate verses do not quote well apart from the whole, but we may take the last stanza of a young man's Wake Feast:—

"They will praise your comeliness,
The strength of your hands,
Say 'There was not known his like
In nine townlands.'
They will not tell how nobleness
Had won you hate,
And that you had no praise of friends
Till now, too late."

"Its spacious imaginings move in a world as austere in its lines as the desert itself. But like the desert they have the grandeur, and at rare intervals a green oasis. In the latter scenes, especially, there come passages of a simple human beauty, like herbage round a spring in a bare land. We had expected magnificence from Mr. Doughty, but we do not know whether his moments of tenderness are not more impressive than his heroics. He has written a noble poem which will be welcomed by all who are worthy of an art that makes no concession to popularity."—Spectator.

AN HEIR TO STEVENSON.*

One of the many good reasons why critics have earned a bad name is their custom of dwelling on the demerits of a work, without giving praise to its quality. The more original is the quality, the less possible is it for criticism to convey it, and the critic, after using despairingly a few stereotyped phrases, such as "spell of romance," "elusive poetry," "haunting sense of beauty," hastens on gaily to point out at length the flaws in the author's conception, his weakness in construction, his faulty technique, &c.; and so, by the time the criticism is concluded, it is itself a lop-sided performance. In "Captain Margaret," Mr. Masefield has written a brilliant romance of a rare spiritual beauty, and, following their rule, it is likely that the critics will take the book's rare quality for granted, and enlarge on its unconvincing passages. They might, indeed, say to the author, "Why should your exquisite heroine, Olivia, have fallen in love with the repulsive blackguard, Stukeley?" "How is it possible that with this total disparity of their natures, she can continue to idealise him, when everything he utters on board 'The Broken Heart' is brutal, coarse, or violent?" And Mr. Masefield might reply that Olivia is blinded by her own loving tenderness, and that she reads her own virtue into her husband, where everybody else knows that he is base throughout. It is a poet's conception, this mating of a gracious and refined nature to a libidinous and boorish man, "with his handsome body, red face, and thick, black hair," who only "by the accident of birth is a gentleman," and Mr. Masefield may plead that we have all known such cases, and that, however inexplicable it seems that such a woman should continue to love such a man, the fact is that she does. But being critics, and so a little more than human, we object that, with this evidence of Stukeley's brutality, we have a right to demand at least one private scene between him and Olivia to show us how it is that his love does not revolt her. And this scene is lacking. It is a poet's conception we repeat, framed, perhaps, overmuch on the sharp contrasts of the Elizabethan poetic drama, but, as is often the case, the artistic blemishes are inseparable from the spiritual essence of the achievement.

For this reason we do not quarrel with the artistic instinct that has led the author to let his two chief characters, Captain Margaret, the dreamer, and Olivia, who, by rejecting his suit has spoiled his life, stand in the shadow, where they appeal to us as spiritual entities rather than as creations of flesh and blood. It is the idea—the compelling idea—of Captain Margaret's spiritual passion for the woman who has preferred the blandishments of a coarse blackguard to his own devotion, that is the core of the romance. And, as a subtle painting contains many gradations of tone, from high lights to faint shadows, so the depth of a romantic composition may, indeed, lie in its rich chiaroscuro. After laying the story down it is these half-shadowy figures, Captain Margaret and Olivia, that live strongest in the memory: they have captured our imagination the more because their faces all the time have been half turned away. They live as the inner heart of this voyage of "The Broken Heart," through the glimmering seas and palm keys fringed with reefs and blue, glassy breakers of the Spanish Main.

Romance is the essential spirit of "Captain Margaret," and the spiritual melancholy of the story is admirably set off by a series of brilliantly etched descriptions. Perfect in atmosphere and the illusion of hard reality is the description of Captain Margaret's farewell visit to the newly wedded Olivia in Salcombe town, and the pursuit of his ship, "The Broken Heart," by the boats from the harbour, one of which bears Tom Stukeley, Olivia, and their broken fortunes, and the other the King's officers. Captain Margaret takes the fugitives on board at his peril, and at Falmouth, where he touches and escapes arrest, he learns what it is he must conceal from the young wife—that her husband has escaped the gallows by boarding "The Broken Heart," which is bound on a trading and Empire-building enterprise to the Spanish Main. The scene is laid at the close of the seventeenth century, when the glorious days of the great buccaneers of Captain Morgan's type, have already passed, and only disillusionment awaits the settlers on the sun-steeped Samballoes islands, this blood-stained paradise. Apart from the credibility of Olivia's belief in her husband, and of the latter's overweening, unchecked insolence to Captain Margaret and his navigator, Cammock, the old buccaneer, the drama is perfectly developed, unfolding naturally, from the situation, with the crises admirably imagined and imaged. The scene in Chapter IX. of the farewell dinner given by the Governor of Jamestown to Captain Margaret and his guests, when the English mail comes in and Olivia learns what manner of man is her husband, is quite masterly. And after the ship has passed from the Virginian coast on the passage to the Samballoes, the quality of the narrative is rare and exquisite in beauty. Mr. Masefield is a poet fortified by a seaman's knowledge and experience, and where Stevenson, as an amateur, failed with his sea romances, our author succeeds. The last hundred pages that see Captain Margaret and his adventurers established in their little fort on Springer's Key, their enforced co-operation with the buccaneers, Captain Pain and Captain Tucket, in an attack on the Spanish town of Tolu, after Stukeley has turned traitor and prepared for them an ambuscade, are brilliant in color. The scene of the sack of Tolu by the drunken buccaneers, and their flight back to their ships is extraordinarily actual, a thing of to-day, not of two hundred years ago; and the sense of movement, of expectancy, of hurrying action shows a most sensitive perception and artistic skill. And here it is that the critic, perforce, fails to give any adequate idea of a book's quality, and must call on the latter to speak for itself, through the poor channel of a single, inadequate quotation:—

> "The days dragged by slowly. The 'Broken Heart' crawled like a slug, leaving a slug's track on the sea. The bells struck, the sails slaked. The sun arose greyly in mist, then turned the mist away, a spilling spring of light, in a sky like blue fire. Then in the glare of noon the chart was marked, the pencilled dot moved forward in its zigzag, past the Serranas, past Roucifs, past the Roucadores. Then the wind came fair for a few days to help her to the South, her bows in a heap of smother. Presently, when the first land-wind came to them, in a faint breath, smelling, as they said, of arnotto roses, there came drifting butterflies, white and blue, very lovely, settling and dying on the deck, like petals from a fruit tree in spring. A strange bird sailed past them, drooping her legs, her wings beating like a mill-wheel, rhythmically, her fierce eyes looking ahead, searching the sky. A tree trembled in their wash, rolling over and over. A creeper from the branches sank in the wake, its leaves like little green hands, clutching out, far down, among the globes of the bubbles. Then, when the sun was sinking, when the air was intense and clear, like the air in a vision, far ahead a bluish mist showed, so dimly, in such blue faintness, that one could not make sure. Till dark they watched it. When the dawn made each cloud a scale of scarlet, edged with fire to the mid-heaven, the mist took outline. Long before sunset the land lay clear, a long purplish line of land, with a gleaming peak or two, round which the cloud streamed. It stretched away on each side of them, like an army in rank. Parts of it were dim; its wings were dim; but ahead the hills were gathered close; one could count each fold in them. . . ."
> "They sailed past Golden Island, and past Sasardi, watching the color of the sunset on the rocks and woods. The brilliant birds flew homing, screaming. A faint smell, sickly sweet, came to them in puffs from the shore. Now and then, in the quiet, they heard the wash of breakers bursting on reefs. The noise kept them company at intervals through the night, as they drove on, under the stars, past Pinos, past Zambos Gandi, towards the point of San Blas. It burst upon them mournfully, like the blowing of a sea-beast, a wash, a breathing of the sea. When the dawn broke, flashing the flying-fish into silver arrows, they were at their heart's desire. The palms in the light air were trembling, in the light air, before them. The ring of reef on the key's north side stood up black amid the surf that toppled tirelessly. Pelicans flew past to fish. Macaws screamed from the fruit trees. Two Indians, with gold in their noses, waved to them from their canoe as they paddled softly, to spear cavally. Beyond them at anchor off the Key was a small sloop. Her men were filling water ashore, wading slowly up the beach with puncheons. Her saluting gun, fired by Cammock's order, made them gather together in a group."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The modern town of Liége has not, perhaps, the features of archæological interest that make many another city of the Netherlands so attractive to travellers. But the old principality, of which that town was the hub, was the scene of some of the most thrilling episodes in Continental history, and several of these are described by Mr. G. W. T. Omond in his "Liége and the Ardennes" (Black, 7s. 6d. net). Indeed, he devotes the bulk of his book to a historical retrospect, and in the last chapter only makes passing reference to the Belgian manufacturing town as it exists to-day in the sober glory of its iron works. Throughout the Middle Ages Liége was ruled and misruled by generations of Bishop-princes, St. Hubert having founded the Bishopric there about the end of the seventh century. Being virtually a buffer State, it received constant attention from the contending monarchs of this quarter of Europe, while the warlike spirit of its Walloon population, complicated by a pretty talent for treachery and, perhaps, a more than ordinary disregard of human life, further encouraged a condition of perpetual turmoil. Liége town had its darkest days in 1468, when Charles the Bold of Burgundy, exasperated by a constant series of rebellions, massacred the inhabitants and burnt the place to the ground. It arose again, however, to take its share in the wars of the Duke of Alva and of Louis XIV. In 1793 the principality was drawn into the vortex of the French Revolution and was annexed, the territory that had been ruled by Bishops since the seventh century being merged in four of the nine departments into which the National Convention divided the Austrian Netherlands. With that event, which was celebrated rather wantonly by the destruction of St. Lambert's Cathedral at the hands of the revolutionaries, its political influence ceased. Mr. Omond has made good use of his material. The dramatic tales of William de la Marck, "the wild boar of Ardennes," of the tragic banquet of Warfusée, and others illustrative of the wilder phases of feudalism, have a grimness that has rarely been equalled in fiction. Mr. A. Forestier's pleasant water-color drawings of Liége and the hills and forests of Ardennes form an effective and peaceful background to the spirited and interesting text.

So many severe things have been said about the business of diplomacy that a considerable number of simple people regard a diplomatist or a Jesuit as a man who, if need be, will accomplish his ends without punctilious regard for considerations of truth or honor. It was, indeed, a diplomatist, Sir Henry Wotton, who uttered the famous description of an ambassador, "an honest man sent abroad to lie for the good of the commonwealth." The phrase is quoted by Mr. T. H. S. Escott in his interesting book, "The Story of English Diplomacy: Its Makers and Movements" (Fisher Unwin, 16s.), but he adds that Wotton gave conclusive proof of his own integrity by returning to England a poor man after twenty years as English representative at Venice. It is difficult to separate diplomacy from foreign policy, and Mr. Escott's book might, with equal truth, be called a history of English foreign relations. This history is traced by Mr. Escott, particular attention being given to the evolution of our Foreign Office machinery. The greater part of the book is naturally taken up with the later eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries, and Mr. Escott is particularly informing when discussing the great personalities who moulded our foreign policy during that period. The most interesting chapter in English diplomatic history opens in 1782 when Fox was appointed to be our first Foreign Secretary. The antagonism between Fox at the Foreign Office and Shelburne at the Home Office is related, and there is a good chapter, "The Beginnings of Non-Intervention," dealing with Canning's career as Foreign Secretary. The book ends by a discussion of new views and ventures in which The Hague Conference of 1907 is treated and stress laid upon the informal diplomatic influence of King Edward VII. Incidentally Mr. Escott shows the absurdity of the rumours, usually current in the Tory Press on the accession of a Liberal Ministry, that Liberal diplomatists are unpopular at Continental Chancelleries. The book is a useful addition to the few works bearing upon the history of our diplomatic relations with foreign countries.

Dr. H. S. Lunn's "Municipal Lessons from Southern Germany" (Unwin, 2s.) contains a useful and interesting account of the visit made last year to several German towns by the British Municipal Society. Although German local self-government is far from perfection, and in constitution falls behind our own municipalities, a study of its administration can hardly fail to be profitable. Sir John Gorst, in an introduction to this book, praises the principles on which the local finance of German cities is based, the intelligent supervision exercised by the Central Government, and the system by which business is placed in the hands of expert administrators. About half of Dr. Lunn's book is given up to Frankfürt-on-the-Main, its educational system, town planning, street cleansing, and sewerage being considered in detail. There is also a full account of Munich, while Heidelberg, Mannheim, Königswinter, and Cologne are treated in brief compass. The book is thoroughly useful, and should be read by everyone who wishes to see how the problems of local government are dealt with by the country which has shown itself most progressive in municipal work.

The author of "Fox Hunting, Past and Present" (Lane, 3s. 6d. net), has attempted, and not without success, to write in popular form a brief history of English hunting from its commencement in the neighbourhood of Melton a century and a-half ago. The author estimates that no less than £9,000,000 is spent annually on hunting in this country alone. This sum includes the up-keep of rather more than two hundred packs of hounds, some of which represent a yearly cost of quite £10,000, and the maintenance of many thousand studs of hunters. Some interesting figures concerning the cost to the individual are given, and, considering the health and pleasure that hunting affords, it cannot be considered a very expensive sport. Three days a fortnight in a fair country can be comfortably done on about £80 for the season, while by riding a "screw," or hunting in an unfashionable neighbourhood, where the sport is often equally good, this figure can be materially reduced. The author finds room for a discussion of the feeding and conditioning of horses, the important question of saddlery, the manners and discipline of the hunting field, and the class of horse and country to select. The book also deals with cub and stag hunting, and concludes with some pertinent remarks on hunt subscriptions. There are eight full-page illustrations, which, while well reproduced, do not add much to the interest.

"From a Hertfordshire Garden," by Mr. W. Beach Thomas (Alston Rivers, 3s. 6d.), is the work of a keen lover of out-door life who is enabled to communicate to the reader something of his own pleasure in watching the habits of birds and animals, the growth of trees and flowers, and the effects of clouds and sunlight. A nature book written by one who is not an enthusiast makes tame reading, but is superior to the dreary attempts at word-painting in which many writers on nature subjects indulge. Mr. Beach Thomas is a close and loving observer. He is also a straightforward writer, and his book will be read with enjoyment by all interested in the subjects of which he treats. It is impossible in brief compass to review a book dealing with so great a variety of subjects. We can only assure the lover of open-air life that he will find in Mr. Beach Thomas an entertaining companion from whose hints he may learn to take his own walks abroad to better advantage.

If Dugdale's "Monasticon" is responsible for a good deal of the information contained in Mr. H. Claiborne Dixon's "The Abbeys of Great Britain" (Werner Laurie, 6s. net), the author is entitled to all credit for his painstaking and exhaustive treatment of a very big subject. Beginning with a brief introduction descriptive of British monasticism from Roman days to the Oxford Movement, he gives a concise account of every well-known abbey—and of many that are far less known—throughout the kingdom, grouping the subjects according to their localities. Probably monasticism, as a religious and educational factor in our national life, reached its most flourishing state during the two centuries that followed the Norman Conquest; but it should not be forgotten that Saxon legend attributed the foundation of Glastonbury to St. Joseph of Arimathea, and that, dubious as this particular ascription may be, there is historical evidence for the existence of religious houses in the third and fourth centuries, while several of our most famous abbeys, such as Lindisfarne, Jarrow, Whitby, Sherborne, and St. Mary's, York, enjoyed a previous existence as places of importance long before the Danish invasion of the eighth century. Broadly speaking, the monasteries of Great Britain fall into two classes, the first consisting of those established previous to the Conquest, and the second of those founded by the Cistercian and other orders, who were drawn in the wake of the Normans from the Continent. "The former were national houses—in every way belonging to the English people and untouched by Papal influence; while the latter, which were under the immediate control of the Bishop of Rome, were essentially of foreign foundation." At the Dissolution, English and foreign monasteries were alike destroyed, but it is a fact, and rather an interesting one, that the abbey churches that were spared were generally of pre-Norman origin and English foundation; many of them serve the purpose of parishes churches at the present day. Some of these abbeys have a twofold interest. The Cistercian house of Buckland, founded as a religious establishment in the thirteenth century, was eventually reconstructed as a manor house, and became the home of Sir Francis Drake. Similarly Newstead, on the borders of Sherwood Forest, was transformed in its later days into the private residence of the Byron family. The volume is full of entertaining historical anecdote, and its illustrations, reproduced from careful wash drawings, form a useful accompaniment.

A Novel-Reader's Guide.—"Pauline." By W. E. Norris (Constable, 6s.). A pleasant example of Mr. Norris's careful art and competent style. Pauline, the heroine, is sympathetic and engaging, while Lady Drake is an amusing creation.—"The Heart Line." By Gelett Burgess (Grant Richards, 6s.). A long and rather incoherent story exposing the frauds of spiritualism and palmistry, written in the American language.—"The Door of Darkness." By Maud Annesley (Lane, 6s.). A clever adaptation of the theme of the Wandering Jew.—"Lady Lee." By Florence Warden (Werner Laurie, 6s.). An effective example of the sensational novel.—"The Passion of Paul Marillier." By Adeline Sergeant (Methuen, 6s.). A readable story abounding in incident, with a strong love motive.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, June 19.	Price Friday Morning, June 26.
Consols 2½ per cent.	87¼ ...	87 13/16
German 3 per cent.	82 ...	81½
Russian 5 per cent.	95¾ ...	95½
Great Eastern Railway	69¾ ...	68
Union Pacific Railway	150⅝ ...	147⅛

Although the last Stock Exchange account showed a pretty general depreciation in the value of securities, this is assigned by most people to temporary causes, the chief being the large volume of new issues, and the fact that many people will not realise until the beginning of July, when their bank accounts are made up, how little they are getting in interest on their deposits. Everything points to money remaining cheap and plentiful for a long time to come, and good harvests in the United States and Canada should put a little more confidence and renewed enterprise into the New World.

The Last Account.

The set-back in stocks was quite general, though special causes could, in most cases, be assigned for relapses that occurred. With the exception of London and North Western, which rose a point, most Home Railways were from 1 to 3 per cent. lower. American Railways suffered more, owing to the bad traffics and reduced dividends. The renewed difficulties of the Erie created momentary consternation; but there are signs of recovery, as a feeling exists that in Mr. Harriman's hands the line might be pulled round like the Union and Southern Pacific. Grand Trunk stocks fell heavily on the traffic decreases, which have been enormous, and must continue until the crops begin to be moved.

Russian Finance.

The weaker tendency of Russian bonds is caused by a vague dread that the new loan will be a very large one, and also among the few who know the real state of things by a perception that the Government of Russia is still postponing, and therefore making worse, the evil day of reckoning. The annual interest on the debt already amounts to forty-one millions, and the expenditure on both army and navy is still growing. The Duma has evidently been squared both as to the Amur Railway and the naval programme, and there is no money for either of these futile projects, except what the thrifty French peasant can be induced by the banks of Paris to contribute.

The New Canadian Loan.

While Canada's revenue falls her expenditure grows, and she is now borrowing money in England, partly to bounty-feed her unsuccessful industries, party to finance new railway projects. The total amount of the new loan is £5,000,000, at 3¾ per cent. interest, and the price of issue £100 per cent. The Bank of Montreal, the financial agents of the Government of the Dominion, is authorised to offer to the holders of the £3,648,500 outstanding Four per Cent. bonds and stock, due November 1st next, an extension at 3¾ per cent. until May 1st, 1912, and is further authorised to offer for subscription in cash at par 3¾ per cent. bonds to an amount sufficient to make up, with the extended bonds and stock, the total of £5,000,000. The loan is redeemable at par May 1st, 1912, so it will be seen that it is only a short dated issue, not very attractive to ordinary investors. However, it is a gilt-edged security, and holders of 3¾ per cent. bonds and stock will have the option up to September 30th, 1910, of conversion into 3 per cent. Inscribed stock, 1938, on the basis of £106 of that stock for every £100 of the present loan, which is a rather valuable option from the investor's point of view. The loan is, of course, mainly for the purpose of providing for maturing obligations, and only £1,350,500 represents new borrowing.

The Outlook in the United States.

Although, owing to the low stocks of wheat, the foreign trade and general business of the United States are at a low ebb, the outlook is considered promising by so good a judge as the financial editor of the New York "Evening Post." At the moment, as he points out, foreigners are holding off buying orders, because wheat prices are still high and they expect a decline. "But the strong probability is that all the wheat raised throughout the world will be wanted at prices that will pay growers a good profit, although the demand may not come until August or September. There have been years when the foreign buying did not start until late in August, and some of the best-informed speculators are not now anticipating any heavy foreign buying until that time. After that period, they believe that there will be a steady demand, and they expect that Europe will take as much wheat the coming twelve months as in the twelve months past, which was 196,000,000 bushels, from America, including Canada." The writer continues:—

> "What such results would mean to our foreign trade, our home consumers, and our internal trade, needs no demonstration. A small but steady improvement in the business situation is already noticeable. It can hardly be said that it was noticeable until the last ten days, but since that time has become perceptible to keen observers. A few optimists who are trying to talk a boom into existence, rather than permit it to work out in the regular way, are predicting all kinds of rushing prosperity for the autumn, after the conventions get through, and the harvest is over. Those who are able to see conditions clearly, however, do not look for any boom. Their verdict is that the growth will be slow but permanent."

One factor that is bringing around a change for the better is the progress made in the heavy liquidation that has been, and is still, going on in the manufacturing and jobbing industries. Large stocks have been almost worked off, and distributers are down to a point where they are in the market for small lots of goods. True, American merchants are buying frequently rather than heavily, and seem to prefer to go slow and await election results, as well as the harvest, before taking any large chances on the future. A couple of weeks ago, however, when this forecast was written, more advance orders were being placed than at any time since the beginning of the year.

Whisky and Soap.

Comparisons for the Curious.

Doctors, Scientists, and others have had much to say of late on the subject of Whisky, and its effect on the health and—the pocket. But is not the question also worth considering in its relation to Soap?

Here is a comparison: The cost of only a single glass of whisky a day will average, say, 2/4 a week. Now the use of Pears' Soap for the same period will not cost more than Twopence. As a comparison of economic results the difference is great.

A comparison of personal effect shows a similar disproportion. The delight of Whisky, however good the brand (even if it's Dewar's), is only for the moment, or, at least, for but a short time; whereas the beneficial effect of Pears' Soap is spread over a prolonged period.

Whisky is for internal application, Soap for external, and here again many curious comparisons might be drawn. To sum the whole matter up into a nutshell: Let your taste for Whisky be what it will, don't forget to use—

Pears' Soap.

Diary of the Week.

The Shah continues faithful to the Russian model. All Persia is now under martial law administered by Colonel Liakhoff, the Russian Cossack chief, at his absolute discretion. In two rescripts the Shah puts all the blame on the Societies, the newspapers, and the Megliss, summons a new Parliament of "upright, pious, and patriotic deputies" to meet three months hence, and pardons all "suspects," except those who are to be tried by a special court. Meanwhile, arrests are being made by the hundred, the soldiery are looting shops and palaces, a host of Nationalists have been executed, and the sufferings of the prisoners in the royal camp exceed "those of the Prophet's family at Kerbela." The British Legation in Teheran is still surrounded by troops despite repeated protests. In Tabriz the Nationalists have been fighting with some success, but Rahim Khan, a bandit chief, has entered the town to vindicate law and order. There has been a direct interchange of telegrams between the King and the Shah—an episode the correctness of which Sir Edward Grey will have to justify, all the more because the news of it first leaked out from a German source. The "Times" Teheran correspondent, whose telegrams have been singularly brilliant, reports the general belief there that the coup d'état is due to the activity of Russia and the inactivity of England, and that the activity of Colonel Liakhoff is a breach of the spirit and the letter of the Anglo-Russian agreement. The Octobrist section of the Russian Press openly boasts of the part Russia is playing in Persia; it calls the profession of neutrality a "superfluous pretence," and declares that Russia must keep a pro-Russian Shah on the throne. All this is a heavy discount on the policy of the Convention.

It is practically certain that in a few days the Tsar and the Kaiser will meet in the Baltic. The interview has been kept dark, and appears to have been hurriedly arranged, facts which gain increased significance because the Tsar's meeting with the Kaiser comes just before that with the French President. Germany is losing no time in countering the Reval interview and securing that there shall be no triple entente with its point against her; while Russia is evidently as eager not to abandon the traditional special friendship with Germany. It was significant that on Monday the French Socialists moved to limit the President's Baltic tour to Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. The motion was rejected by a large majority, but the debate was a demonstration of the feelings of a good section of the French people towards the Russian autocracy; while the Persian troubles are knocking much of the cement out of the Anglo-Russian understanding.

Lord Curzon raised a debate on Indian policy, in the House of Lords on Tuesday, in a speech calculated, though not designed, to embarrass the Indian Government in its relations with the Ameer, with the Anglo-Indian community, and with the Indian people. He hinted that the Ameer disliked the Anglo-Russian Convention, which is quite possible, that he had dictated the terms of the Dane Treaty, and that he might have been privy to the letting loose of Afghan tribesmen on our border. As to the internal unrest, Lord Curzon's policy was practically that which Lord Morley compendiously described as "martial law and no damned nonsense." He thought the Press Act should be strengthened, and its procedure made more summary, and declared that Sir Bampfylde Fuller's resignation had "taken the heart" out of the British service. He denied that the Indian Civil Service was becoming harder to the natives, but admitted that it might be growing more ignorant of their language and ways, and thought the Japanese victories had deeply touched the race-pride of an Eastern people. It was notable, however, that, while approving the partition of Bengal, Lord Curzon was for minimising his personal responsibility for its form, which he threw upon Lord Ampthill, the Acting Governor-General, and Lord Midleton. This waiver was promptly thrown back upon him by the noble Lords in question. Furthermore, Lord Curzon favored a policy of associating the Indian people with our Government "in wider and more responsible functions than are now open to them." The same line was taken by Lord Cromer, who declared for a "moderate policy of reform," and laid special stress on the necessity for a scheme of primary education; by Lord Lamington; and, in a very impressive speech, by Lord Courtney.

Lord Morley's reply needs careful reading, but we unhesitatingly pronounce it to be the utterance of a convinced and determined reformer. It had one disappointing passage, that which seemed to close, so far as he was personally concerned, the question of the partition of Bengal. But Lord Morley added that the matter was administrative, and that he could never see why its detailed arrangements should have been regarded as "sacrosanct." He quoted with emphasis Lord Minto's saying that "no anarchical crime would deter him from meeting the political aspirations of honest reformers," and added that if the Government were turned from reform by bombs and the "blind fury" of extremists, they would disappoint not only the Indian moderates but a great mass of Anglo-Indian opinion. We are glad to see that he definitely foreshadowed an Indian Reform Bill, to be presented to Parliament in the Autumn Session. This is an announcement of vital importance, for the National Congress meets in December, and an Act of Reform, proclaimed on the fiftieth anniversary of direct Imperial rule in India, will do much to fix and color the character of the Indian movement for representative institutions.

The Old-Age Pensions Bill passed through the Committee stage on Wednesday under the rule of the guillotine, the Prime Minister consenting to re-commit it in order to discuss the new sliding scale of pensions (which we correctly described last week), and to fix a time-limit to the exclusion of paupers. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has shown remarkable skill in piloting the Bill, but Mr. Balfour's conduct of the Opposition can only be called unscrupulous. It has consisted, as Mr. Lloyd-George said, in moving "wild, illogical, irrational amendments" with the special object of enlisting sympathisers, to whom the Tory Party can say, "We voted for you, but those wicked Radicals voted against you." Thus Mr. Balfour, who said that the Government were proposing Old-Age Pensions without providing the money, voted for adding some millions to the cost of the plan, and after favoring a contributory scheme, voted for the inclusion of paupers.

On the latter point we note with pleasure that the Chancellor announced a large concession. The exclusion of the pauper class is not to be indefinite; it is to cease on December 31st, 1910, when presumably the new Poor Law will have come into operation. Medical and surgical relief is also to be exempted. The sliding scale to which he has assented, practically equalises, we regret to see, incomes ranging between 8s. and 13s. a week, and thus cuts off the incentive to exertion within those boundaries. The scale prepared by Mr. Holt, which is on the lines of that proposed by The Nation, seems far preferable. For the rest the Opposition proposed to exempt from the calculation of means sums received from trade unions or friendly societies, and when the absurdity of limiting exemption to this kind of income was pointed out, Mr. Chaplin proposed to except all kinds of provision for old age, sickness, or infirmity. The Ministerial Party held firmly together against these tactics, which were partly obstructive.

The "New Protection" which was to give the Australian workman some of the benefit of the tariff by partially withdrawing its advantages from bad employers, is dead. The Federal High Court has pronounced it ultra vires as encroaching upon the powers of the States and discriminating between States. Mr. Deakin insists that the Government is committed to the policy, but it cannot now be carried out without an amendment to the Constitution. The incident is certain to affect the character of the future South African union. Federalism is suspect there, and now that American experience is justified by Australian experience, the conviction will be strengthened that the Federal system not merely perpetuates the wrangling of the States, but puts serious difficulties in the way of legislation, particularly of social reform.

The Women's Social and Political Union have resumed the sensational and semi-violent tactics which many of their friends would like to see suspended. As the result of a Convention held in the Caxton Hall on Tuesday, a deputation of thirteen ladies was sent to wait upon Mr. Asquith to hear his further views on the Suffrage question. On the Prime Minister refusing to see them, the heads of the Union brought about a kind of demonstration in front of the Houses of Parliament. This consisted in the main, not of women, but of men and boys "out for a lark." Various bodies of Suffragists penetrated it, one party being shut up in a closed pantechnicon van, while others clung to the railings before Palace Yard, and had to be torn away by the police. As Lady Grove said, it is contrary to the law to walk in procession to the House of Commons, and it is a prime interest of democracy that a Sovereign Parliament should not be liable to invasion by mobs.

At the meeting at which this fiery propaganda was set on foot, the Union defined the limited character of its political aim in a resolution calling on the Government to give votes to women who "possess the qualifications which now entitle men to vote." We can only point out that the true motto of such a society is not "Votes for Women," but "Votes for as few women as possible," and that the bulk of married women and working women who associate themselves with this special form of the movement can receive no benefit from it, but only, as "R. N." points out elsewhere, an indirect disadvantage. This point is the more important inasmuch as when the twenty-nine Suffragists who were arrested came before the police-courts on Wednesday, one of them, Mrs. Leigh, who, with Miss New, had broken the Prime Minister's windows, admitted saying that "it would be a bomb next time." Now, bomb-throwing may lead to murder, and whatever may be said for violence in politics, we cannot think that it can be seriously defended when, not the liberty of a people, but the giving of political rights to a small and mostly well-to-do class, is in question. Such conduct and language are, therefore, deeply prejudicial to the women's cause. At the same time, we greatly deprecate the continued decision to treat these ladies, two of whom were sentenced to two months' imprisonment without the option of a fine, as ordinary criminals.

We are glad to see that the Committee of Members of Parliament who are working to secure the denunciation of the Brussels Sugar Convention continues its activity. A valuable contribution to its work has been issued by the Free Trade Union. This is a reprint of Mr. Lough's article in the June "Contemporary," with an appendix giving the monthly prices of sugar for the last ten years, prepared by the Board of Trade. This table is a clear guide to the merits of the controversy. It shows that in the four years before the Convention, between 1899 and 1902, the price of sugar gradually decreased from 10s. to 6s. per cwt. The Convention was signed in March of the latter year, and since that date prices have gradually risen. During the succeeding six years there have been only two occasions in which the quotations fell (1d. and 2d.) under 8s. per cwt., and the price gradually rose to an average of 11s. $4\frac{3}{4}$d. in 1905 and 10s. 10d. in the present year. This clearly exhibits the great success from its promoter's point of view of the Brussels Sugar Convention. It has practically doubled the price of this necessary food and raw material to the people of the United Kingdom. It is no wonder, therefore, that it should have caused a considerable decrease of consumption.

Steps of, perhaps, greater importance are being taken inside the House. A few days since a petition was circulated requesting Mr. Asquith to receive a public deputation, and when this had been signed by some fifty members it was sent to all the unofficial Free Trade members. Up to the time of our going to press two hundred signatures have been added to it. So far as we can judge Free Trade feeling is unanimous against the continuance of the Convention. The object of this petition is to secure that the Government will either denounce the treaty on September 1st, or else submit the matter to the House of Commons in such a form that a vote can be taken upon it. We strongly hope that Mr. Asquith, who has shown himself keenly sensible of the movement of opinion in his party, will not resist this appeal. Possibly he is unaware of the circumstances under which the Free Trade members agreed to the withdrawal of the motion set down for March 26th, 1906, by Mr. A. H. Scott, the member for Ashton-under-Lyne, in favor of denouncing the treaty. We understand that Mr. Scott was only restrained from taking a division on that occasion owing to his having received a clear assurance from the late Prime Minister that the treaty would be denounced, and that a private intimation to that effect would immediately be given to a certain foreign Power. The report of the debate is quite in accordance with the recollection of members upon this point, as not a word was said, either by Mr. Lloyd-George or by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, both of whom spoke, inconsistent with denunciation. The sole point that they urged against a division was that it was discourteous to the Powers to announce the decision of the United Kingdom eighteen months before it was necessary.

Fighting has taken place this week in the province of Coahuila, in Mexico, but so strict is the censorship that reliable information as to its meaning is not to be had. The official version is that there has been another raid by Mexicans from across the United States border, who have now been scattered and hunted down. The district in which the fighting has taken place is, however, some 200 miles from the frontier, and the raiders have had a strategic purpose, for Terreon, their objective, is the junction of two Mexican trunk lines from north to south and west to east. Further, the Mexican Government seems seriously alarmed, for many thousands of troops have been poured into the disturbed district, and the loyalty of some of these seems to be doubtful. On the whole, "revolution" looks a more exact description than raid, and a revolution is a serious and now a striking event in Mexico, where for many years the iron hand of President Diaz has kept the peace.

On Wednesday the Linnean Society held an interesting celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the reading of the famous paper by Darwin and Russel Wallace "on the tendency of species to form varieties and on the perpetuation of varieties and species by natural means of selection." The venerable Dr. Wallace was present to explain how, in a measure, this key to the doctrine of evolution came independently into his hands and those of Darwin. The idea had occurred to Wallace "in a sudden flash of insight" during his stay in the Celebes Islands. When he communicated it to Darwin he found that his "flash" had found lodgment in Darwin's brain nearly twenty years earlier, and the idea had been privately worked into a consistent theory, supported by an immense body of facts. So Dr. Wallace insisted, with his famous simplicity and modest charm, that the proportion of merit was not to be equally divided between Darwin and himself, as Leverrier and Adams divided the honor of discovering Neptune, but that the shares of merit were as twenty years to one week. It is curious that the theory of evolution thus started seems to have held rather more firmly in the theological than in the scientific world.

The Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Daylight Saving Bill has issued a strong report in its favor, backed by a great body of commercial and industrial opinion of almost all types, coming both from employers and employed. Considering the various proposals for giving the British community more enjoyment of the sun, the Committee recommend the simplest of all. Greenwich mean time is not to be interfered with, but from the third Sunday in April till the third Sunday in September of each year all British clocks should be put forward one hour. The change would take place at two o'clock in the morning, which would then count on the clock as three. On the third Sunday in September the clocks would be moved back again one hour. Thus we should begin work one hour earlier, and have one hour more of sun for play, or outdoor life, in the season when Nature seems to invite us to such a habit. The "Times" objects that as the Bill would not be compulsory, great confusion would arise, because some clocks would be changed and others not. But it ignores the body of evidence which shows that society could easily organise a universal habit. The public services, the banks, the great manufactories and shops, would set their clocks forward, and all the smaller organisations would follow suit. Moreover, the Great Eastern Railway, with its large Continental traffic, does not think that any dislocation of it would ensue. A little thought is all that is necessary.

There has been a considerable set-back to the movement in France in favor of the abolition of capital punishment. The Government has had to abandon its Bill to that effect, the Committee which examined it being hostile, and there being a prospect of its rejection in the full Chamber. This change is due to popular resentment at the action of M. Fallières, who will not inflict the penalty of death, in commuting the sentence on Soleilland, a brutish criminal, and to alarm at the recent increase in the number of charges of murder. The President probably went on a report by the Commission of Pardons on Soleilland's mental state, but opinion in France is now thoroughly frightened, and as long as it remains in this state, the death penalty will subsist. The local councils have petitioned for its continuance and a plébiscite in a popular quarter in Paris has yielded an overwhelming majority for retention. Meanwhile, the Senate has wisely passed a Bill making executions private, and probably the best solution would be to give the jury a discretion as between death and penal servitude.

On Thursday afternoon the "Country in Town" Exhibition at the Whitechapel Art Gallery was opened by the Poet Laureate, who gave an address on the moral and physical advantages of a country life. A novel and interesting feature of the Exhibition is a model of an open-air school in its natural surroundings, the "gardening" of the latter being cleverly carried out so as to suggest a clearing in a pine forest. Whilst in Germany this type of school has been in use for some time, it was not till last year that the County Council made the first English experiment on a site at Woolwich. Since then two others have been opened within the London radius.

AN UNTOWARD INCIDENT.

THE untoward incident of the exclusion from the Royal Garden Party of four members of the House of Commons, one of them, it is suggested, on account of a vote on the policy of the King's visit to Reval, and two others, it seems, on the more general ground of their attitude to public questions, cannot, we think, be dismissed without reference to the important and established constitutional doctrine which it seems to controvert. One of the four members was the leader of the Labor Party in Parliament; another was a Liberal member distinguished for character and ability, closely associated with the late Prime Minister, and less directly connected with the Court. In both cases there appears to be no disguise of the fact that the members were excluded, in one case on account of a silent vote, in the other on account of a vote and of speeches. Mr. Keir Hardie has already expressed his discontent, on constitutional grounds, with this act. Nor, we all agree, can anyone acquainted with the theory and practice of the Constitution defend what amounts to an interference, slight and indirect it may be, with the privilege or the status of a member of the House of Commons. In seriousness the disability inflicted does not, of course, compare with the conduct of George III. in striking Fox's name from the list of Privy Councillors, or his dismissal of the Duke of Grafton and Lord Rockingham from their Lord Lieutenancies for political action of which he disapproved. The penalty inflicted on Mr. Ponsonby and Mr. Keir Hardie was purely social. But it was none the less real. Had a selection been made from the more eminent members of the House, or from those personally known to the King, no question of invidiousness could have arisen. But the circumstances were widely different. The invitation was general; the exceptions very few, their cause was known to the three members who were expected to read in them a sign of displeasure with action taken on the floor of the House or elsewhere on matters of public policy.

It will, no doubt, be said that it is ungracious to criticise the social action of the King in a field in which his discretion is absolute, and in which his quality of tactfulness is conspicuous. But any suggestion of Royal censure on a member of Parliament, on the ground of having acted in a way personally displeasing to the King, revives an old seed of bitterness in English history. The moment the question assumes this shape, we see how indefensible such action appears, no matter how slight or conventional the form it may have assumed. The vote of Mr. Ponsonby concerned the Reval visit. That visit was paid on the advice of the King's Ministers. They alone were responsible. "The King," as Erskine said, more than a hundred years ago, "can perform no act of government himself." He has no policy, either at Reval or anywhere else. Therefore, he escapes all criticism from all parties, who concentrate themselves purely on members of the Executive. The suggestion that he can of his own instance dispense rewards or punishments on account of votes in the House of Commons revives the theory of a "King's party," and recalls George III.'s rudeness to Whig lords at the Levée, or the wording of the famous communiqué to Lord Temple, who, on the India Bill, was authorised by the King to say that whoever voted for it was "not only not his friend, but would be considered by him as an enemy." The consequences of such a reversion to Georgian times would be that now, as then, the King would be criticised and condemned, that his personality would be thrust into party conflict, and he would be quoted as the supporter or the opponent of this Government or that measure. On one or two occasions Queen Victoria, in her early, middle, and later life, nearly broke through the constitutional veil, and proclaimed herself a partisan. But she never quite emerged in this character, and the King receives in full strength the now old and firm constitutional tradition that he has nothing to do with government, and is merely an impartial organ and witness of action flowing from the Executive and from a Sovereign Parliament, whose members are free men, answerable only to their constituents.

No one, least of all the King himself, seriously desires to alter or to modify this happy position. For it is easy to see how conspicuously the Crown has gained by it. Here we are in the full flood of democracy, with a Republic established in the largest English-speaking community in the world, and in the most civilised European nation. Yet there is no Republican party in England. It has ceased to exist. Why? Partly, perhaps, because, under the forms of democracy, a kind of worship of splendid tradition goes on. But also because the Crown, following the general law of our constitutional development, receives the form and pressure of the times, and yet retains its special character. The political energies and interests of the nation are allowed to flow into the party and Parliamentary system, and the King sits apart, sheltered from all responsibility for errors that drive Liberal or Conservative leaders from power. So far as we know, his tact and long experience of the world and of his country have rather emphasised this view of the Monarchy, and only now and then a foolish, flattering voice has spoken of him as if he were his own Foreign Minister. But it is quite possible to conceive that in the future some young Monarch might come to the throne who, without the King's knowledge of affairs, or his tact and instinctive penetration of character, might aim at reviving Georgian ideas, and by disparaging—let us say—Radical statesmen or measures, revive the notion that the King favored one party and disliked another, and, again following George III., try to re-establish some semi-demagogic connection with "the masses." No more distracting influence could arise in our State. Such a King could only be served by the worst and the weakest, for the atmosphere of a Court can rarely be sincere, and an innovating Monarch would, in our free country, attract only pushing wealth and time-serving ambition. All the strength and honesty of the nation, as well as its most unsettled or extreme elements, would be diverted from the Crown, and politicians would begin to look to some weak form of the Presidential system, not inconsistent with the power of the Cabinet and the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. For the peculiar grace of the Monarchy, its smoothing and conciliating power, would be gone. His Ministers could not trust their King any more than George III. or George IV. was trusted. And such a rule would be impossible in the modern State. An English King could no longer command the power of appointment, of rewarding friends or disgracing enemies, that his predecessors possessed before the party system was thoroughly organised and the command of patronage shifted from the Monarch to the Prime Minister and the responsible heads of the great Departments. The penalties he could inflict would be purely social and very trivial. And it would not be worth while. All that the nation now demands from the Sovereign is a certain reticence, a willingness to substitute indirect influence for the direct power from which the forms and necessities of modern Government bar him out. Someone has blundered in the matter of the Garden Party, and the responsible official, with his long experience of the House of Commons, should have guarded the King from a course sure to arouse the keen jealousy which Members feel of interference, from whatever quarter it may come, with the free expression of their opinions. The incident is merely a distracting one. But it is disquieting, because it was as unexpected as, to use Bagehot's metaphor, would be "a volcanic eruption from Primrose Hill."

POVERTY AND THE STATE.

For better or worse the main lines of the Pensions Bill are now settled. For financial reasons the Government have not felt themselves able to accept all the suggestions which they admit to be of value. But we should be less than just if we failed to recognise that on the three main points here selected for criticism they have gone a long way to meet us. A sliding scale has been adopted—not the best, as we think, but still a sliding scale. By next year it is probable that the experience of the Friendly Societies will have suggested the advisability of modifying it on some such lines as those that we have shown to be necessary in the interests of thrift. The character test has not been wholly excised, but all words of general reference have been omitted, and it has been reduced to an industry test, which will probably come in the long run to a practical compulsion on the poorer classes to join some thrift society. Finally, paupers have not been included this year, but the disqualification on this ground is explicitly limited to two years. We can therefore accept the Bill as an honest experiment, and a valuable instalment, and we do so the more readily for our sense of the unscrupulous tactics of the Opposition. Mr. Balfour, whose record on the whole question is one for which another statesman would blush, is not ashamed to oppose the Bill as a whole on the ground that it is non-contributory, and to court popularity by advocating its extension in detail without the smallest regard to expense. In this case, at least, we think that the public will put its own construction on Mr. Balfour's bid for support.

The Pensions Bill is admittedly a beginning, and it is only as a beginning that its passage in its present form could be desired. It lays the foundation of a broad scheme for removing the aged poor from the position of a dependent pauper-class. But supposing this result completely achieved it would be in turn only one part of a still wider problem. For the solution of this problem the Government awaits the report of the Poor Law Commission, which, we fear, is not likely to appear this year. But it is fully time to pass in review some of the general considerations by which the Government's policy will be guided. More than seventy years have passed since the lax administration of the old Poor Law was replaced by the strictness and economy of the Poor Law Commission. The crying need of those days was to expose the demoralising consequences of well-meant, but misguided, benevolence. It was necessary to preach the virtue of industry, thrift, and self-reliance as against that inverted form of Socialism which placed the responsibility for the poor upon the rich. As compared with the flesh-pots of dependence, the bread and water of economic freedom was worth winning, though it meant a hard struggle and a spare life.

But in a term of seventy years we have made some little advance. The problem has changed and new questions have arisen. The old reformers believed that all who sought work could find it. We know that that is not always so. The old reformers believed that wages found their own level by natural processes. The State might interfere with the healthy action of these processes, but it never interfered to good effect. We have found as the result of the experience of two generations of competition, and of two generations of experiments in dealing with competition, that the whole case is vastly more complex. We have seen large classes of labor rising through trade unionism, through co-operation, through Free Trade in goods and the State regulation of labor, to a considerable degree of material comfort and economic independence. We have seen other classes left behind, and the careful work of statisticians is available to tell us pretty accurately how large those classes are, what is the measure of their need, and in some degree what are the causes of their failure. We have been forced to recognise that it is through no special failure of character, but through the hard, blind operation of grinding economic forces, that some thirty per cent. of the people of the richest country in the world live in a condition of poverty—of such poverty as allows them barely food and house-room for an average family, and no surplus for any other object of expenditure. We have come to recognise that the conditions of poverty tend to maintain and accentuate it, that insufficient food, and bad, unhealthy dwellings breed a race of ill-fed, undersized children; that the struggle for life shortens the education of these children and throws them on the streets to earn their own living when they ought to be acquiring a trade; that the bad sanitary conditions with which the poor must put up sap the vigour which might have redeemed them from poverty, and stimulate the desire for drink which deepens their poverty; that, in fine, in the words of General Walker, "economic injuries tend to perpetuate themselves." Now among the poor, as in all classes, we find wastrels, shiftless, useless, semi-criminal. Inherited wealth shields such men. Poverty reduces them at once to pauperism. The pauper who is such by character needs discipline and severity. But we are mistaken if, for the sake of discipline to the pauper, we allow widespread social evils to perpetuate and extend themselves. The truer principle is to insist on decent conditions of life, on adequate provision for the children, the sick, and the aged, and to punish idleness, not by leaving it to wallow in its misery, but by setting it to work under discipline.

In many cases the whole theory of responsibility is at present misapplied. Take, for example, the case of children. The child may be ill-fed, ill-clothed, ill-housed, through the fault of its parents. That may be a reason for punishing them, but it is not a reason for letting the child continue to go hungry. It is not the child that is responsible. The suffering is vicarious. By punishing the parents through the child the State is guilty of a confusion of ideas, and it practises a short-sighted economy. For the result in all probability is that the child will grow up an undersized man of impaired physique, who will never properly take his place in the industrial ranks. To secure the proper nurture for children is a matter of the highest importance, not merely from the point of view of the suffering child, but of the society into which the child is born. The true line of advance here is not to diminish, but to raise, the standard of parental responsibility. The parent ought to feed the child, but the State ought not any longer to be content with saying so and then passing on to its other business. It is truer to say that the parent ought to feed the child and the State ought to see that it is fed; it ought, at the same time, to know why the parent has failed in his duty, and to deal with him according as his failure arises from causes which he can or those which he cannot control. If inability to find employment is the cause, it may be necessary in the end to send a man to a labor colony. But the children ought to be kept free from any pauper taint, and the mother, if she keeps the home well, is doing the main economic work that society demands of her.

We may be sure that more liberal provision for the children and for the sick, and we hope also for the unemployed, will be attempted in the coming Poor Law reform. One of the conditions of improvement is that while the treatment of idleness is made more definitely punitive, the help given to the deserving poor will be removed, like old age pensions, from the taint of Poor Law associations. It is probable, in fact, that the Guardians will come to an end. Their position is undermined, as was that of the School Boards in 1902, and we hope that more good will come from the change in this case than in the former. But in any case we may be pretty sure that the Liberal Party must scan with the utmost closeness any proposals for removing Poor Law administration from the hands of representative bodies, and making paid officials the pivot of the new treatment. The expert official is a god out of the machine to some social reformers. All difficulties are to be left to his judgment. All control of public affairs is to be gathered into his net. The less he is made responsible the better, for he is responsible only to our ignoble selves, who by right have nothing to do with him except to pay his salary and everything he demands. For our part, if we ever come across the heaven-sent being whom the "expert" seems to some minds to incarnate, we shall fall down and worship among the first. But officials, as we know them, are much like other people, and on the whole do their work very much better when liable to criticism and subject to supervision and dismissal. We do not think the treatment of poverty ought to be broken up into a number of bureaux, each with its own official god, with pigeon holes complete. We think rather that, complex as it is, its various departments need considering as a whole, and fall naturally to the control of the representative local authority. The expert is a good servant, but the representative is his proper master.

THE DESTRUCTION OF A MYTH.

It used to be a matter of reproach to us that we were unwilling to learn anything from the experience of foreign nations. This insularity has yielded much in recent years, if it has not altogether broken down. Latter-day reformers are constantly thrusting before our faces the example of other nations who are superior to us in certain arts of industry, of education, or of government, and there has been a wide consensus, almost a conspiracy, to hold out for our especial envy and instruction the efficiency of Germany. Now these comparisons of Great Britain with Germany are exceedingly profitable in many ways, for Germany has indisputably shown in the last generation an unusual capacity for development in many of those arts of industry and government in which we have been pioneers. Largely profiting by our example, she has advanced since 1870 from a state of almost medieval industry to a foremost place among the great manufacturing and commercial nations, developing with persevering energy her hitherto neglected natural resources, establishing a fine system of transport and of free exchange within her imperial boundaries, and bringing to certain new industries a better scientific equipment than any other nation in the world. In some factors of modern efficiency, particularly in certain branches of technical instruction and public administration, we recognise that we have much to learn from her, and we are learning it. This growing ability and willingness of one nation to learn from another we account the most conspicuous testimony to the growth of a world civilisation, with its central idea, that of a society of nations. The notion, which foolish and short-sighted persons are continually seeking to inject into the public mind, that the progress and prosperity of Germany, or indeed of the United States or any other country, are injurious to our own progress and prosperity, is precisely the most pestilent and poisonous untruth that can haunt the diseased imagination of man. That nations live for ever in a constant struggle for supremacy, seeking each to gain for itself the largest share of a limited world-market, and of a restricted aggregate of powers, is a practical denial of the meaning of humanity or of the possibility of peace. Supposing it be true, and there is much evidence to support the view, that Germany and the United States, starting at a low level, have increased their national output of wealth and their foreign commerce at a faster rate than this country during recent decades. Why is this to be a sorrow or a detriment to us? Our own internal resources and activities cannot be impaired by the success of others, and so far as we have dealings with them we must suck great positive advantages from their progress. We should feel ashamed to repeat such testimony to the obviously co-operative character of trade, were it not that a great party in this country has committed itself to a view of politics and industry based on the assumption of an inherent antagonism of interests between nations, and in particular between this nation and Germany. If Germany were actually outstripping us in the race for wealth, if her industries were "booming" while ours were dwindling, if her workers were fully employed, higher-waged, better fed, clad, and housed than ours, as they are sometimes represented to be, it would still remain our best policy to cultivate the closest and most amicable relations with a more productive country and a more efficient people than ourselves, so that by the freest access to German goods, German methods and ideas, we might best supplement our own comparative indigence.

In point of fact, neither in her national finances nor in her industrial prosperity can Germany show any such superiority as has been pretended. The best measure of the strength and the wealth of a nation is the condition of its working classes. Now, all reasonable doubts as to the comparative prosperity of German and English workers have been resolved by the important document just issued by the Board of Trade as the result of a close, prolonged inquiry made by able investigators into the wages, prices, rents, and hours of labor of workers in typical trades in the chief industrial towns of Germany. The general result of this investigation, covering thirty-three representative towns, is to show that "in German towns the workmen engaged in these trades receive about 17 per cent. less in money wages in return for a week's work of about 10 per cent. longer duration than the corresponding English workmen. In other words, their hourly rate of money remuneration is about three-quarters of the corresponding English rate, while the cost of food, rent, and fuel (measured by the English standard) is about one-fifth higher." Among the many tables upon which this conclusion is based, one of the most instructive is that comparing retail prices in England and Germany, in October, 1905, of articles of prime importance in working-class consumption. Of these articles, sugar, butter, potatoes, flour, milk, beef, mutton, pork, bacon, coal, and oil, two only—potatoes and milk—are cheaper for the German; nearly all the others are from 20 to 40 per cent. dearer. For wheaten flour the German must pay 40 per cent. more, and his meats cost him from 20 to 25 per cent. more. It is most significant that the only two articles which are cheaper are articles which in neither country are appreciably affected by outside supplies. For every article the supply of which is, or might be, increased by foreign imports, the German workman is heavily fined for the advantage of the landlord and the farmer. Coal is a quarter dearer, oil a third dearer than in this country, a striking testimony to the joint influence, direct and indirect, of tariff and cartels. If account were taken of metal and other manufactured goods, there is every reason to believe that the balance of disadvantage against the German workman would be even heavier than is indicated by the food budget. It is not so easy to understand why rents should be so much higher in Germany, but it is not possible to question the validity of the result of this close investigation, to the effect that "the workman in a German town pays for housing accommodation about one-quarter more than the workman in an English town, for the same number of rooms, exclusive in both cases of taxation."

A recent report from our Consul-General in Berlin has been widely quoted to indicate that, since 1905, the rise of prices imputed to the new tariff has been accompanied by a more than corresponding rise of wages. But the Board of Trade statistics make it very clear that, though other prices may not have risen much since 1905, the price of the German staff of life, rye-bread, has risen twice as fast as wages, inflicting a very serious damage on the poorest classes of the people. A number of subsidiary facts and figures go to make it evident that the standard of living of the German workman, though providing approximately the same amount of nutrition as the English, is less varied, and contains fewer elements of "relish." Farinaceous foods, other than bread, sugar, jams, and other grocer's foods, are far less used by the ordinary working-class family in Germany. Altogether, it is abundantly clear that the "prosperous German workman," held out by Protectionists as the beneficiary of a "scientific tariff," has to work considerably longer hours, for considerably lower wages, and can buy considerably less with his wages. Finally, the myth of his superior security of employment is completely demolished in a short Appendix dealing with the question of the comparability of German and English statistics of employment. Altogether a most informing document, not likely to induce British workmen to quit this country in order to try their fortunes in Germany, or to vote for an experiment in German scientific tariffs as a method of improving the condition of the working population of this country.

THE CHARACTER OF THE LONDON POLICE.

The London police have deservedly been popular with several generations of Londoners. This relationship of cordiality and confidence between police and public is, we think, nearly unique in the experience of capital cities. The Parisian policeman is courteous and very intelligent, but in times of disturbance he is excitable and may run into violence and brutality, and is far from being trusted among the working classes. His colleague of Berlin is detested and feared, even by the middle classes. There are some obvious reasons why the London policeman should present this favourable contrast. He remains, in spirit as at law, a civilian in spite of his uniform, and his powers are much more carefully limited. But even in his case the working of the causes which make a disciplined police in every country a possible source of danger to society cannot be altogether absent. The spirit of comradeship, the consciousness of danger, the natural contempt for the type of humanity with whom they are most often in contact, must tend to breed a sort of regimental morality among the police. There is always the temptation to support every other man in uniform, by testimony or by violence, against every man out of uniform. Magistrates almost invariably trust their evidence, while that of the accused, usually a poor and unskilful man, is insensibly discredited by the mere fact that he stands in the dock. The governing classes, moreover, are always on the side of the police, if only because they are the professional defenders of property and authority. Given these conditions of opportunity and temptation, the least biassed student of society and human nature would expect to find in the records of any police force a certain percentage of misconduct. We confess that the report of the Royal Commission, issued this week, has taken us somewhat by surprise. For a general vindication of the London police we were all of us prepared. They deserve it. But a report which admits only eight cases of misconduct in the records of recent years of a force which numbers 17,000 men, is a startling, if a welcome, document. A perfection so unblemished is scarcely human; a system which calls for no modification of any consequence is unique in the history of English institutions.

The inquiry opened in the most fortunate way possible for the police. But for the D'Angely case it would never have been held at all. That case was the occasion for much alarm and suspicion in the public Press and in Parliament, and it ended in the completest vindication for which any body of men could have wished. After this beginning, some reaction there must have been in the mind of the Commission against newspapers and organisations that had accused the police on so slender a basis of fact. The other conspicuous case, however, stands on a different footing. Most of us remember clearly enough the broad facts of the affair in which Dr. Gerothwohl and M. Lavalette were complainants. Here there are two stories, each possible, each internally consistent, and of which one or other must be not merely untrue, but a deliberate and elaborate invention. If we believe the police, these two gentlemen, both educated men of position, one of them a University professor, joined arms on Boat Race night with a pack of rowdies, including a little Cockney groom, swept along the pavement of Piccadilly in a drunken and disorderly state, and were very properly arrested there for their conduct. If we believe Dr. Gerothwohl, they were not arrested in Piccadilly, but followed the police to the station in order to protest against the violent and unjust arrest of the groom, a complete stranger to them. If the second version is true, there has been something like a conspiracy of lying on the part of the police. If the first version is true, there lies a grave charge of malicious libel against these two gentlemen. There seems hardly a possibility of mistake. If a man who says he was arrested in Vine Street Station was really arrested in Piccadilly, he has certainly lied. The Commission has handled the case at great length, and with much forensic ability. The case for the police could not have been better put. The conclusion is to exonerate them, and consequently to dismiss MM. Gerothwohl and Lavalette's story as untrue. We have read the argument with care, and confess ourselves unconvinced. If these gentlemen had been drunk, as the police state, their alleged rowdyism and subsequent inaccuracy would be just intelligible. But the one point on which the Commission differs from the police, is in deciding that they were not drunk. On that assumption, it seems to us, the whole police story becomes almost unintelligible, and incidentally the constables, the inspector, and the surgeon, who all adhered to the theory of drunkenness, are partially discredited as witnesses. The affair is now more than ever a mystery. We have to explain how it came about (1) that two educated men, who were sober, behaved on a given occasion with no regard at all for their own reputations, or for the decencies of life, and (2) thereafter showed the keenest concern for their reputations, and developed what looks like public spirit in an effort to unmask an alleged injustice. The theory of an original chivalrous intervention is at least consistent with their subsequent conduct. The theory of hooliganism plus sobriety seems to demand a miracle in human conduct.

We have dwelt at some length on this case, partly because it was the most important which the Commission had to investigate, and partly because it throws a slight doubt on the total result of its inquiries. Here, clearly, the facts have baffled the Commission, perhaps because they are themselves inextricably obscure. In many of the other complaints there is less difficulty, and the police were clearly in the right. In others, again, we find ourselves asking whether, if the complainant had been an educated man, the Commission would have found the police story so plausible. The Commission admits that there has been an appreciable amount of bribery by bookmakers. It is also a fact within the personal knowledge of good witnesses that the police receive free drinks from publicans, and, on a much more limited scale, that they have been found to take money, or blackmail, from prostitutes. Doubtless the heads of the force do their utmost to minimise these evils by changing the personnel of the constables who cover the more vicious quarters, or even by transferring a whole division where it has been found to have thoroughly lost character and uprightness. In this sphere there is a natural tendency to laxness in the police, which the Commission find, on the whole, to have been well kept under. They are not cruel; they live, on the whole, in good human relations with the people, and, as our ears and eyes assure us, perform an immense number of acts of unsolicited kindness and helpfulness. But it is human nature that a class which deals with the under-world of a great capital should take on some taint from the association. A wise Commissioner has this fact in view, and keeps a steady outlook on it.

LORD MORLEY'S INDIAN REFORMS—III.

The Mischief of Over-Centralisation.

In his Budget speech last June Lord Morley dwelt on the "great mischief" of over-centralisation, and promised an inquiry into the working of centralisation in India, and how the mischief might be alleviated. A French Abbé long ago described the symptoms of this disease: "Your centralisation is the apoplexy of the centre and the paralysis of the extremities." This medical metaphor is not inapt as regards India. By means of our great centralised departments we draw the blood out of the village communities, and force it upon the central brain, that is, the Viceroy. Thus it is that the Viceroy suffers from official apoplexy, a congestion of work, of power, and of responsibility; while the village organisation, which under native rule was full of life and energy, has been paralysed—atrophy is following disuse. The Commission appointed by Lord Morley has now completed the promised inquiry, and will, no doubt, soon report. In the meantime, let us consider how, by a better distribution of the vital forces, the sufferings of the patient may best be alleviated.

In order to put the problem into concrete form, I will take the part of India I know best, that is, the Presidency of Bombay. The factors with which we have to deal may then be stated as follows: (1) The Viceroy, as representing the Imperial Government; (2) the Government of Bombay; (3) the Collectorate of, say, Poona; and (4) any village within that Collectorate. Now there are two ways of approaching the question of decentralisation; from the top, or from the bottom. We may, of course, begin with the Viceroy, who is the roof and crown of things; and work downwards, devising a scheme of artificial devolution. But in building it is better not to begin with the roof. The wiser plan is to begin with the foundations, and also, if possible, we should found our house upon a rock. Now happily in India we have bed-rock ready to our hand. It is to be found in the ancient village communities, the little rural republics which contain within themselves 80 per cent. of the total population, and have always formed what Dr. Max Müller called "the political unit or social cell" of India. Fortunately, through the writings of Sir Henry Maine and others, the British public are familiar with the main features of the Indian village, as the home of organised thrift, of mutual support, and the domestic virtues. Also the Indian village has proved to be the one element of stability and recuperation throughout the violent convulsions of Indian history. This was well emphasised by Sir Charles Trevelyan, formerly Governor of Madras, in his evidence before the Select Committee of 1873: "The foundation of Indian society," he said, "is the village municipality; that has been the salvation of India. One foreign conqueror after another has swept over India, but the village municipalities have stuck to the soil like their own Kusa grass, which they liken it to; it is a kind of grass which it is impossible to tear up by the roots, because it grows in bunches, and they say that the village constitution is like that grass." But it is not only in a great crisis of war or of famine that the value of the village system has been shown. For the villagers, working under their natural leaders, and with the aptitudes inherited from past ages, can manage in their humble way every department of business required for their local wants: The collection of the land revenue, the settlement of disputes by arbitration, the detection and prevention of crime, the trial and punishment of petty offences, the management of the communal forests and pastures, the distribution of water from the irrigation tanks, public charity, the care of travellers, and so forth. All these duties were in old times excellently well performed by the Patel or Headman, acting under the authority of the village elders, and carrying out his orders through the hereditary village servants. In order to be prosperous and happy all that the village community asks from the central power is to be taxed in moderation, and according to custom; to be protected from external violence; and to be let alone in the management of their internal affairs.

Unfortunately, this last condition is exactly the one which an active bureaucratic administration, framed on European models, will not willingly accept. Accordingly, during the last half century, great centralised departments have been organised, and have gradually, but irresistibly, taken out of the hands of the villagers each and all of the functions connected with the village administration. The name of these great specialised departments is legion—revenue, survey, police, public works, forest, excise, salt, irrigation, education, registration, sanitation, vaccination, and others. These have their headquarters at a distant Presidency town, far beyond the reach of the villagers; they act in accordance with rigid and uniform rules; and in the villages are represented by ill-paid and ill-controlled subordinates, each of whom considers himself entitled to the submission and services of the village authorities. Thus under British rule the village organisation has been crushed and superseded; and these little strongholds of ancient local custom and self-government find themselves undermined and shattered by a machinery which they cannot resist, an unseen enemy more powerful and more destructive than Mogul, Mahrata, or Pindari.

The first step, therefore, towards a beneficial scheme of decentralisation is to reconstitute the village organisation. The second step is to reconstitute the administration of the Collectorate. Under the native governments to which we succeeded, the villages were grouped together for administrative purposes, some three or four thousand villages being included in a "Zillah," or Collectorate, which was the unit of the Imperial administration, having its head-quarters at some notable town, such as Poona. A chief officer was appointed to each "Zillah," and to him were delegated all the powers of the Government over the villages within his area. This was the system we inherited from our predecessors, and it was continued under our English collectors in the early part of our rule. But it soon became evident that this could only be a transition stage. The collector could not possibly be an expert in all the branches of the administration, and, accordingly, specialised departments were organised, as already described. As in the village so in the Collectorate, an imperium in imperio was thus created; all administrative functions were gradually usurped by the specialised departments, and the authority of the nominal head of the district was reduced to a mere shadow. No wonder Lord Morley is told that the district officers have lost their influence.

How can a restorative process be best carried out? The method is indicated in the Minority Report of Lord Welby's Commission, which recommends that British districts should be administered on the model of a well-administered native state. The British Collector would be the "Raja," he would be provided with an experienced Indian colleague, who would correspond with the "Divan" or Prime Minister; and so long as they carried with them the assent of their local representative council, contributed their quota to the Imperial exchequer, and conformed to the general principles of British rule, they would be given a free hand to realise the revenue in the ways least irksome to the people, and to develop the resources of their little kingdom on the lines best suited to its special conditions. Any subordinate of the centralised departments deputed to serve in a Collectorate would take his orders from the Collector and his colleague, reporting on technical questions to his own departmental chief. Such a joint administration was carried on, with the happiest results, in the State of Bhaunagar, during the minority of the young Raja, by Mr. Percival, of the Bombay Civil Service, and his wise and experienced colleague Divan Gaurishaukar, C.S.I. They jointly exercised the powers of the "Durbar"; and at the end of their term they handed over the State to the young Raja, having a contented people, and a full treasury, besides having provided a bountiful water supply for the State, hospitals, and other public works. Why should not the Collectorate of Poona enjoy the same peaceful development as the State of Bhaunagar?

If, under a decentralisation scheme, the village and Collectorate are reconstituted on a sound basis, a real foundation will be laid for the well-being of the people. The form of the superstructure is less important. But in settling the financial relations between the Imperial and Provincial Governments, it should be borne in mind that, as a rule, provincial expediture is the more beneficial, being directed to internal improvement, whereas Imperial expenditure is mostly unproductive, being directed to objects of foreign policy and military preparedness. If, however, Lord Minto desires to distinguish his term of office by a practical measure of decentralisation, which will gratify the national sentiment and endear him to the people of India, he will propose the restoration of the old Province of Bengal with a Governor in Council, giving to Assam, Behar, and Odessa Chief Commissioners with representative Councils and extended powers.

Life and Letters.

THE SAMENESS OF FASHION.

The sense of the sameness of modern "fashionable" life, vividly expressed in the new number of the "Hibbert Journal" by M. René Gérard, is never more present than than during the seeming variety of the London season. What we appear to see in this great annual show is a kaleidoscopic glitter; what we really discern is a pattern of rather drab monotony, the separate figures of which are as much alike as the little red taxi-cabs that dive in and out of the medley of London traffic. Thousands of hotels, drawing-rooms, bedrooms, boudoirs, smoking-rooms, tables set out for meals or ornament, furnished all alike in a style imitating refinement, but always characterless; thousands of women dressed after a very few models supplied from Paris, their male companions still more closely resembling each other; their plays, songs, pictures, and novels, constructed on about half a dozen kinds of artifice; dinner-table talk, all running on one tone, tea-table talk on another, or on a slight alteration of pitch; the commonplaces of greeting, meeting, parting exchanged on fixed lines; the same curt slang on the lips of men and women; the popular newspapers echoing the thought that their conductors imagine reflects the common mind of all classes—peers and peeresses, shop-boys, City men, clerks, tradespeople—these are the signs and characteristics of the crowd which thinks itself distinguished.

From this mass all idea of an aristocracy is eliminated, an aristocracy either of intellect or of manners. This is effected by the power of money to simulate exclusiveness of taste, possession, habit. Thousands of houses can now be filled with copies or imitations of famous or beautiful styles of pictures, pottery, furniture, "antiques," "art" productions of every kind. Skilled service, no longer the possession of the few, can be hired by the parvenus of all the civilised Continents. True culture—the power of receiving and assimilating ideas—is necessarily absent from such a society, and is, indeed, repugnant to it. But the counterfeit of culture is everywhere. Opinions on all subjects are, as M. Gérard says, entertained by all the members of the crowd. They are turned out ready-made, like its objets d'art, and have the same neat, formal, affectation of truth. Apparently refined talk, apparently refined entertainments, apparently refined presentations of actual life on the stage, abound. The aim is everywhere material. The illustrated papers which these people affect have lost their old artistic character, and now deal only in photographic reproductions of events, scenes, or personalities, the latter chiefly Royal or titled or soi-distant artists. These figure in thousands and thousands of pictures every week, though all the men and women in the country, except perhaps some unlettered countrymen, know what their appearance is like. The whole body lives under a form of mob-law, mysteriously conveyed by a few Mahatmas of its faith, sitting in dim corners of the Rue de la Paix, and re-written from year to year as to certain of its minor articles. Within this code only slight variations of speech, dress, or habit are permitted.

The plan of life of the fashionable crowd is a simple one. It is based, as M. Gérard says, on "a limited circle of immediate and tangible satisfactions, which can be bought with money." These enjoyments must be constantly renewed and multiplied. Intellectual or æsthetic pleasures, which require study, reflection, careful examination of ideas and objects, are set aside. But as true variety can only be obtained by such means, the riches of Nature and the mind being inexhaustible, the pleasures of "smart society" are necessarily few and monotonous. Thus it converts its favorite city resorts into likenesses of each other. London gets more and more like Paris, Paris more and more like London. Homburg and Marienbad, Cannes and Biarritz, are all built on the same plan, or grow into it, yielding the same, or nearly the same, small daily scheme of pleasurable devices. All society plays golf and bridge. It all talks at once on the same person or subject. This year it is Maud Allan's dancing; a few years ago it was Arthur Roberts's songs; a little later, among a more restricted and partly refined crowd, it was Wagner's music-dramas. One season society rides in green-painted motors; next year it affects red; and each fancy in turn seems instantly to carry with it a certain inevitablity and rectitude, and to make all other preceding fancies seem absurd, or even wrong. And as artificiality proceeds, so the elements of true enjoyment lessen. The pleasure of charity, or of helping others, is denied the crowd, for this again is regulated as part of the great science of amusement, and all opportunity is barred of hearing about the characters, experiences, and sorrows of their fellows, with the enrichment of knowledge and feeling that such communications bring. Thus the running of motors takes the place of the driving of horses, and the accompanying joys of watching the paces and habits of these animals, supplying their wants, tending them in sickness. So many places are visited that none are seen in their essential differences and characteristics. Not the owners, but their gardeners, plant and enjoy the flower-settings they just see in week-end rushes of varied excitement. An empty business absorbs them, the eyes being so fully occupied that the mind and feelings hardly act, and everything seems alike, and moves past in a blurred mass. Character, too, suffers. It is impossible, for example, to imagine our aristocracy producing to-day types so original or beneficent as Lady Huntingdon, or Mrs. Fry, or even the great ladies of mid-Victorian drawing-rooms. The stamp of commonness is increased by the way in which all the "fashionable" classes, from the highest to the lowest, seek advertisement, submit themselves to be interviewed and photographed, report their movements and private interests to the halfpenny Press, glory in identification with the mass, hate to be alone, delight to meet the same faces, and hear the same conversations repeated, much as a child repeats a simple one-fingered tune on the piano.

Higher interests must be eliminated from an existence so self-absorbed and yet so remote from the reserved life that bears its highest fruit in religious and philosophic thought, and has its commoner product in the countryman's slow steadiness, and healthy scepticism of mind. "Do you never think of God?" says the laborer in one of Tolstoy's short stories to his overseer. There can be no thinking where all is sensation and physical impulse. This life, or rather the most palpable, seizable things of this life, must be all; the life of the soul, now and afterwards, is voted down, not as a matter of reason, but in a kind of half-conscious plébiscite of the careless. M. Gérard seems to think that a counter-movement can be set up if the "aristocracy of intellect" will only "combine" for the defence of the menaced culture of mankind, and especially in the interests of "art and beauty," and he thinks that women, who find special need of the ideal, and for whose satisfaction art largely exists, may stem the tide of vulgarity. But an aristocracy of the mind never combines; and it would not affect the fashionable crowd if it did. It works alone and on individual lines. On the other hand, the discontent of women with an existence spent on a plane of low interests is a perceptible feature of modern civilisation. From them may come a movement vehemently religious and awakening, shattering, for a time, the great business of amusement, or producing a secession of enlightened folk driven into forms of semi-monastic life, or a Rule of conduct under which the soul would again have space to exist and grow.

THE CASE OF SAMUEL BUTLER.

It has frequently been made a matter of surprise that as a nation we have produced so many great humorists. Indeed it sometimes seems as if we produced them in no other sense than by offering them an incomparable butt. For it is possible that the sort of failure we exhibit in our attitude towards humour is one of the conditions that evokes its finest quality. Consider, for example, the exquisite naïveté of a people who, with an open Shakespeare, have solemnly expressed and handed down the astonishing discovery that "There's many a true word spoken in jest." A "jester" still remains for them a silly, merry creature who, in his rambling talk, just happens occasionally to say something true without meaning it. This arises in no small measure from our departmental view of life, itself the product of the cautious plodding which has been the secret of our "getting on." Our humorists we value for recreation: we like them to play whimsically with trifles, or, when they touch serious matters, to give us the sort of sentiment we understand. Humour is not for revelation or discovery of truth: for such purposes we keep philosophers and men of science. It is true that we will sometimes allow a humorist to pretend to be a philosopher, or even a man of science, but we know he is pretending all the time. Otherwise we should not let him do it. For when occasionally a humorist comes along who kicks against our view of him as jester, and pretends that his philosophy or even his science is real, asserting that his humour is a truly scientific instrument, we recognise at once that this is carrying a jest too far, and squelch him. If he is a writer, we say that he is either dull or impertinent, and refuse to read him. Occasionally one escapes, assisted by special circumstances, and lives to play a curious part in the amenities of our standard literature. Swift escaped, not for his genius, but because of the high value which just then happened to attach to one of his by-products, his ability as party pamphleteer. Defoe learned better how to repeat his "True Born Englishman."

The case of Samuel Butler, a cheap edition of whose practically unknown works has just been published by Messrs. Fifield, is much to the point. One of his books, "Erewhon," surprised the public into reading it when it came out in 1872. For it was cunningly coated with an upper crust of tasty pleasantry, of audacious whim, and clever topsy-turveydom, pretending to describe a people who were so absurdly wrong as to imprison persons for being physically instead of morally ill, and to condemn machines as enemies and destined tyrants of mankind. But it never reached a wide public, and was quietly smothered when readers found that, biting through the crust, they came upon a thick stratum of pure and poignant irony, the real humour, a serious criticism of our accepted and approved standard of values. That the Erewhonians should try a man on the charge of pulmonary consumption, the line of defence being that the prisoner was simulating consumption in order to defraud an insurance company, is very "funny," so long as it is not seriously suggested that sound health is a more fundamental basis of a sound society than conventional morality of any sort, and that wilful, careless, or even unlucky propagation of disease is worse, in the only sense bad has, than any similarly motived moral infection. But when we come to recognise that this is the sort of "truth" that the "humorist" intends to convey, and that he affects a mission to rip off this make-believe from whole big departments of conventional thought and feeling, we recognise him for a dangerous man and drop him. There is nothing base or contemptible about this action of the public: society must defend her accepted standards, and this is her instinctive method of defence. For Samuel Butler, the most brilliant and penetrating, and even the most fruitfully constructive critic of his generation, it meant not absolute oblivion during his life, but a sort of reputation better devised than any other to dam up his legitimate influence, that of a paradoxical utopian, the champion of a ridiculous notion that a woman wrote the Odyssey. So, although he wrote many brilliant, some of them closely-reasoned, works on science, art, and morals, it is safe to compute that his intellectual influence on his age did not amount to one tithe of that of, shall we say, the late Dean Farrar, or the late Duke of Argyll. This is how the public, the educated public, be it borne in mind, does and apparently must treat its greatest humorists, if they insist on using their humour for its highest purpose, that of the discovery and assessment of human values. For much of the topsy-turveydom of Erewhon is not mere playful perverseness, but prophecy. Perhaps, indeed, as Lord Rosebery's interesting speech on Tuesday on comparative legislation suggests, the spiral of civilisation works this way: at any rate it looks as if we were entering an era when pulmonary consumption will be treated as a crime and homicide or theft as diseases, when what happens before birth will be accounted more important than what happens after death, and when machinery will be put under severe restraint.

A greater book, however, than "Erewhon," is Butler's posthumous novel, "The Way of All Flesh," which has probably been rescued from hasty burial by the powerful encomium of Mr. Bernard Shaw, who has thus expended a little of the adventitious fame which he, like Butler in the Erewhon days, has won by the cunning of his upper crust. An "uncomfortable" book, with its uncompromising process of disillusionment pursued into the very sanctuary of our inner respectability, the clergyman's profession as it works out in home life, with an illustration of the relations between the worship of Ydgrun (Grundy) and the orthodox religion, the whole picture of a certain tough, enduring type of British family life, illumined by flashes of profound and serious wisdom which tell certain truths never told so boldly and so well before. Our genius for avoiding the disturbing and uncomfortable enables most of us to set aside such a book as bitterly unfair distortion. But the sober fact is that it tells us a larger quantity of more important things we ought to want to know about ourselves as human beings and as educated Englishmen than any other recent book. That satire and sometimes even a more mordant brand of humour are employed, carrying some necessary alloy of extravagance, is true, but in no other way can certain subtly-hidden truths be got out. But irony and satire with Butler were not surgical instruments, wielded with grim satisfaction by a skilled operator: just and noble sympathy with men and women, a wonderfully loving interpretation of children, inspiring his subtle criticism of the process called "education," a large and benevolent toleration of folly and frailty—such feelings underlie the irony of the philosopher.

There is, however, another quality of Butler's genius which in his life-time went to his undoing. Our "departmentalism" has operated with peculiar force in recent times to set aside and to specialise "men of science" who, however much they wrangle among themselves and contradict one another, are authoritative revealers of the reigning truths within their provinces. Even the attempts of non-humorous philosophers to meddle and ask awkward questions are bitterly resented. What, then, shall be done to a mere literary man, a jester, who comes into the sacred ring and plucks the high-priest himself by the beard? That the author of a comic skit, with no scientific credentials, who is not even an F.R.S. like Mr. Balfour, should set about to tackle Darwin upon the logic of his explanation of the process of evolution, and, what is worse, convict him of a hopeless entanglement of inconsistency, is not to be endured. It is one thing for a bishop to try and strangle a scientific monster in infancy, but when the monster has become a reputable member of society and has even been "confirmed," there is only one condemnation to be applied to such disturbers of the intellectual peace. It is shocking. We doubt not that many, even among those who admire Butler's critical humour in his social and artistic studies, think he might better have let science alone. And yet the least reflection will show us that no modern humorist can let science alone, not even the lighter jesters like Mark Twain or Mr. Dooley. For the new reign of awe which science has set up in "educated" man is the richest subject in our time for deeper humorous reflection. Concerned primarily with the feeling and thinking processes of "educated" man, Butler was obliged to test the methods of the new hierarchy. And so he came to steep himself in mazy controversies about instinct, inheritance, and the wild logic by which biologists have striven to convert chance variation into organic progress, sinking out of sight his lighter humour in the zest of the intellectual hunt, or thinning it down into a brilliant dialectic. No cleverer exposure has been made of the strange proclivity of scientific men to become charlatans from an eagerness to improvise sonorous doctrines out of the new facts they have so diligently gathered. But humour is not a merely or a finally destructive power, and Butler uses his in positive constructive ways that are full of rich suggestion. His theory of embryonic recapitulation as a literal exercise of race memory, and other ingenuities of his genius for analogy, may find no great acceptance as contributions to scientific interpretation. But he laid his finger with unerring accuracy upon certain crude defects of the Darwinian theory which later scientists are even now struggling to repair.

His "philosophy," the intellectual mould his humour takes, is idealistic, as is that of other great humorists. But his ethics, or practical attitude towards life, veer round towards "common sense," regarding actual conduct as more important than motive, and normal utilities as better guides than formal principles, humane instincts than the elaborated arts of individual or social government. Taken all in all, he is, perhaps, the keenest, broadest, and most fearless mind of our age, playing freely and brilliantly on matters of the most urgent importance, and almost reduced to the hazardous fame of a single ill-read and half-forgotten book. Such is the case of a great modern humorist.

A LOST CHILD.

Dumas has immortalised this figure, the child of sixteen who became the first mistress of the Great Monarch and found herself, in her little joy and long repentance, with an immortal place in history. But the story of Dumas himself, with his riotous imagination and unflagging spirits, is scarcely more moving than the actual facts; the life history of a woman and of an age as set forth in M. Lair's fascinating pages. ("Louise de la Vallière," by Jules Lair. Hutchinson.) The King is the central figure, and one naïve confession the secret of it all. His mother was one day begging him, in consideration for his soul's salvation, to will at least to break the chains which bound him. He replied that "he knew his errors, that he sometimes felt grieved at them and ashamed of them, that he had done what he could to keep himself from offending God, but he was obliged to confess that his passions had overstepped his reason, he could not resist them, and could not even say that he desired to do so." Amidst such candid confession the Court life continues—intriguing, love-making, merry-making; dancing happily towards that Revolution which was to convert this whole society into dust and a dream. Guiche, making love to Madame, is surprised by Monsieur, and compelled to hide in a fireplace with double doors. "As ill-luck would have it, what did Monsieur do but begin to eat an orange, the peel of which he plainly proposed to throw into Guiche's hiding-place. One of Madame's maids, accustomed to these extra duties, adroitly exclaimed, 'My Prince, please don't throw away the peel, I love it.' Monsieur gave it to her, and so the Count and Madame had a narrow escape." The days pass in splendid fêtes—at Vaux, at Fontainebleau, at Versailles: with hunting and bathing and processioning all day, and dancing and music half the night: with the revenues of France expended in similar fashion as the revenues of an Indian Prince in fireworks or air balloons. When they are tired of pleasure, they all attend the Abbé Bossuet's conferences concerning religion, well pleased, as the wealthy society of to-day is well pleased, to hear, in eloquent phrases, denunciation of all their works and ways. He inveighs against the endless pleasure-seeking of the Court, for ever on the road from Saint Germain to Versailles, and from Versailles to Saint Germain. He openly addresses the King—undoubtedly to the infinite edification of the courtiers—reminding him of his responsibility and insignificance in the sight of God. He speaks trenchantly against "those delicate passions which, in ordinary people, are called vices," against "treacherous attentions," against "evil living." "There is a God in Heaven," he cries, "who avenges the sins of peoples . . . . but above all, the sins of Kings." From such pleasant and bracing interludes they all return again to the dancing and love-making and merriment. Death—that audacious intruder—can interrupt but for a moment. Anne of Austria perishes of a terrible disease. Monsieur, her son, "was as utterly grieved as he was capable of being. He was utterly overcome at first, but in four or five days he was quite himself again." Fêtes and masquerades are suspended: instead we have a review of the troops: "Many ladies come. Although they were in mourning, they amused themselves very successfully. The King was in great spirits, and sang songs along the road on the way back." Occasionally a man or a woman proves tiresome. M. de Montespan, on learning that his daughter-in-law has become the King's new mistress, piously remarks, "Thank Heaven, some good luck has come our way at last!" But the husband himself, "a highly intelligent man," but, in "our opinion," "a very extravagant and eccentric kind of husband," made "a desperate fuss about the King's liking for his wife": creating endless scandal. He reads Louis a homily with allusions to Holy Writ—especially to the case of David—to "prove that the King must give up the Marquise or fear the judgment of God." "The harangue was admirable." These efforts failing, having "plenty of wit," he celebrates with pomp and splendour the obsequies of Madame de Montespan, wearing mourning for her, solemnly announcing her death.

Outside, the common people struggle to bear this burden laid on their patient and unending labor. Only the few resist and complain. A woman ruined by the taxes of a "Court of Justice" "awaited Louis in the passage and heaped insults upon him, calling him 'the libertine, the intriguing King, the tyrant.'" The King could not believe his ears: he asked if she was speaking to him, to which she replied that she was, and continued. They seized the creature and threw her into prison, having first had her whipped in public "with extreme rigour, during which she did not utter a cry, suffering this cruelty as does a martyr for the love of God." Soon after a man bursts out in similar speeches. He is condemned to the galleys, and to have his tongue cut out. The majority acquiesce, with bowed heads, working and enduring, that these few may rejoice and be glad and (again) become wearied of gladness. La Bruyère could reveal a few years later the discovery of "certain wild animals, black, livid, all burnt by the sun, bound to the earth which they dig and turn with unconquerable pertinacity. They have a certain human aspect, and when they stand upright, reveal a human countenance, and, indeed, are found to be men." There was to follow years of the splendour and glory of France, triumph in war and the arts of pleasing, a life of gaiety, temper, and enjoyment, appearing in record as a kind of pitiful protest of the pathos of the follies of mankind as a vision between a sleep and a sleep. There was to succeed the long period of grossness and decline, the vices losing their brilliance in a naked, sordid ugliness, the sceptre evidently falling from hands nerveless and impotent and futile. And the whole was to vanish in a furnace flame, in which that astonishing company of kind and foolish people were to be consumed utterly and for ever. But the end was embedded in the beginning. While Versailles is being embellished and Guiche hiding in the fireplace, and the Court concerned with the ballets of the Muses or of the Naissance de Venus, the people in the fields are cutting their crops green to be baked in the oven because their hunger could not wait, or cowering whole days in bed because misery was there less unendurable. The empty halls of those splendid palaces, the quiet gardens which cover the sites of palaces rudely destroyed in a night of delirium, proclaim the unsuitability of such an existence to such a creature as man.

La Vallière stands in it all, among them, not of them: a frightened child, bewildered, having lost its way in the company of grotesque and eager occupants of Vanity Fair. She was thrown into the whirlpool at the age of sixteen, a victim in a plot of dissimulation in which, by chance almost, she had been selected as a cloak for the pursuit of higher game. She had the misfortune to fall in love in a realm where love was an alien: she suffered from the inconvenience of such a sane emotion, amid a company essentially insane. For a couple of years she was happy; at twenty she was a discarded toy of which her master was weary; five years after she has made an end of it all. Even the masqueraders had some pity for her. "No one can be more loved than she is at the Court," writes the Prince of Condé to the Queen of Poland, "for she does no harm, and tries to do all the good she can." She is compelled to the depth of humiliation, attendance upon her successor. Madame, at the age of twenty-six, dies in extreme agony, goaded into repentance by her confessor. "The Church implores God, Madame, to forgive you all your sins—your evil words, your joy in perfumes and odours, your illicit looks and speeches, your slanders, your concupiscence, your evil deeds, forbidden by the law of God." "Will this fearful anguish never cease?" is the moan of the dying Princess. "Madame! you forget yourself," is the stern reply. "You have offended God for twenty-six years, and your penance has only lasted six hours." This background of terror and reality—the dance of Death—is visible at intervals behind the glitter and gaiety. La Vallière will expiate, not in six hours, but in thirty-six years of austerity, the brief months of pleasure. "She shows only the pain she cannot conceal," was the verdict of her Prioress. She died in the days of defeat, when the decorations of the Chapel of the Carmelites are being sold to pay for the cost of disastrous war. "Virga tua et baculus tuus ipse me consolati sunt," she cried at the end. "When they told the King of Louise de La Vallière's death, he did not seem touched. He had lost even that faculty of weeping which had formerly given him an appearance of sensibility. To account for his indifference, he thought it necessary to say that "from the day Louise had given herself to God, she was dead to him." "Men are like that," concludes M. Lair. The last word remains to the excellent Madame de Motteville. "The misfortune of our sex is such," she writes, "that men, who have ever made the laws, have removed all rigor from them as regards themselves: and it is only in Heaven, where all are equal, that each shall be rewarded according to his deserts."

OVER-DELICACY OF SPEECH.

What one misses in twentieth century English is a certain racy smack of the joy of living which comes from life in the open air. Our speech has no taste of Flora and the country green—there is about it no smell of Mother Earth. The age seems to affect all its children in the same way. Optimist and pessimist write and speak alike. Mr. Chesterton's English is certainly more poetical than Mr. Bernard Shaw's, but they both alike write a language learned from books, and not derived from direct contact with things. This language is not very robust. It is not the tongue of Shakespeare. With all Mr. Chesterton's sympathy, for instance, with mellow Burgundy and old October, and his subtle insight into their magical effects you will hardly find him describing one of his characters as "pot-valiant." Mr. Belloc might, perhaps, do so. The vocabulary of the English spoken in polite circles becomes ever more and more restricted. Everything is "nice"—we have nice books, nice curates, nice cakes. Mr. W. J. Locke has some excellent remarks somewhere about people who only know one adjective. Mr. Locke himself, by the way, is one of the few modern writers who write the old, out-door, merry, variegated English. It is curious to compare the talk of Shakespeare's young men and boys—Court gallants or lackies or pages—with its many colored variety and vivacity of expression, with the talk of the young men of the present day, of almost any class, ringing the changes as they do on "what ho!" and "a little bit of all right."

It is, no doubt, too much to expect that dwellers in twentieth century London should talk as they talked in the forest of Arden. Thirty years ago, in bustling market towns and pleasant villages, people still spoke the forest language, the tongue of Touchstone and Jaques. Borrow wrote it, Dickens wrote it, Mr. De Morgan still writes a Victorian English which is in great part Elizabethan. In the talk of the people there was then still found the old touch with nature, the personification of things, the intimacy with birds and beasts, the knowledge of the traditional lore about them. The crow, for instance, in times of drought was said to "cry against the rain." The power was attributed to it of keeping the rain from the thirsty earth by its cries. It is curious to find in "As You Like It" the same power ascribed to the parrot. "More clamorous than a parrot against rain," says Rosalind (Act IV., Scene 1). There is more, we think, in the phrase "against the rain," than the dislike of the gaudy stranger from rainless lands to wet weather and grey skies. The old country sayings about the snail "with his house on his back," and the like, are all in Shakespeare. He is full of the characteristics which our medieval forefathers ascribed to birds and beasts. There is a delightful ironical proverb in the "Comedy of Errors," which we have never heard or met with anywhere else, but which must have been current in his day. "Fly pride, says the peacock" (Act IV., Scene 3). This is a most picturesque variation of the saying about "the devil rebuking sin." One finds in Shakespeare all the old proverbs like "it's an ill wind that blows nobody good," and the old phrases which at one time were used constantly and were always so pleasant to hear. Arthur says in "King John":—

> "So were I out of prison and kept sheep,
> I should be merry as the day is long." (Act IV., Scene 1.)

As a child the writer remembers many Shakespearian phrases still surviving. "Old Father Antic" would occasionally be spoken of. He has heard the proverb "He doesn't know a hawk from a handsaw." "He doesn't know a great A from a bull's foot" is in the same vein. "For every Jack there's a Jill" was a thoroughly Elizabethan bit of English.

> "Our wooing doth not end like an old play; > Jack hath not Jill," says Biron in "Love's Labor's Lost." (Act IV., Scene 1.)

That old English, the speech of Arden, was full of similes, full of personifications. A crying child was "a little Misery," like a personage in a morality play. The most graphic phrases were constantly used. "Like so many small birds at an owl" in one which we remember. It suggests a crowd of Tuscan minor poets rhyming spiteful sonnets against Dante. There is something like it in the Bible. "Mine heritage is to me as a speckled bird; the birds that are round about her are against her" (Jer. xii., 9). "Rich as a Jew" was delightfully full of medieval suggestion. One never hears it now, and never comes across it in print. No sooner do we open an old book than it catches the eye at once. "He's lost his tongue" is full of homely kindness and wide-eyed childish wonder. It calls up visits to farmhouses in the country and maiden aunts in old-fashioned towns. "To cut off one's nose to spite one's face" is an admirable piece of popular simile, happily still current. We cannot remember anything answering to this apt and felicitous phrase in any other European tongue. "To make mountains out of mole-hills," again, one still hears very often. The Russian equivalent of this is very picturesque, "To make an elephant out of a fly."

The language of the present-day pulpit is wearisome in the extreme. We hear of "privileges," of "responsibilities," of "problems," of "tendencies." Dr. Neale has long lain in East Grinstead Churchyard, and the only living preacher we can think of who talks outdoor English is Dr. Alexander Whyte, of Edinburgh. "All the spiders in Scotland," he will say, "had conspired to weave their webs that morning upon that hillside." This is the kind of preacher we should like to sit under.

Our English at present is suffering from a certain anæmic refinement. Does anyone ever speak now of "kicking up a bobbery," or "Dick's delight," or doing anything "quick sticks," or say "it sticks in my gizzard"? The language of the people is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of Board School education. To-day, if one uses such a word as "pottle-bellied," one feels that it is suspect. It smells of the faggot of indelicacy. A certain wholesome coarseness adds greatly to the vigour and expressiveness of a language. We have nothing in English like "tirer les vers du nez"—more's the pity! This most felicitous phrase must have been coined in Burgundy. It smacks of the wine country, and comes from a time before phylloxera laid waste the vines.

It is vain to quarrel with Fate, or fight against the whole trend of one's time. Our civilisation is against all these things. It is a civilisation with little leisure, not living much with outdoor things, cut off largely from tradition. This cannot fail to influence the language that people speak. The old English was the language of the country; the present-day English is the speech of towns.

Short Story.

ONE POINT OF VIEW.

They were all in her own hands—his life, and hers, and Clare's, to make or mar. It was a great and real responsibility; and she must not be led away by any melodramatic instinct of self-sacrifice. It had seemed inevitable, in the first agony of her knowledge that Bernard loved Clare, to set him free to marry her. But life and duty are more complex. She must be wise, must look before and after, for them all. Anyone could do the obviously unselfish thing; but there was an inner citadel of selflessness, which she must guard for Bernard's sake, because she loved him with a wonderful love, passing the love of most women, certainly passing the love of Clare. She had met Clare at garden-parties and afternoon teas. Clare had a very lovely face, something between a Greuze and a Madonna of Raphael; but she had no depth of character. Miriam had seen that at the first glance, and it was one of the factors with which she must reckon. Those haunting dark eyes were not really homes of silent prayer, or of profound reflection. Perhaps—it came across her with a sudden rush of bitterness—they had no need to be. For a wild moment, had there been some universal mart at which such bargains were possible, she would have taken her character, which everyone called "strong and sweet," the intelligence which had once made Bernard quote whimsically, "'You have a man's brain and a woman's heart,'" and all her spiritual and ethical attainments, and flung them down, in exchange for a face that would launch a thousand, or even fifty ships, the property of some bored Helen, who coveted moral worth. Beauty is such a positive possession; as for goodness, which had always been Miriam's speciality, she felt less certain of its value than she had ever done. Character is often like a chemical substance which steadily refuses to combine with a hundred elements, and suddenly evaporates, for no apparent reason—some subtle atomic affinity—on being treated with the hundred and first. And it is probable that Miriam was genuinely uncertain whether her own morality, under this ethical test, was evaporating or refusing to evaporate . . . If she had had a Greuze-Madonna face, she would have felt more sure of it.

But that was a digression. Men tired of mere beauty. She pictured Bernard's possible weariness of Clare so vividly that she had no colors left to paint his possible weariness of herself, after six months of her society. She foresaw Clare's exactions; she did not foresee her own, or realise that the sorest exaction may masquerade as sacrifice. Nor did it occur to her, when, at every point but that of physical beauty, she weighed Clare against herself, and found her wanting, that perhaps the balance was loaded.

In the first place, there was no real intellectual bond between Clare and Bernard. To be sure, Clare loved intellect, and intellectual people; and she had collected, one could not say assimilated, a number of incongruous but delightful ideas. She did not think: she looted. It was the kind of mind in which the old theology and the new dwell peaceably together, like the beasts in a Noah's Ark, or in the Millennium—Clare herself being merely the little child who led them. Or again, it was no living garden in which thoughts took root, but a vase of cut flowers. When Bernard looked for real response, real mental sympathy, he would have to walk alone, unless, indeed, Clare suffered Miriam to accompany him on his intellectual pilgrimages. And she wouldn't—that kind of girl never did! It was not her fault: she could not realise a need that she had never felt; but the fact remained, that he would be unspeakably lonely. Men—yes, he could have men; but that was different. There cannot be, between two men, the same delicate, exquisite suffusion of the intellect by the emotion, that gives an added charm to the discussion of the eternal verities between a man and a woman, when the two are more than friends!

And they had been more than friends—Bernard had loved her. No; there had not been in his voice the note of passion with which, in his delirium, he spoke of Clare; but there had been something that a woman, all her days, listens for stealthily in the voice of the man she loves. Lately, it had been absent; but it would come again. Few women, in their hearts, believe that miracles do not happen, or gauge the difference between sleep and death. She remembered how her life, till he came into it, had been like a grey sky—not the blue grey that is lovelier than any cloudless azure—the sullen, leaden grey of a rainy day in a factory town. But she had lived for others—oh! surely she had lived for others—not for popularity, not for praise, although she had won both. And two years ago, when he asked her to marry him, the aloe of sacrifice had blossomed into a perfect flower of joy. It was so just, so fair, so clearly by the ordering of God, that this great happiness should come to her, who had learned, in paths of patient service, to use happiness aright, to treat it as a stewardship. It could not be that God had not meant it after all.

But that was another digression. Spiritually and ethically, what of herself and Clare?

It seemed as if, spiritually, she were an easy first. All her life, on questions of the soul, she had been something of an authority. She had been one of those who suggest the saying:—

> "Das ewig Weibliche > Zieht uns hinan."

Ah! if he married Clare, might it not be a case of "Zieht uns hinab"? Miriam had really obeyed the injunction to hitch her waggon to a star; but she had also hitched it to a dray-horse, and its freight—provisions enough to stand a siege in either world, was available both for earth and heaven. Clare's waggon—a flimsy structure—carried red poppies and strawberries, and was hitched to a will-of-the-wisp. Bernard's life, dedicated to humanity, brimming over with sublime aspirations—how could he share it with her? A cup will only hold its own measure. One's spontaneous similes do not always rise to the level of one's ethical attainments; and Miriam involuntarily thought of Clare as a delicate afternoon teacup, and of herself as a quart mug. Or she was a whole sea, while Clare was a landlocked bay—only, if the landlocked bay is home!

It wasn't, couldn't be! It was a hostel merely, a hostel, for one day inhabited by the mood of a man—yes, in these life and death issues one must face every fact—by his passion, his earthlier emotion. He did not love Clare with the deep spiritual love that conquered time and death. And for Clare, the terror of it, to marry a man who did not love her with the one love that endures. Every true woman, if she can, must ward that fate from another woman. . . . It will be seen that Miriam did not forget Clare's interests, though she put Bernard's interests first.

Again—perhaps this was the aspect of it that impressed her most of all—only a great love can satisfy a great love. Bernard could love greatly—could Clare? She thought not. She knew that Clare was undeveloped—a mere child, in whom a surge of desire and emotion did duty for a soul. Not a woman, not a strong, white-winged angel! Her love could meet Bernard's in the shallows, never in the depths or heights. She could not choose the better part: she could not annihilate self—as Miriam could. For Miriam might have said with Browning's poet:—

"My whole life long I learned to love."

She knew love in its Alpine heights, and in its deep-sea soundings. And she did not expect, she did not wish, to be loved by Bernard as she loved him. It was enough for her to merge her being in his.

To be sure, it was essential that he should love her to some extent. A man can hardly be happy who does not feel more for his wife than gratitude, affection, and reverence. It was for his own sake, not for hers, that she demanded some share of love. But that would come, even if now it were obscured by a temporary madness—it must come, when they belonged utterly to one another! God would help her to satisfy him, yet never to weary him. Her great devotion should teach her wonderful subtlety. She would reinforce his life, at every turn, so deftly; she would so interweave her personality with every joy that came to him, so break the shock of every pain; she would so spend heart, soul, and brain in his service, that she would become all in all to him—lover, wife, friend.

And if she failed after all, even then her love would not fail. She would not give him up now, and to Clare! But if some other woman came, some woman who could wholly satisfy the mortal and immortal parts of him—she could always die. That thought sanctified her resolve. There was a pale radiance on her face, as she rose, and went back to Bernard.

It was next day that he said:—

"Miriam—when I was delirious, what did I talk about?"

What was in his voice she could hardly tell: it might be a veiled anxiety, or it might be a forlorn hope. Her heart began to beat slowly and heavily. Now was the time to fling the door wide, or to turn the key, and leave it locked. She had made up her mind; but it took all her strength to answer tranquilly:—

"Ever so many things. Your work, that wretched examination—you never would have caught the fever if you had not been working too hard—your friends at college."

"What else?"

Her voice was hardly audible:—

"You talked about—you and me, about our life together, our home——"

The key turned: it was as if soft receding footsteps left the locked door, as she slid her hand into his, and they began to speak of the home that was to be.

Present-Day Problems.

THE CULT OF THE MONSTER WAR-SHIP.

THE question of the "Monster Warship" has been referred—and not by those who perceive the vices of the type so designated—to the tribunal of the public Press. The adoption—to use a convenient definition—of the "Dreadnought" construction policy was accompanied by a flood of laudation in the columns of the most influential or most widely circulated newspapers. Wherever it may have originated, or whatever may have been its object, this did, undoubtedly, have the effect of inducing the country to believe that we were producing a ship-of-war which would render all existing ships obsolete, or, at the least, would send them a long way on the road to premature obsolescence. Were men—whose prolonged experience cannot be denied, and who, perhaps, may, without vanity, lay claim to such knowledge as that experience would almost necessarily impart—to permit, without attempting to refute it, what they honestly believed to be an incorrect estimate of the belligerent qualities of the new type to be strewn broadcast amongst newspaper readers? The mere fact of appealing to the tribunal of the Press was a challenge to the men to whom allusion is made to show cause in the same forum against hasty acceptance of a serious innovation. The gauntlet thrown down was taken up, with what result has still to be seen.

I do not care to occupy your space or waste my time in repudiating the ignoble suggestions of personal animus which the challengers and their journalistic mouthpieces have not hesitated to make. My own attitude towards the "monster war-ship" has long been known to everyone who thought my opinions worth ascertaining; and that attitude—whatever its importance or insignificance—was assumed before the "Dreadnought" construction policy was announced to the public. The increase in size of modern capital ships till quite recently was supported by arguments the force of which could not be ignored; and it may be said to have been a natural or logical increase. There appeared, however, to be this danger; viz., that a time might come when unreasoning megalomania would exercise a predominating influence on construction and when the essential belligerent qualities of the man-of-war would be sacrificed to an inconsiderate desire to turn out what would look like an imposing or monumental production. That the apprehension of this danger was not unfounded has been proved by the course of events. Detailed technicalities would be out of place in your columns, therefore figures had better be avoided as far as possible. It may, however, be said that, whilst in the pre-"Dreadnought" days battleships' displacement increased in thirteen years by about 15 per cent.; the construction of the "Dreadnought" occasioned in four years an increase of 26 per cent. This was accompanied by an increase in the draught of water of more than 10 per cent., viz., from 28 feet 5 inches to 31 feet 6 inches, a fact of the utmost gravity, as every navigator knows. Nor is this all. There has been an increase on the dimensions of the "Dreadnought" herself in the designs of her immediate successors; and that increase has been further augmented in still later designs. It will not be contended by anyone that the essential condition of naval warfare have changed anything like proportionately to the increases mentioned.

The claim that the "Dreadnought" had rendered all existing ships, if not quite obsolete, at least obsolescent, was circulated by the newspapers in 1905. It would be difficult to believe, if there were not an official document to prove it, that two years afterwards, viz., in July, 1907, the House of Lords was informed that we had, besides the "Dreadnought," thirty-eight completed battleships which were not considered obsolescent. France and Germany were shown in the same document—the so-called "Cawdor Return"—to have twenty-four completed non-obsolescent battleships between them; whilst the United States had eighteen. Consequently, the three powers together had just forty-two completed battleships not considered obsolescent to put against our thirty-eight. This was an undeniably strong position for us. The claim advanced on behalf of the "Dreadnought" amounted to nothing less than an attempt to make us forfeit that position.

The "Dreadnought" type either is what its advocates in the Press assert, or it is not. If it is, then, so far from being in a position of almost unapproachable superiority, we are now little better than on a level with a previously far out-distanced competitor, and this immense decline in relative naval strength will have been due to our own act. Is, it must be asked, the "Dreadnought" type so predominantly efficient as its advocates loudly and persistently assert? There is no inconsiderable body of opinion against the loud and persistent assertion.

Putting the case in general terms, it may be said that the fighting efficiency of a man-of-war depends upon what she can do in battle. The gun being the principal weapon, her offensive power is measured by the effect that her gun-armament can produce. All naval history since cannon were first mounted afloat, proves—good shooting being, of course, assumed—that the effect of the gun armament is directly proportionate to the volume of fire from pieces of suitable calibre that a ship or a fleet can bring upon an opponent. This was amply corroborated by the experience of the late war in the Far East; which, no doubt, is the reason why the Japanese will not discard the so-called "secondary armament," and, thus, will not adopt the method of arming the "Dreadnought" and her successors with 12-inch guns alone. The more moderate the weight of the gun, and the greater the number that can be mounted in a given ship, the more formidable will be the volume of fire that she can pour into an adversary. It is, of course, unnecessary to arm her with pop-guns; ballistics and power of bursting shell have to be taken into account, with the result that an armament comprising guns of 10-inch, 9·2-inch, or 6-inch calibre has been found to be very formidable. The "King Edward VII." has a broadside of four 12-inch, two 9·2-inch, and five 6-inch guns; and in a given time can direct against an opposing ship a more effective fire than that which could be delivered by the "Dreadnought" in the same period. A part of every armoured battleship's side is unarmoured. In the "Dreadnought" that part is proportionally very large, and at the longest fighting range is quite perforable by shot from guns of moderate calibre. The heavier bursting charges of 12-inch shell must not be left out of account; but there is no reason to suppose that the bursters of 9·2-inch and 6-inch shell are not powerful enough, when poured in in large numbers, to wreck the ship hit. It must be remembered that the "King Edward" also has four 12-inch guns of her own, able to discharge the more powerful shells.

It has been officially stated in Parliament that some officers serving afloat—whose opinion was evidently thought by the authorities worth quoting—prefer the "King Edward" type to the "Dreadnought" type. It would, perhaps, be going too far to assume that they consider the "King Edward" individually superior, or equal to the "Dreadnought"; but one inevitable result of their opinion is that the factors which make up the fighting efficiency of the two ships are far less costly in money in the "King Edward" than in the "Dreadnought" type. This is of great importance, as will be seen directly we contemplate the financial consequences of a "Dreadnought" construction policy. Not only does each ship of that class cost a great deal more than a ship of the earlier class; it is also impossible to avoid a rapidly successive augmentation of cost. From the "Dreadnought" we soon went to the "Temeraire"' and her sisters; and from these to the "St. Vincent" and hers, size and cost increasing in each case. The principle of this construction policy is the out-building of rivals. The nominal 17,900 tons of the "Dreadnought" have already been carried by the Germans to the 19,000 tons (nominal) of the "Nassau" and "Westfalen." If we do not "throw up the sponge" we must go on and out-do these. As it is, merely in order to preserve equality with two Powers, we shall have—if we persist in the "Dreadnought" policy—to turn out each year six monster battleships, costing £2,000,000 apiece; whilst we shall also have to build the usual complement of other vessels, besides meeting the additional expenditure for enlarged docks and basins and deepened channels necessitated by adoption of the monster type. A few weeks ago the Berlin correspondent of the "Westminster Gazette," when reporting the construction of monster ships in Germany, stated that it would be necessary for us to increase our naval expenditure next year to £41,000,000. He left out several things which it will be necessary to provide for. Consequently his estimate is really a low one.

It is argued by writers in newspapers that we must go on with our monster-ship building policy, because other nations have adopted it. This is simply absurd. If other nations go wrong, there is no reason whatever why we, dependent on a properly efficient navy as we are, should continue to go wrong also. It is also argued that as we have embarked on the policy we must stick to it. This is, if possible, still more ridiculous, and, moreover, is opposed to our own experience. I commanded a ship which in her day—twenty-two years ago—was regarded by certain people as of something of the same kind of advanced type as the "Dreadnought" is regarded by some now. The ship in question was submitted to prolonged trials in comparison with other types. The result was not considered satisfactory, and the type of ship was promptly and permanently abandoned. The "Devastation" of the "'seventies" of the last century had been similarly tried, and her design also was not perpetuated. These examples deserve attention. Another argument sometimes adduced is that the time must come when a rival power will have to stop in the race for continuously increasing dimensions and continuously increasing cost. Those who use this argument do not see that as soon as the rival finds it impossible to go on with the increase he will direct all his intelligence to finding some method of neutralising the value of our monsters in other ways. We profess to think much of the torpedo, the submarine boat, and the submerged mine: and yet the more huge the ship the more is she exposed to the danger of injury or destruction by these and—if injured or destroyed—the greater the gap that she will leave in the fleet.

If we allow that every battleship designed before the "Dreadnought" was laid down has been made obsolete, we must face two things—viz., early reduction to an equality with a single rival naval Power, and a greatly increased expenditure of money even if we try no more than to maintain that equality.

THE LATEST CONCEPTION OF MATTER.*

M. Lucien Poincaré and Dr. Le Bon have contributed to the International Scientific Series its most recent publications, and these volumes have necessarily a great deal of subject matter in common. The works of this series are addressed very largely to the "popular" reader, and therefore the presentation of the subject must often depart from the strictly accurate expression which is suitable to scientific experts. Nevertheless, it should always be a supreme object with an author (and his translator) who writes for a popular audience to avoid the use of language which is positively erroneous, and which will produce notions fundamentally wrong. This is a principle with respect to which scientific writers allow themselves far too much laxity. Not only inaccuracies of language, but mis-statements of known facts, are presented to the popular reader, and justified on the ground that they are "good enough for him." The two volumes before us contain many examples of inaccuracy both of matter and of form; but their value is, nevertheless, very great to the student of modern physics who desires to become acquainted with the most recent discoveries and speculations with respect to the nature of matter, force, and the ether.

The progress of scientific discovery during the last twenty years has been almost miraculous; indeed, we may say that, since Röntgen astonished the world some thirteen years ago, the discovery of new phenomena has been so great and so incessant as to burst the bounds of all known scientific laws and theories. For the moment, we are in Chaos. Every day we make new discoveries; and almost every new discovery brings with it a crop of "explanations" or assumptions—perhaps none of them convincing, and most of them destined to rejection almost as soon as they are formulated. For a long time Science was fairly content with the molecule, and the still smaller atom, of which the chemists discoursed; but even then there were speculators who likened the molecule to a solar system in miniature, whose planets were the atoms of which the molecule is composed. Below the atom they did not go: the atom was absolutely the smallest and the simplest specimen of matter that could be reached by any physical or chemical process. Thought, indeed, might divide the atom down to nothing; but only in thought was the atom divisible.

Who could have imagined that now we should be compelled to regard the atom itself as a still smaller solar system, with little detachable particles of its own? It bears throughout the work of Dr. Le Bon the same relation to the system of the molecule as that which Saturn, with his rings and moons, bears to the whole solar system; and, according to this view, there is, after all, hardly anything more easily broken up than the atoms of certain bodies. Radium and the discoveries of Sir William Ramsay have forced us to accept the fact. Some, at least, of the particles of which an atom is composed are little portions of ether spinning or whirling with prodigious rapidity round their axes; and when these particles are disturbed in their paths, they fly away from the atom with velocities comparable with that of light. This is the theory; but it must be admitted that the scientific reasoning on which it is founded is extremely loose and unsatisfactory. We cannot admit that if the system of an atom is disturbed, the result will be that its component particles will be hurled into space with the enormous velocity of light. This disintegration of the atom plays the most important part in nature, according to Dr. Le Bon; and he never tires of insisting on the almost inconceivably great amount of "energy" contained in a single atom. This term "energy," though defined originally with precision by mathematicians, has by usage and fashion become one of the most vague in Science: it is often nothing more than a high-sounding word in the mouths of scientific quacks. After much careful scrutiny, in order to obtain a clear notion of the meaning to be attached to Dr. Le Bon's "intra-atomic energy," we discover that it means simply the kinetic energy of the particles of the atom—due to their enormously rapid motions.

The modern conception of an atom of matter makes it an extremely complex body. Its smaller particles, of which we have spoken above, are each about one thousand times smaller than the whole atom, and each carries a charge of negative electricity. In addition to these "electrons," as they are called, there is a portion—the greater part—which carries a charge of positive electricity. Thus Science has as yet done nothing to get rid of the dualism of "positive" and "negative" electricity. It is not easy, however, to discover Dr. Le Bon's attitude towards "electrons"; for, while he seems to make use of the conception for explaining many things, he says in one place that "the conception of electrons, a near relative to the old phlogiston, is, as has been well shown by Professor de Heen, one of the most unfortunate metaphysical ideas recently formulated."

The disintegration of atoms by the gradual loss of a portion of their energy—a loss the cause of which is not indicated—leads to their instability; and, according to Dr. Le Bon, "a moment arrives when this stability is so weak that the matter disappears by a sort of explosion more or less rapid." Bodies such as Radium and Thorium represent the old age of matter—a state to which all bodies must ultimately come; and a world the matter of which had arrived, generally, at this stage, might vanish into the ether by a sudden explosion. This consideration leads Dr. Le Bon into one of the most fantastic speculations ever formulated. He thinks that it may account for that sudden flaring up and rapid disappearance of stars which astronomers have observed—as in the recent remarkable case of Nova Persei, when not merely a whole world, but a whole stellar system, disappeared into the ether by the sudden explosion of all its atoms! How all the atoms of a system, perhaps many times greater than our sun and all his planets, received a sudden word of command to break up—and acted upon it—he does not explain. But hard astronomical fact disposes, unfortunately, of this bold speculation; for, Nova Persei and other similar "flares" have not disappeared; they have merely diminished in lustre so much that great telescopes are required to reveal them. The death of the Universe may, indeed, be effected by the gradual disintegration of the atoms of bodies; for it may well be, as Dr. Le Bon contends, that matter is composed simply of ether aggregated into small portions called molecules and atoms, which differ from the surrounding ether merely by possessing enormously rapid and complicated motions. If these motions are in any way disturbed, the disturbance will affect the ether in which the material particles are plunged; and, according to the nature of the disturbance, there will result some one or more of the things which we call heat, light, electricity, and magnetism. If this is a correct representation, it follows that matter is no more composed of electricity than it is composed of heat or light: matter is nothing but ether endowed with energy, in a form which has acquired comparative fixity, and its ultimate destiny is to return to the ether whence it came, by a series of successive stages. Such is Dr. Le Bon's general conception of matter; but he is by no means consistent in his exposition; for, when he uses such language as the following, "Matter may be reconverted into force, not only because it is, as I have proved, a particular form of energy, but also because it is only defined, in equations of mechanics, by symbols of force," his contradiction of the most elementary and fundamental use of terms renders the attempt to follow him impossible.

As stated above, both of the volumes before us deal, to a great extent, with the same subjects; but there is far less of speculation, verging on the metaphysical, in M. Poincaré's book than in that of Dr. Le Bon. The latter is divided into two parts, the first of which is almost entirely of a speculative nature, and is, in our opinion, marked by much vagueness and inconsistency. We do not quarrel with his denial of the principles of the conservation of matter and of energy, because his disappearance of matter means simply its return to the ether; and because he admits that all energy will exist finally as a vibratory motion in the ether. Indeed, the principle of the conservation of energy, as conceived by many of its exponents, amounts to nothing more than this—that in the Universe the sum of the actual and the possible is constant—a proposition the loss of which we need not deplore.

"The Evolution of Forces." By Dr. Gustave Le Bon. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co. 5s.

The second part of Dr. Le Bon's book contains a very great deal of real interest and importance, and his discussion of the phenomena of phosphorescence and "dark light" is the most useful that we have seen. He also discusses the problem of life and that of gravitation, without, of course, being able to obtain a solution of either.

M. Poincaré devotes a great deal of attention to that most modern of physical subjects, the electrical conductivity of gases and the various "rays" and "emanations" associated therewith: this is, in fact, the main branch of his subject, and it will be of real assistance to the student.

The work of translation and of revision leaves, especially in the case of Dr. Le Bon's book, a great deal to be desired. No doubt some of the difficulty is due to the author's perplexing inconsistencies; but how can we account for the following statement attributed to Carnot, and said to be a translation from his "Réflections sur la Puissance motrice du Feu": "The motive power of heat depends likewise on the quantity of caloric used, which we call the height of its fall," &c.? Carnot, of course, could never have said anything of the kind.

A study of the most modern Physics, as we find it set forth in such books as those of Poincaré and Le Bon, leaves us with the feeling that, though future generations may be fortunate enough to find all the facts of Nature brought under a small number of general laws, no such simplification can exist for us: our lot is to grope almost blindly among a vast number of phenomena to the end that our successors may evolve order out of chaos.

"VOTES FOR WOMEN."

SIR,—In your kind notice of a pamphlet on the enfranchisement of working wives, last week, there are some expressions which might suggest that its tone is unfriendly to the "militant" Suffragist Societies. May the writer say that some of us in the Women's Co-operative Guild know very well how much we owe to the women who have dared to give their cause the advertisement of courage and sensationalism, without which, it seems, men will not listen? A crowd of co-operative women went to the House of Commons in 1905 when the Women's Suffrage Bill was talked out. But they were peaceable, and consequently Liberal journalism did not take any interest in their claim to the vote. Yes; we know to whom we ought to be grateful, and we are rather inclined to agree with the schoolboy who said that though he could not approve of their object, he thoroughly approved of their methods.

Even the most brilliant services do not give the societies the right to decide that any class of women are to be shut out from political power. Really, it is a world of upside down in which Women Suffragists, and such determined ones too, go about telling the poor housewives that they must on no account ask for the vote, because there is not the least chance of their getting it. What would we think of Russians, who, when they were offered the first Duma, should have begged to have the third, for the reason that they were more likely to get it? Or of Irish, who should ask for a Parliament of landlords? Or of the workmen, if, because there were more of them than of the upper class, they had asked only for votes for men earning 40s. a week? The working housewife has in her poverty, and in the helplessness that goes with poverty, and by her occupation of economist for the people, a stronger right to representation than the married woman who owns land or houses; and there is no reason why she should not say so. Even the policymongers have a saying: "Ask for what you want, and take what you can get." But if the suffrage is to be limited, the limitation which shuts out the woman qualified by poverty, work, and motherhood is the most dangerous there could be.

The leaders of the Suffrage Societies no doubt have it in mind to use the vote when they get it, to strengthen certain ideas and ways of life. One can only judge of those ideas from their record and their words, and I am open to correction as to both. One would expect and hope that women's first thought in politics would be for their personal freedom and the protection of children and of motherhood. It is a natural result of the too great differentiation between men's and women's lives that men, who have had to think first of earning, should legislate in the interests of property. But women, who have had to think first of taking care of the young, the old, the sick, and even the able-bodied who will not sew on their own buttons, should put personal care and personal relations before property. So far as there is a distinctive women's aspect of politics, this is it; and our national life suffers deeply from its not being represented. But is this what the Suffrage Societies express? The older societies of the National Union have inherited the traditions of the women pioneers, to whom we owe so much in respect of their successful professional work, and whose chief legislative triumphs were the Married Women's Property Acts. Those Acts, while they have protected married women's earnings and property, have left the working mother in a cruelly helpless position; because her usual case is to have no earnings and no property. It does not require much special knowledge or insight to perceive that what working wives want (I do not mean to say what they ought to want) more than anything else is food for the children and leave to take care of them. They want to retain the right to work for wages, which the "militant" societies so eloquently claim for them; but still more they want the right not to work for wages when they cannot do so without injury to themselves and their children.

Some of us thought the debate on unemployment at the Women's Co-operative Congress the most moving speech we had ever heard. It was brought forward by one of the branches, without suggestion from any official; and anyone who listened must have noticed that it was the unemployment of men that the delegates had in mind. A married women's charter would include, among other things, (1) work for their husbands, and (2) maintenance for themselves during the years when they cannot support themselves and their young children. To get a legal right to this, it is suggested that a woman should have the power to obtain a magistrate's order, requiring her husband to maintain her and the children, the amount being fixed with due regard to the circumstances, as in the case of a separation order. If this power is given, it seems just that the wife's general power to pledge her husband's credit should be abolished, and she should alone be liable for her expenditure for the household. Failing the husband, her own earnings and property are liable for the children's support; but in very many cases a better resort would be to a decent form of State maintenance, such as the reform of the Poor-law should provide. The neglect of husbands to maintain their wives and children, not to speak of incapacity from various causes, seems to be very common. Working women, even though they belong, like the co-operators, to quite the thriftiest section of the working class, know this well, though pride forbids them to tell their own sufferings, still more to take the insulting form of State maintenance we now offer them in return for their honorable work. An alternative to the maintenance order would be some form of State-aided motherhood insurance. But the maintenance order, perhaps, offers fewer difficulties.

The third point of the women's charter would be a legal claim to the savings made from the house-money. A recent case in a court of law has shown co-operative women that their savings may be successfully claimed by their husbands, even when invested in a co-operative society or a savings bank; and there are, unfortunately, many women who have to try to keep secret the existence of a little hoard, treasured up, to apprentice a son, or against loss of work, or for the baby's expenses of birth. That this should be taken for betting or drink is perhaps more dreaded by such women than anything but loss of work; and it often is so taken. It would be too long to suggest here how a claim on savings might be given without injustice to the husband. I only wish to show what needs are felt by working wives, and why we should allow them to speak for themselves instead of putting their fate into the hands of other women. Miss Pankhurst says: "In some way or other, perhaps through some system of co-operative housekeeping, economic independence must sooner or later be made a possibility for all married women." Wage-earning for everybody is excellent as an ideal for the distant future; but meantime women and babies are starving. Some of the Suffragist leaders—I do not know how many—think that married women could and should earn their own living throughout life. Perhaps many could; but that all should do so would mean a very brutal relation between men and women. We are not savages. We think, perhaps wrongly, that clothes, personal cleanliness, and five-roomed dwellings are necessaries; and therefore we require a great deal of domestic service. Wives should have every chance of doing more skilled work; but the most urgent thing just now is to relieve them from part of the treble burden of child-rearing, housework, and earning, which many have to bear and fail under; and the easiest part of the burden to shift is earning. The rest must take time, and can only come by women's own will.

We look upon the Limited Bill, in its bearing on this fact, among other things, and the standpoint is not a bad one, for civilisation may be well tested by the conditions of marriage and of motherhood.

The present state of things is murderous to babies, and entirely hateful to ordinary public opinion, both of men and women. But there seems to be some danger that the Limited Bill, if passed, would tend to perpetuate it, in obedience to a theory of emancipation which is not sufficient for present needs, except those of a few educated women who are in advance of their time.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I, in company with many Liberals, have read with surprise your hedging leader on the subject of Woman's Suffrage in last week's issue.

That the Conservatives should try and father the cause of Women's Suffrage on to the Liberals is natural enough. The House of Commons is already sufficiently discredited to make it safe for the House of Lords, sure as they are of the support of the governing caste, to flout the House of Commons; but the admission of women to the suffrage would make the whole question of representation such a farce that the House of Commons would presently disappear. It is impossible to suppose that strong and virile services would have any respect in the opinion of a House so elected. That the Tories may wish to drive the Liberals to such a position is, as I have said, natural, but that they should fall into the trap as they seem to be doing does not argue much wisdom. I trust it may be only a temporary insanity.—Yours, &c.,

Palace Hôtel, Lucerne,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—You ask, "What does 'votes for women' mean?" and very pertinently point out that what the Militant Suffragists demand means "Votes for women of property"—a distinctly reactionary measure that no Liberal Government could possibly sanction. But it is suggested that a Tory Government might pass such a measure for the benefit of their party. If this could be, how ghastly the disappointment for the poor women who have been enlisted by the Suffragettes, and fired with enthusiasm by the idea that "votes for women" means some great good for the poor and suffering—some large alleviation of the misery of the world or some strange brightening and beautifying of the common lot!

But I do not think this can ever be. It is possible, indeed, that Suffragettes may be subsidised by Tories or Protectionists or "the trade," and encouraged to try the tempers and waste the time of a Liberal Ministry, and that any of the enemies of the people would be glad to secure allies by their assistance. But it is scarcely needful to tell you that "votes for women" is not (as some of the wild women seem to think) a trinket that a Minister may be teased into giving away. So great a measure must needs be laid before the present electorate as the principal issue at a general election, and there can be little doubt that the majority of the present voters would have been opposed to it a few years since, and are more strongly opposed to it to-day.

Of course, all women who wish for votes are not wild women. Mr. Zangwill says that only fools judge of women generally by the extravagances of a few of the most violent, while Mr. Nevinson gives to the most violent the credit of being the leaders of a righteous rebellion. (Has he not seen so much of things that should be rebelled against that he has come to think rebellion a good in itself?) But whether the Suffragettes are few in number and not fair representatives of their sex and cause, or whether they are many and truly representative, there is no doubt that their lively proceedings have had one effect. They have given great offence to thousands—made great numbers of electors into determined opponents of Women's Suffrage and converted former friends into enemies. I do not pretend to know Mr. Winston Churchill's thoughts, but I should think it very unlikely that he is to-day as great a believer in the sweet reasonableness of womankind as he was before his experiences at Manchester and Dundee.

Some journalists are greatly impressed by the great Hyde Park meeting. They tell us wonderful things. They have found out that women can talk, and that they are very determined to have their own way. But these are scarcely new discoveries. Socrates knew the length of a woman's tongue, and the "Wif of Bathe" knew that—

> "Woman desires to have soverainetee,
> As wel over hir husbond as hir love,
> And fer to ben in maistree him above."

It is thought wonderful and portentous that there was a great crowd in Hyde Park, but is it strange? These ladies have made themselves extremely conspicuous, and the names of some of them are known all over the country. They have a following of enthusiastic disciples, and a great number of determined opponents. With loud advertisement they proclaim a great show in the centre of the greatest city in the world, and on a Sunday. It is a fine day, there is no other show open, and all their friends come and a good many of their enemies, and a vast concourse of people, who are quite indifferent to the ostensible object of the meeting, but curious to see the show or to see the women who have become so notorious. Because there was a great crowd must we assume that the country approves of the proceedings of the Suffragettes?—of the disturbance of political meetings, the promotion of street rows, the defiance of the police, and the ridiculous attempt to dictate the policy of the representatives of the country and the Ministers of the Crown under pain of violence from a knot of women?

We are not yet ripe for "the monstrous regiment of women." A spoilt child screams and stamps till a foolish mother gives what it wants, but if it pursues the same tactics with a severer guardian it gets, not what it wants, but what it deserves. A husband often gives way to a scolding wife, and consents to foolishness for the sake of peace, but I cannot believe anything so utterly absurd as that the collective manhood of England should sink so low as to be bullied by a handful of women, however big a handful they may be.

If any measure of Women's Suffrage is ever to be passed in this country, it must, at any rate, wait until the resentment which has been aroused by these foolish women has died down.—Yours, &c.,

Frank Bowly.

Charlbury, June 29th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The sentimental sophistries of the Suffragists cannot alter facts. They are claiming equal rights without equal responsibilities, and they would also retain all their sex privileges, e.g., being saved first from shipwreck, &c., &c. As for adult Women's Suffrage, woman would become, not equal, but "the predominant partner."

As regards one of the male responsibilities (military service), although a minority of our men join our Navy, Army, and Territorials, this does not alter the fact of the responsibility of the male sex. Moreover, if the Suffragist denials were correct, it would become an argument for universal military service.

Next, the "maternity" argument does not justify a sexual revolution; while the Suffragists would actually first give votes (of course, involving Parliamentary and Cabinet seats) to the surplus single women, whose discontent is the real driving force of this agitation.

Now, what causes this sad and increasing surplus of single women? It is because men go abroad, whereas their sisters will not or cannot. I am no enthusiastic "Imperialist," but while you have an empire, both sexes should bear their share in colonising it. I passed long years in places where women were few and immensely valued. Again, the surplus women at home are competing with men, thus causing yet more male emigration. Again, the women who do secure good incomes do not marry, as the men they supplant usually do. Again, many men abroad die (battle, disease, &c.).

As regards the Hyde Park crowds, the great majority were either indifferent or hostile, and the Suffragettes were protected from some of the latter by their one-time foes, the police. Mesdames! "The bedrock of law is force, and the force of the community is male."—Yours, &c.,

THE MEANING OF "BANDE MATARAM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your reviewer writes, "The symbol is not the same as the reality. When Mr. Rees sings 'Rule Britannia' is he worshipping a penny figure of a woman with a trident, sitting on a shield?" Now, this just touches the point. No matter whether "Bande Mataram" did mean "Hail! Motherland" instead of "Hail! Mother Kali"—which I gather your reviewer admits that it does—the question is the symbol, and the song was before, and certainly is now, the symbol of sedition. "Rule Britannia" is not the symbol of sedition. I shall continue to sing "Rule Britannia"; and when the Bengali agitators sing "Bandi Mataram" in the same spirit, it will not matter whether they refer to Mother Bengal or Mother Kali.—Yours, &c.,

J. D. REES.

Travellers' Club, S.W.,
June 30th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the "Bande Mataram" controversy in the columns of THE NATION my views on it, as expressed in my book, "Indian Problems," are quoted. The "Bande Mataram" song in the Bengali novel "Anandamath" is no doubt in praise of Bengal, and expresses the love of her sons for the mother country. I have discussed its origin and true significance in "Indian Problems" (pages 65-68). Mr. J. D. Rees, M.P., has personally no knowledge of the Bengali language except perhaps through the rather inaccurate medium of Anglo-Indian literature. Mr. Rees has evidently accepted the dictum of Dr. Grierson, who unfortunately has lent the weight of his name and reputation as an Oriental scholar to a theory which is not calculated to enhance his reputation as an authority on Hindu literature. Some time ago in the columns of the "Times," Dr. Grierson denied the existence in Hindu literature of the use of the word "mata" (mother) in the sense of mother country, and said that the "Bande Mataram" was a direct invocation to the goddess Kali! Thus an inaccurate dictum was uttered to which Mr. J. D. Rees and other Anglo-Indians have fallen victims. The question of the true significance of the "Bande Mataram" is no longer of academic interest, but of great political importance. A good deal of the present unrest in India is due to the ignorance of Anglo-Indian officials of Hindu life and habits of thought. They unwittingly create a Hindu "classic," which, having emanated from savants, may be "scientific," but nevertheless is un-Hindu, because it fails to represent true Hindu sentiment. As Lord Cromer points out in "Modern Egypt," "half the evils of the world come from inaccuracy." Though a great philologist, Dr. Grierson, I am sorry to say, after spending the best part of his life in Bengal, has failed to grasp the spirit of the Bengali language and true Bengali sentiment. The "Bande Mataram" no more means an invocation to Kali than "Rule Britannia" means an invocation to the figure of a woman with a trident sitting behind a shield!

I regret to say that no Hindu will agree with Dr. Grierson's dictum that the word "mata" meant one of three things—"(1) the goddess Kali, (2) the cow, (3) the goddess of small-pox." The cow is no doubt really included in the orthodox meaning of the word "mata," but the other two do not, properly speaking, answer to the Hindu idea of the word "mata" at all. To a good Hindu, and specially to a Bengali, it means something quite different. Both Dr. Grierson and Mr. Rees are retired members of the Indian Civil Service. I wonder whether in the course of their reading, or their intercourse with respectable Hindus, they ever came across the well-known Hindu saying, "Sapta mata pancha pita" (seven mothers and five fathers). I think Dr. Grierson must have heard, and perhaps forgotten, this saying, which every Hindu boy of respectable family—whether on the banks of the Ganges or those of the Godavery—is taught, as a Christian boy the Catechism. In any Sanskrit or Bengali dictionary will be found the "Seven mothers," which are (1) your own mother, (2) the wife of your preceptor, (3) the wife of a (learned) Brahman, (4) the queen of your country, (5) the cow, (6) your wet-nurse, and (7) the earth. The last is significant; it means the whole earth, as well as the part in which one is born called "janma-bhumi." There is an old Hindu saying prevalent throughout Aryan India: "Janani janma-bhumischa svargadapi gariyasi"; "janani"="mata"=mother; i.e., "mother and motherland are dearer than heaven." This saying was common among the Hindus—whether in Bengal or Maharastra—long before England had anything to do with India, and is still extensively used in vernaculars like the Bengali, the Hindi, and the Marathi. In the popular acceptance the term "mata" is not confined to the three cases Dr. Grierson mentions. He may remember the well-known Hindi folk song:—

"Dharti mata pani dé, Pani ki pakhal dé," &c., &c.

"Dharti" is the corruption of the Sanskrit word "Dharitri," meaning the earth; therefore "dhartimata" is "mother earth." Mother earth is not a modern idea. It will be found in the "Yujurvedi Sandhya," "prithivi," mentioned as "devi," and the word "mata" is applicable to all "devis," and is by no means confined to Kali only. I venture to assert, with all due deference to so high an authority as Dr. Grierson, that the idea of a "mother country" is by no means foreign to India, and has not been borrowed by Anglicised Bengalis from English literature, as he suggested in the "Times." Though in "Anandamath," among other goddesses, Kali is invoked by the use of the phrase "Bande Mataram," I do not think that he is right in saying that "Bande Mataram" is necessarily the same as the more colloquial phrase, "Kali mai ki jai" (Victory to mother Kali). I may say that the term "mata" as applied to the goddess of small-pox, or even by itself and not in the form of "ma kali" (mother Kali), would be quite unintelligible in Lower Bengal and to people who speak the Bengali language. I could quote instances to show (1) that "mata" can be and is frequently used to mean more than the three objects of devotion mentioned by Dr. Grierson; (2) that it can be, and is, used to describe India as a whole (Bharata-mata), or any particular part as referring to the speaker's birthplace Bengal (e.g., Banga-mata). As I pointed out in the "Indian Problems," some passages in the "Bande Mataram" are more on the lines of "La Marseillaise" than "Die Wacht am Rhein," and it has got very unsavoury associations—plunder and murder.—Yours, &c.,

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

SIR,—During my absence from home in the last few weeks I did not see your paper, but trust that it is not too late to make some comment on your article in your issue of the 6th inst. on "The Lost Liberty of the Road."

While sympathising to a very great extent with the point of view of the writer, and whilst admitting that all motor-cars are, in the dry summer months, to a certain degree a nuisance, and that some motor-cars are at all times driven so as to be an unmitigated and intolerable nuisance, I beg to be allowed to deprecate the general violence of your article.

I am myself a motorist of considerable experience, and

I can quite fairly claim that I am both a careful and a considerate driver. I am also accustomed to drive and ride horses, and to use a bicycle. Many of my friends are motor drivers and owners, so that I have a fair knowledge of motor-cars and motor-car users, and I beg accordingly most emphatically to protest against two impressions given by your article.

Firstly, we are not all, and we are not most of us, "road hogs," nor are we all, nor are the most of us, brutal aristocrats, using the roads for our own selfish pleasure regardless of the comfort of others. I can hardly think of any of my motoring friends who are not decent law-abiding citizens, with at least the normal degree of unselfishness and consideration for others; and to give the impression that all motorists may be classed together as brutal criminals which your article, though it professes to discriminate, undoubtedly does, is in the highest degree offensive.

Secondly, in the practical proposals of the article, as also in others said to be on the point of introduction into the House of Commons, there is strong internal evidence of a want of knowledge of motor-cars. To compare a butcher's cart driven furiously round a corner with a modern motor-car, moving at a like or greater pace, is to entirely ignore the differences between the two. It is as absurd to think of them as the same because they both go on wheels as it would be to regard a crossbow and a modern rifle as alike as weapons of precision because they both discharge missiles.

I have, during the last year, driven a car of moderate power fitted with a good speedometer, and I have learnt several things from its use. The first is never to accept any man's opinion as to speeds of cars which are based on an estimate alone. A second thing I learnt with great surprise is the, comparatively speaking, high speeds with which one may drive not only with safety, but without causing alarm to other road users. I live in an ancient city with narrow and tortuous streets. I found, to my great surprise, that when I was driving entirely cautiously and considerately, so cautiously and considerately that I should be quite prepared to accept the judgment of the writer of your article as to the safety of the pace, I was moving at a rate of ten to twelve miles an hour in the narrowest streets, and of fourteen to eighteen, or even twenty, in the wider streets. I am prepared to demonstrate the safety of such speed, and the entire absence of cause of complaint by any other road user, to the writer of the article or to anyone else at any convenient time, and to challenge him to deny it.

The accusation made against the police and the county magistrates of favoring the motorist is entirely and wonderfully new, and one calculated to bring a smile to his lips. It is in the highest degree ludicrous.

Any new legislation must be such as to commend itself to the reasonable motor-driver as fair, otherwise the same intolerable condition as maintains at present will be continued, under which every motorist who goes into the country breaks the law every furlong he runs. To make new legislation, or even to propose it, a first essential, if it is to be sound, is knowledge of the motor, as well as knowledge of the roads. There is the strongest internal evidence in the article that the writer does not possess this knowledge. The article makes two points against the motor which may be more or less valid. First, that they have made the streets less safe for children to play in. This may or may not be so. The streets never were safe places for children to play in, and if the motor-car has made this more obvious, it should be counted as all to the credit of the motor-car. Neither horse manure nor motor grease is good for them to roll in, and the sooner proper playgrounds in or near every street are provided for children, the better. It may be necessary to make the motorist, or the classes the motorist come from, pay for them: but made and paid for they must be, and the sooner this is recognised and done, the better for the health and welfare of the community.

One thing remains—the dust nuisance; and it must be admitted that it is an intolerable plague. It must also be just as clearly remembered that the motor-car does not make the dust. The dust plague must be ended. There are two methods, and two methods only, by which this may be done so far as motor-cars are concerned in causing it. One is to prohibit the motor-car—that is to say, to literally put a spoke in the wheels of progress—and to leave the minor nuisance of the dust as distributed by winds and other vehicles; the other is to make modern roads for modern needs. Surely no "progressive" journal can hesitate in which is the sound demand.

Again let the motorist or his class pay. He can well afford it, or the nation can afford to make him do it, to the great advantage of the nation, motorist and non-motorist.—Yours, &c.,

PETER MACDONALD.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article on "The Lost Liberty of the Road" will appeal to every unprejudiced man who reads it, and I cannot but hope that the article may induce some movement for effecting such alterations in the law and in its administration as may remove, or at least reduce, the evils from which we have so long suffered.

It has appeared to me for a long time that the only way in which the subject can be fairly and effectually dealt with is by the formation of a strong popular association for the recovery of our right to the enjoyment of our highways. Such an association, if temperately formed, would, I believe, be subscribed to by thousands, if not tens of thousands, of people.

No one can desire to put an end to an industry which is world-wide, and which is capable of affording pleasure to many and is of great public utility. All that is desired is that the traffic should be conducted with due regard to the comfort of the community. For commercial purposes every facility should be given, but it is the pleasure motoring which causes the nuisance, and this is, and must be, enjoyed by a very small minority—a minority of wealthy, influential people, whose position makes it somewhat difficult to compel their attention unless a very strong popular representation can be organised.

The dust difficulty could be overcome, either by prohibiting such pace as raises dust, or by taxing the pleasure vehicles sufficiently to enable local authorities so to deal with the road surface as to prevent dust being raiseable.

The pace difficulty cannot be met by any speed limit, but only by the enforcement of the law against furious or dangerous driving, judging each case by the particular circumstances; and clear infractions of the law should, as you suggest, be primâ facie visited on the owner, not the driver, of the car, and by imprisonment of such owner on second or third offence.

If you could give your great influence to start an association on the above or similar lines, you would be conferring an appreciable benefit on the community; and nothing that I have suggested would interfere with the due enjoyment of their sport by the large body of motorists who pursue it with proper regard to the feelings and rights of others.—Yours, &c.,

H. E. GRIBBLE.

Wimbledon, June 6th, 1908.

P.S.—The above was written on June 6th, but would not have been sent to you but for Lord Russell's letter published last Saturday.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with amazement Lord Russell's letter in your last issue, in which he brushes contemptuously aside the statements in your article on the above subject on June 6th. He says in so many words that there is no one who knows anything about the subject, "whether he be motorist, magistrate, or chief constable," who will agree with "this sort of exaggeration."

I endorse your statement that twelve miles an hour is the utmost limit of pace that is consistent with public safety in towns and villages; indeed, I would go further, and say that in towns the speed limit ought not to exceed ten miles. I am perfectly willing to admit that the great majority of motorists are tolerably reasonable people; but unfortunately a considerable minority exist who show no consideration whatever for the rights of pedestrians, and since this form of locomotion has come to stay, it is imperative that the powers of the magistrates under the Motor Car Act of 1903 require to be extended. If that were done it would be possible to bring to reason, by summary jurisdiction, everyone, whether they be "noblemen or gentlemen," who show a callous indifference to the rights of the public on the high road, and especially in the streets of towns. The simple truth is that the countryside is infested with a certain number of well-dressed, well-endowed hooligans, who treat a fine with contempt, since to them it is a bagatelle, and who, in consequence, ought not to be allowed to escape short of imprisonment. If such an extension of power were given to the magistrates of the land as I suggest, it is quite certain they would not exercise it harshly; at the same time they would see that the rights of the public were properly safeguarded.

I endorse your own remark that the "depreciation of property on main roads" is a fact familiar to everyone—but Lord Russell—through the clouds of dust which settle on every roadside garden, to say nothing of the intolerable noise and smells. Personally, I am inclined to think that these 40,000 motorists—their number is rapidly increasing in every part of the country—will force to the front the question of re-erecting the old toll-bars, at least at the entrance of every country town, and especially those which have the misfortune to lie along the most frequented routes. Magistrates who are motorists are amongst the first to recognise that the law needs amendment, and, as a Justice of the County of Sussex, I heartily support your energetic and public-spirited protest.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Lord Russell's letter throws some light on a matter that has puzzled me. For some years I have found much pleasure in cycling or walking in the "lanes and byways" of Surrey. The enormous number of motor-cars one now meets there have, however, entirely destroyed this pleasure, and after having had on two or three occasions to dash into a hedge to escape destruction, I have, like many others, deemed it prudent to abandon the pastime, the price being too heavy. Often have I wondered why motorists should choose "lanes and byways," which I should have thought inconvenient for their form of sport. Lord Russell's letter clears up this point. The law requires that cars shall not be driven along a public road faster than a mile in three minutes. It now appears that the vigilance of the police in interfering with the sport of dashing along the main roads at a higher rate of speed has caused some inconvenience to the motorists for whom Lord Russell speaks, and they have therefore turned their attention to our "lanes and byways," in which this "technical offence" may, they hope, be committed with impunity—to themselves!—Yours, &c.,

"AN INVASION OF LIBERTY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. J. M. Robertson acts on the principle of the maxim—"no case, bully your opponent's witnesses." Beyond impeaching "the moral value" of my judgment, characterising my criticism as "a wanton aspersion," and hinting that I have made a false statement regarding your article, his letter contributes little to the discussion. In the first place, I stated that the Prevention of Crimes Bill was introduced under the Ten Minutes' Rule with the obvious intention of curtailing discussion because I believed that to be the case. I still believe it, and I should be glad if Mr. Robertson can explain for what other reason the Bill was introduced under that rule. This, however, is but a minor point. What I think everyone has a right to resent in Mr. Robertson's letter is not his calm assumption of moral superiority, but the attitude which relegates all who do not think about the Bill as he does to an intellectually inferior class "who have evidently never before considered the problems involved," and who for that reason denounce the measure "with all the confidence of a first impression." Is Mr. Robertson's case so weak that he is compelled to have recourse to this sort of thing?

On the evil of entrusting the liberty of a large number of criminal, but not necessarily hardened and vicious, citizens to the unfettered decision of warders and prison officials, he says nothing. What virtue lies in the blessed word "indeterminate"? I can see none, but perhaps Mr. Robertson may help my understanding. Moreover, as a writer in the current number of "The Humanitarian" points out, the application of the principle of indeterminate sentences "presupposes the existence of a type of judge, magistrate, prison governor, visiting justice, gaoler, and policeman, which does not exist, as a class, at the present day." I contend that the efforts of those who call themselves prison reformers would be more usefully employed in producing this better type of official than in increasing the stringency of the criminal law.

In conclusion, may I express the regret I feel at seeing Mr. Robertson on the side of despotism and cruelty? I have always had the greatest respect for the fine stand he has so often made in defence of unpopular causes, and I am correspondingly depressed when I see him among the Littlers, the Lawrences, and the Andersons.—Yours, &c.,

"A DISTANT DRUM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I congratulate Mr. Laurie Magnus on his discovery of blank verse in my article. Perhaps he will next discover an island in Regent's Park.

But when he says I dropped into blank verse unconsciously he is wrong. I dropped into it with conscious deliberation, because I aimed at the proper mock-heroic tone. I ventured to hope that both the verse and its cause might be obvious, to say nothing of the parody of one of Wordsworth's best-known lines, which he quotes against me.

I hoped too much; but Mr. Laurie Magnus did discover the verse, and that is something.—Yours &c.,

A SONG OF SEMIRAMIS.

WHO hath loved Queen Semiramis,
These many years by visions led,
Who hath desired her mouth to kiss,
A lotus-blossom, amorous, red;
He should have love for wine and bread,
Loving her once in Babylon;
Her beauty shamed the mounting sun—
Semiramis the queen is dead.

For wonder of Semiramis
All the brown world bent down with dread,
She was a glorious queen, I wis,
Splendid and shameful, all men said:
Beauty she had in her soul's stead,
Now is her empery foredone,
In Babylon the lizards run,
Semiramis the queen is dead.

The splendor of Semiramis
Is sunken in a shallow bed,
For sound of lutes the serpents hiss,
Her clamorous lovers all are fled.
None sitteth at her shrouded head:
Of singing-girls she hath not one,
Whispering joy, now joy is none:
Semiramis the queen is dead.

ETHEL TALBOT.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

WE learn that the Abbé Loisy is to be a candidate for the chair of the History of Religions at the Collège de France, rendered vacant by the death of M. Jean Réville. M. Loisy's friends are confident that his candidature will be successful, and there certainly could not be a more admirable appointment. In any case, it is gratifying to know that M. Loisy has no intention of abandoning the studies that have won for him so commanding a place among the theologians of our time.

WE miss M. Loisy's name on the programme of the Third International Congress for the History of Religions, which has just been issued. The Congress meets at Oxford on the 15th of September, and many leading scholars, both English and Continental, are to take part. The fundamental rule of the Congress is that all discussions must be of an essentially historical character, and controversy regarding the merits of opposing dogmas will not be allowed. Among those who have promised to contribute papers are Professor A. Bertholet, Dr. E. Wallis Budge, Professor Lewis Campbell, Professor R. H. Charles, Mr. Edward Clodd, Professor E. von Dobschütz, Dr. L. R. Farnell, Principal Garvie, Professor Margoliouth, Professor J. H. Moulton, Professor Pfleiderer, and Professor A. H. Sayce.

THE announcement that Mr. T. W. Russell has almost completed a book, to be called "Recollections of Forty-five Years of Public Life in Ireland," gives promise of an interesting addition to the list of political memoirs. Mr. Russell played a very powerful part in the Home Rule agitation. He was the best of the Unionist orators, and his excellent style, his sincerity and passion, made him a formidable campaigner. But he always spoke with reservation, especially on the land question. He has never forgotten his democracy—though he held office in a Conservative administration—and recent changes in Irish life have modified his political outlook, even if they have not vitally changed it.

SOME months ago we announced that Sir W. S. Gilbert was at work on a version of "H.M.S. Pinafore," in narrative form, to be published by Messrs. Bell as a color book. The volume is now completed, and may be expected early in October. Sir William Gilbert is, we understand, now engaged upon a companion volume based on "The Mikado." He rightly considers that he alone is in a position to give the world fresh information concerning the antecedents of Pooh-Bah. The "fresh information" can hardly fail to be diverting.

BIOGRAPHY promises to play as large a part in the autumn publishing season as it has done during the earlier portion of the year. The "Memoir Series," which has already given us several useful volumes, will be added to considerably. Among the additions promised is a book by Mr. Herbert M. Vaughan, to be called "The Medici Popes," in which special prominence is given to the social and artistic life of the brilliant Court of Leo X. Mr. A. C. Brett has written "Charles II. and his Court," giving a biographical account of Charles and his followers, but laying more stress on the personal and social side than on the political questions in which they were involved. Another volume in the same series is to be "Lorenzo the Magnificent, and Florence in Her Golden Age," by Mr. E. L. S. Horsburgh, who has written an excellent life of Savonarola in the series of "Oxford Biographies."

IN the biography of "Sir George Mackenzie, the King's Advocate, 1636-1691," announced for the autumn by Messrs. Longmans, Mr. Andrew Lang has a subject on which he is sure to write in interesting fashion. "Bluidy Mackenzie" enjoyed great reputation as an author, and is sometimes mentioned as one of the first Scottish men of letters who wrote a pure English style. He was a friend of Dryden, who speaks cordially of him, and, oddly enough, one of his books was dedicated to the pious Robert Boyle. Mackenzie's novel, "Aretina: Or the Serious Romance," is an Egyptian tale which does not belie its second title. It is terribly tedious, and written in the most stilted vein. Although his name is now almost a by-word of cruelty and subservience, there was another side to Mackenzie's character, and possibly Mr. Lang's work will help to alter the view usually taken of his career.

M. MAETERLINCK is at present staying in Normandy, where he is working on the last act of a new drama, to be entitled "Marie Magdeleine." Despite its Scriptural title, the characters of the play are philosophical entities rather than historical personages. Doubtless this trifling fact will not prevent the Censor, who licensed "Dear Old Charlie," from prohibiting this production of M. Maeterlinck in England. Those who have read the play describe it as marking an advance upon "Monna Vanna," both in stage-craft and in dramatic power. It will be performed in Paris early in the winter.

MR. EDWARD THOMAS has finished a book on the life and writings of Richard Jefferies, which will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson during the early autumn. Mr. Thomas has made an examination of the letters that were used by Sir Walter Besant while preparing the "Eulogy" of Jefferies issued just after the latter's death. Many fresh letters have since come to light, and Mr. Thomas has also collected much new biographical material from the friends and relatives of Jefferies. A feature of the new book will be the attention given to Jefferies' interesting, if unsuccessful, early work, a considerable portion of which is still unpublished in book form. As a writer on nature and out-door life, Mr. Thomas is rapidly making his mark. In regard to the coming volume, he has the further advantage of a long acquaintance with Jefferies' part of Wiltshire.

AN important work on "The Evolution of Modern Germany," by Mr. W. Harbutt Dawson, is to be published during the autumn by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Mr. Dawson is the author of several volumes dealing with German life and thought, and showing close and admirably arranged knowledge. The purpose of his coming book is to trace the economic and industrial transition through which Germany has passed during the last thirty or forty years. The book is, as far as possible, non-controversial, and questions like the relation between capital and labor, colonisation, State enterprise, Socialism, the prospects of agriculture, and the cost of Empire, are treated in a judicial spirit. Separate chapters are given to studies of the German industrialist, the urban workman, and the agricultural laborer, so that the book promises to be of value as a comparison of German conditions of life and labor with those at home.

THE Committee for the Survey of the Memorials of Greater London will publish this autumn the first volume of an account of all the buildings of historical value or beauty in Chelsea. It will be largely illustrated from photographs and drawings, and will be followed by three other volumes completing the full survey of the parish.

AN AMERICAN VIEW OF ENGLISH POLITICS.*

A SPECIAL interest attaches to the appearance of these two volumes at this particular time. Some years have passed since Professor Lowell published his extremely interesting studies on "Governments and Parties" in Continental Europe, in which he was constantly returning to his capital contention that Parliamentary Government can only succeed with a two-party system. In developing this argument, he pointed to the apparently incorrigible taste for changing Governments every few months in France, to the anarchical system of committees in the French Chamber, to evasions of the consequences of Cabinet responsibility in Italy, and to many other vices and abuses, offering a strong contrast to the secure and orderly habits of Parliamentary Government in the country which invented that art. During the years that have passed since that book was published there have been some notable developments alike here and in France which have given a special interest to that comparison. France has had far more stable Ministries, her committee system has been amended; and in England the state of things which Professor Lowell regarded as a necessary condition of successful Parliamentary Government has ceased to exist. When a third British Party can bring nearly fifty members into the House of Commons, the two-party system is, for the moment, at any rate, in abeyance.

Readers of Professor Lowell's earlier volume will perhaps be disappointed to find that comparatively little attention is given in his learned and comprehensive examination of our institutions to the interesting question which this new phenomenon raises. At the beginning of the life of the present Parliament many persons were struck by the resemblance between the composition of the British House of Commons and the French Chamber. In both cases the forces behind the Government were not a single party but a bloc, and there were presented many of the conditions that arise when a Government is dealing with a number of groups. If this state of things became permanent, English politics would tend to assume some of the features that Professor Lowell took as characteristic of the inefficiency of Parliamentary Government elsewhere. But, from his few and guarded allusions to the subject, we fancy that Professor Lowell does not expect this state of things to become permanent; and he thinks that the Labor Party will not last—at any rate, in anything like its present strength as a separate power. In this view we think he is mistaken. It is quite true that the Labor Party had unusually good fortune in the circumstances both of the last election and also of the first Session of this Parliament. It could not have wanted a better mobilising issue at the polls than the issue which had been raised by the blows struck at the trade unions, and the way in which the Government dealt with this question in 1906 enabled the Labor Members to point with justice to the value and importance of their presence and power. Professor Lowell naturally refers to these circumstances, and also to the tendency in our Parliamentary system to absorb third parties into the ranks of the Government or the Opposition: a tendency which is illustrated at this moment by the fate of some of the more conspicuous Free-Fooders. But when allowance is made for all these forces, we do not think many serious observers of modern politics have any doubt of the permanence or of the value of the Labor Party as a separate and vigorous Party; and it is therefore rather an omission in this work that it does not attempt to discuss the disturbance and modifications which the rise of a third party must cause in our politics. The effects are felt, of course, both in the House of Commons and in the country, and it would have been interesting to have had a fuller exposition of Professor Lowell's views on Proportional Representation and the Alternative Vote, proposals which, with the advent of a third party, become important as methods of securing not so much minority as majority representation. He is not very well-disposed to the Second Ballot, thinking its effect on the Continent has been to multiply groups.

Throughout his book Professor Lowell takes an essentially conservative view of English institutions. He feels the great elements of strength which underlie them. For example, he would doubtless maintain that under the two-party system we have built up a machinery which is far stronger than the machinery of Parliamentary government on the Continent, and therefore less liable to certain of the risks which he noticed in his surveys of French or Italian politics. Thus he describes our Parliamentary system as having made the Cabinet of the day autocratic, which certainly a French Ministry is not: though he adds that it is an autocracy "exerted with the utmost publicity under a constant fire of criticism, and tempered by the force of public opinion, the risk of a vote of want of confidence, and the prospects of the next election." When we compare that description with the state of things during the last year or eighteen months of Mr. Balfour's government, we may doubt whether these deterrents are always very effective as restraints on the autocrat. But, speaking generally, we fancy that few persons would quarrel with his account of the relations of the House of Commons to the Cabinet. The House of Commons, he points out, is finding more and more difficulty in passing an effective vote, except a vote of censure, while the Cabinet, on the other hand, if it has secured the initiative for almost all important legislation, finds a strict limit to the number or the completeness of the laws it can pass. This Professor Lowell does not regard as a disadvantage for a reason which most Liberals will not find very convincing. "The limited capacity of Parliament to pass statutes is not felt as a pressing evil, because the period of great remedial legislation is over. The transition from the political and industrial conditions of the eighteenth century has been accomplished, and the consequent change in laws and institutions has been, in the main, effected. The demand for radical legislation is therefore comparatively small, and for the time at least the process of making laws can afford to run slow."

This is not a view in which Liberals can be expected to acquiesce on coming into power after something like twenty years of reactionary or stagnant government. They have, therefore, every reason to be uncomfortable about a state of things which tends at once to restrict the amount of work Parliament can turn out and to restrict the part that the House of Commons can play in discussing and moulding the proposals of the Cabinet. Professor Lowell thinks that efficient Parliamentary government would be in serious danger if debate were much further restricted. The difficulties of Liberalism as a constructive force are, of course, greatly aggravated by the House of Lords. Professor Lowell is not very encouraging as to the prospects of removing this obstacle, though he roundly describes the House of Lords as "a tool of the Conservative Party." He thinks some relief from the congestion of business is to be found in the increasing tendency to devolve work which would formerly have been done by Parliament on the great administrative departments. This part of his work is particularly admirable and valuable. Nowhere has the Civil Service, with all its modern developments, been treated in so luminous and thorough a manner.

It is impossible to follow Professor Lowell through all the fields he has traversed in these volumes. In his twelve hundred closely packed pages he discusses not only central government and the party system, but the local organisation of parties, the development and forms of local government, the history of education, the Church, the limits of law, and the component parts of the Empire. He has naturally a great deal to say on the difference between our conception of law and the conception of law in countries that have the droit administratif. In his remarks on the history of local government he makes one statement which, we venture to think, is a misreading of the facts—the statement that down to the Poor Law re-organisation of 1834, local self-government, though aristocratic in the country, was democratic in the parish. It is difficult to apply the word democratic to a society whose economic servitude had been completed by the developments of the later eighteenth century, and if we looked only at the forms of government it must be remembered that the old vestries had tended to become closer and more exclusive as the century advanced. Not that Professor Lowell is often misled by mistaking the forms for

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

JACK SPURLOCK—PRODIGAL.
By G. H. LORIMER.

A new book by the Author of "The Letters of a Self-made Merchant to his Son" is bound to meet with a warm and wide welcome. Here it is, full of characters so human and humorous as to be worthy of the pen of Dumas père. Pharisees may condemn the work, and especially the retired bon vivant "Major," but all good men will love him and his protégé, Jack Spurlock. There is not half-a-page that will not raise a laugh, or a chapter that will not teach some of the laws of good fellowship.

DOMINY'S DOLLARS.
By B. PAUL NEUMAN, Author of "The Greatness of Josiah Porlick," "The Spoils of Victory."

This novel completes the trilogy which, under the general title "The Paths of the Blind," deals with the old but ever-recurring question, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" "Dominy's Dollars" illustrates some of the methods of the great American Trusts which have recently attracted so much attention.

the realities of government. He sees very clearly, for example, that the rule of a class in English politics has survived all the political reforms of the nineteenth century, and he analyses in a very interesting concluding chapter the causes and the consequences of our persistent class supremacy. He notes the tremendous influence of wealth, and contrasts American politics, where office is used to acquire wealth, with our politics, where wealth is used to acquire office. He proceeds to draw a picture rather idealised in some of its features of the "government of the people for the people by the best of the people," where the ruling class observes in politics the rules and standards by which its members learnt to guide their mutual dealings at school and in society. "There is probably no other career," he says, very justly, "in which a man of birth and means, with good abilities and moderate exertion, is so likely to win fame as in English politics." Another characteristic of English politics is, he thinks, the absence of bitterness, due partly to this social atmosphere and partly to the fact that political defeat does not mean the total loss of power and influence. Mr. Sidney Low, it will be remembered, urged this point at some length. Certainly, when a politician who lost office ran some risk of losing his head, political strife was naturally more vehement. Professor Lowell also thinks politics are less bitter because the differences of parties are not fundamental. But we must beware of thinking that violence and depth of conviction necessarily always go together. Party spirit never ran higher than it did in the most degenerate days of faction in Italy, when, for example, the people of Crema tore down the Christ from the altar because the head was turned to the Ghibelline shoulder. Yet those were days when factions fought for the merest echoes of old quarrels. In all this part of his book Professor Lowell follows very much the same train of thought as Mr. Low started.

We have left ourselves space for two comments only on Professor Lowell's reflections on the dominance of the governing class. One is that we doubt whether Professor Lowell realises that no class rules a country for nothing. In our case the price the governing class has asked and has got has been the subordination of all our institutions to the development of that class. Professor Lowell himself remarks on the special sanctity of land in England. The other reflection is that we think Professor Lowell possibly takes an exaggerated view in supposing that social influence will always play as overwhelming a part in politics as it has done hitherto. The last election showed that it is not true that the working classes always insist on being represented by members of the governing class. Much that Professor Lowell says in this connection might have been written three or four years ago without being questioned; but it is, we think, too early to conclude that the choice of workmen representatives by workmen electors in 1905 represented a mere passing phase.

This second volume, which completes Mr. Atlay's "Memoirs of Queen Victoria's Chancellors," starts with Lord St. Leonards and ends with two brief sketches of Lord Herschell and Lord Halsbury. The hero-worshipper will not find much to attract him in these eleven studies. Most of the eleven were competent judges; some of them were great lawyers; one or two were brilliant orators or crafty politicians; none of them were heroes. Their distinguishing marks are extreme solicitude for a career and an earnest determination not to risk it. How eagerly they climb, and how jealously they watch others climbing the ladder of professional fame! Indeed, there were many a "noble mind" delineated in this book if "the last infirmity" were the title deed and warrant of nobility. Englishmen may take comfort in the fact that the most unblushing and pushful of the lot was a Scot, John, Lord Campbell, of whom, "warm-hearted and affectionate as he was in the domestic relations," his admiring biographer is yet compelled reluctantly to predicate "a selfishness, a desperate eagerness to push to the front, and a perpetual air of calculation in all he writes which leaves an unpleasant taste behind." There are few sparks of generosity or sympathy in Campbell—not even when he refers to "the invariable and systematic conspiracy among the leaders to depress a junior and cut him off from all opportunity of gaining distinction"; for the junior in question was John Campbell. Happily for their inward comfort all these eminent men were buoyed up by the firm conviction that the scramble for briefs and places was all part of the Divine scheme of justice. Justice obviously requires that the parties to a case should be represented in court by a trained lawyer; whether justice equally requires that the richest rascal should be represented by the best counsel, and that the finest barristers should allow themselves to be retained and monopolised in advance and for all occasions by wealthy rogues is not quite so obvious; but the gentle steps by which this second doctrine has become part and parcel of the etiquette of the Bar will be readily appreciated by anyone who can plod through the lives and read the characters of the Lord Chancellors.

Whether or no the conditions of professional success, and the fact that the greatest glory follows the winning of a verdict for the wrong side, tend to produce cynicism, certain it is that the dullest life of the most successful barrister is relieved by occasional strokes of sardonic humour.† Even in so austere and devout a Protestant as Lord Cairns, or so pious an Anglo-Catholic as Lord Selborne, one may mark this strain. Soon after the Liberal victory, 1880, Lord Cairns remarked that most schoolmasters were Liberals. "A bad look out," said his friend. "On the contrary, I see in this great hope for the nation's future. The boys are certain to be Conservative." Roundell Palmer thus described his three years' apprenticeship to journalism as a "Times" leader writer: "I acquired some experience of the practice, certainly not without moral danger, of writing hastily, smartly, and, perhaps, censoriously, about matters of which I had no adequate knowledge." Strange to say, there is little sign that his own enormously lucrative practice ever presented any difficulties to this highly scrupulous man. The vulgar sobriquet of "'oly 'umbug" is extremely unjust, as Mr. Atlay properly remarks, and the following anecdote is almost cruel:—

> "On one occasion the Attorney General sent to ask the Chancellor (Westbury) as to the line he should follow in making a rather delicate statement in the House of Commons. 'Tell Palmer,' was the answer, 'that he need not be afraid of speaking the plain, unvarnished truth.'"

Palmer's success at the bar was due to his combination of the acumen of a medieval schoolman with the industry of a German Professor. On one occasion "he worked from 2 a.m. on Monday to late on Saturday without seeking his couch." His power of dispensing with sleep yet retaining full intellectual agility was the wonder and despair of his competitors.

The most jovial and popular of the Victorian Chancellors were Robert Rolfe, Lord Cranworth, and Frederick Thesiger, Lord Chelmsford. Greville found Rolfe's society "as agreeable as that of anybody I have ever met." After a quotation from Greville it is painful to find our author, who has some literary pretensions, collapsing into "Daily Mailese" as follows: "It may be added that his social attractiveness had been enhanced by his marriage, somewhat late in life, with the daughter of Thomas Carr, Esquire, Solicitor to the Excise, a well-known figure in literary and general company." At the age of seventy-five when, to everybody's surprise, Cranworth was asked to be Chancellor for the second time by Palmerston (who could not endure Roundell Palmer) someone congratulated him with "Well, Cranny, Kingsley is right, it is better to be good than clever."

Thesiger was of German stock. His grandfather, the nephew of a Lutheran Minister at Dresden, had emigrated to London and been lucky enough to get employment as amanuensis to Lord Rockingham, who made his wife Housekeeper of the Excise Office, "a very desirable sinecure." As counsel Thesiger was very successful. Tall, handsome, and vivacious, he talked to the jury "in a sort of homely chit-chat which robbed them of all suspicion." Moreover "an instinctive sense of finesse made him invaluable in cases where women were concerned; the display of conscious beauty and the blushes of assumed innocence found no loose joint in his harness." Thesiger made some quite good jokes, and united with a keen eye for the prizes of the pro-

The Daily News

CHARLES DICKENS IN 1846.

Honored tradition and the spirit of modern enterprise are combined in "The Daily News." Matters of serious interest are reported at length. Place is also found, in shorter form, for the lighter news items which are a feature of 20th century journalism.

"The Daily News" is the only London Liberal newspaper that devotes every day a whole page to Financial and Commercial matters, Trade and Market reports and Stock Exchange Intelligence.

Its daily Parliamentary report is far more detailed than that of any other ½d. paper, and nearly a column is given to the Law List.

If you do not read "The Daily News" it is impossible for you to follow the progress of Liberalism.

fession and the utmost readiness to take them, a refreshing modesty. Here is one of his happiest and best-known impromptus. When "Soapy Sam" left the Bishops to vote for Gladstone's Government in an important division on the Irish Church Bill, some simple peer cried out "the Bishop of Oxford is going the wrong way." "No," said Chelmsford, "it's the way to Winchester." And, sure enough, a few weeks later Wilberforce was promoted to the See of Winchester. Of Thesiger's modesty the following extract from the introduction to his reminiscences affords pleasant proof:—

> "If it should ever be thought worth while to publish the following details of my life, they may perhaps be thought not altogether unprofitable as affording an example of what abilities of no very high order, accompanied with unremitted industry and perseverence, and aided by a concurrence of favorable circumstances, may ultimately accomplish."

Many more extracts of a reasonably entertaining sort could be made from this book. It is not a brilliant performance, but the lives of the two most interesting men in the series, Lord Campbell and Lord Westbury, are certainly readable; the narrative is moderately impartial, and very discreet. Thus, after enlarging on the enormous number of judicial plums distributed by Lord Halsbury, Mr. Atlay remarks: "It would be unbecoming in me to offer any criticism as to the way in which that patronage has been exercised." We must congratulate Mr. Atlay on the accomplishment of a considerable task, in which he has followed at a long distance the famous performance of Lord Campbell.

A QUAKER CITIZEN.*

Quakerism belongs to the Mystic School of Religion. And this is true in spite of the fact that Quakerism has a noticeable record of initiative philanthropy and practical work. There is, in fact, no paradox in the assertion. Underlying the superficial incongruity there is a vital connection between the mystic spirit and altruistic activity. The mystic soul must live untrammeled by authority, the health of its inner life is freedom, and such a soul will never rest in contemplation alone. It pours out its fervour on others. In the Journal of the Quaker Mystic, John Woolman, the reader finds a record of active service for the betterment of mankind, and at the same time comes upon words which might have fallen from St. Francis of Assisi or Juliana of Norwich. George Fox was a Mystic, and yet no reformer was more sensitively alive to the importance of the practical element in the religious life. He joined the enthusiasm of the prophet to the instinct of the organiser. This union of the mystic spirit with enlightened common sense characterises the work and aims of the man whose life is the subject of the volume before us. One of a family of workers, of thinkers, and of successful organisers, John S. Rowntree pursued steadily and unweariedly his philanthropic labors, his private life moving in harmony with it, all graced with sympathy and dignity. Mr. Rowntree's home, like that of so many Quakers, surrounded him, as we are told in the "Memoir," with the triple bonds of love, duty, and joy in service. But the sovereign educator, liberty, was also present. His mother was of the saintly souls and exercised a powerful influence on her son. Late in life he says:—

> "The children of Friends have no need to wait for their first communion—they are privileged to come to it in the opening days of their Christian life."

At school he was popular; he was fond of games, and was a good cricketer. He early showed a love for reading. The school dinner-hour was one of enforced silence, and during these times he managed to read through Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." He passed straight from the Quaker school to active business life. He made his first mark at the age of twenty-four when he wrote his essay, "Quakerism, Past and Present." In this little work, as early as 1858, he struck the note which he never ceased to sound, the note of progress. "The very life of the Society," he says, "depends on going forward."

The young Quaker's appeal was to a Society limited and narrow in its spiritual and social outlook, and the exhortation came like a fresh breeze into an exhausted atmosphere. The pamphlet was not allowed to pass without censure, but it did its work. Dr. Hodgkin, in speaking not long ago of this essay, says:—

> "For the great changes that have now taken place, the essay of John S. Rowntree may almost be said to have given the signal; and with his deliberate wisdom and intimate knowledge of the conditions of the problem before us, he bore a large share in carrying those changes into effect."

The writing of this pamphlet, his biographer tells us, was an epoch in his life and colored its whole aftercourse. It gave to the vision he had of a regenerated Quakerism its "form and pressure."

Mr. Rowntree had no University career; he passed through no Divinity course, and his life was that of an active business-man and citizen. He was Lord Mayor of York in 1881 when the British Association met there. With such municipal work he combined continuous labor in the Quaker ministry, and notable service in the cause of girls' and women's education, and throughout his life he was a devoted teacher in the adult school. Not an eventful life, nor one lit up by striking talent, or marked by extraordinary achievement. But not without its touch of greatness; a life to be proud of as springing from English soil.

A glance at the titles of the papers which the editor has selected will give some notion of the special interests of Mr. Rowntree. They deal with: "The History of the Society of Friends, its place in the Religious Life of England," "The Relations of Denominational to National Life," Educational Reform, and include Historical Sketches and Biography.

The Essay on Fox is full of insight into his times, and shows intimate acquaintance with the religious sects of the Stuart period. It is, taken all in all, the best account of Fox we have. The queer-titled paper, "Micah's Mother," should be of interest to women readers, for it rests on an epistle by Fox, entitled "This is an encouragement to all the women's meetings in the world." The essay shows much of Mr. Rowntree's attitude of mind, of his peculiar strain of humour, and of his familiarity with out-of-the-way Quaker literature. But it is, perhaps, in reading his paper on "The Relations of Denominational and National Life," that we come nearest to his mind. While he fully recognises the necessity for participation in the larger national life, he stands for denominationalism, because he holds that through the exercise of the religious denominational duties the character of the good citizen is best formed:—

> "Men," he says, "need to be spiritually equipped for the most secular services. And when the stream of human life and effort widens out, is there not more need than ever that the channels of communication with its source be kept free, deep, and unclogged? To fulfil the outward duties of life nobly, there must be a vigorous, continually renewed, and quickened inward or religious life—a vigorous church life, in the most spiritual sense of the word."

His own practice proved that for him this was no mere theory, but that it was the working plan of his life-structure.

Miss Doncaster, in the last words of her "Memoir," which is written throughout with sympathy and insight, sums up well Mr. Rowntree's leading characteristics:—

> "The fervour of the prophet and the calm wisdom of the sage; the wide vision of the historian or the statesman, and the precision of the close observer of facts; the grasp of broad principles and the power of applying them in detail; deep reverence of spirit and manner, combined with originality and humour; the power of rule with the power to obey; love of the past together with readiness to go forward: all these qualities were united in the character of John S. Rowntree, and all were devoted to the service of his fellow-men, which was his service for Christ."

THE PROBLEM OF "KITTY TAILLEUR."*

In "Kitty Tailleur" Miss Sinclair has handled a very delicate subject, and though opinion will be divided as to the artistic success of her picture, no intelligent person will question its sincerity and moral force. The question of the good and bad effects of keeping the existence of such women as Kitty Tailleur from the knowledge of girls has been treated by Meredith with searching insight in "One of Our Conquerors," and most of our readers will remember Definitive Bonds carrying a full half-year's coupon, payable on the 15th January next, will be delivered in due course after payment in full.

In default of payment of the instalment due on 16th July the Allotment will be subject to cancellation and the amount previously paid to forfeiture.

The "A" Debenture Bonds are, in effect, a first charge on the old system of 208 miles of railway, through the Company's holding of the entire Stock and Bond Capital of the American Company below referred to. This system has for some time been in successful operation in the Philippines, and its net revenue amounted in 1907 to about £126,000, while the interest charge on the outstanding "A" Debenture Bonds is £68,000.

In addition to being secured on the old railway system, the Bonds will be similarly secured upon about 444 miles of new lines now under construction and expected to be completed by 1913. These lines, combined with those of the old system, are estimated to yield ample revenue for the service of the whole authorised issue, not only of the "A" Debenture Bonds, but also of the "B" Debenture Bonds, which rank behind them.

The concession for the old system of 208 miles of railway and the further 444 miles now in course of construction was granted by the U.S. Government to the Manila Railroad Company (an American Company). This American Company will operate the railways, and its whole Stock and Bond Capital, with the exception of Directors' qualifications, has been, or will be, as issued, lodged with the Merchants' Trust, Ltd. (the Trustees), to secure the "A" and "B" Debenture Bonds of the English Company.

The agricultural districts through which the Railways run are thickly populated, and many varieties of crops are produced, including rice, Manila hemp, copra, sugar and tobacco.

Attention is drawn to the accompanying copy of a letter dated 18th June, 1908, from General Edwards, the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs at Washington.

The position and prospects of the old Railway system and of the new lines under construction and to be built are set forth in a letter (enclosed in the prospectus) from Mr. Horace L. Higgins, who has been associated with the Railway from its earliest days, first during construction, and then as General Manager since 1892; Mr. Higgins has a unique knowledge of railway matters in the Philippines, and during his long connection with the Railway has gained the complete confidence of the Directors. Mr. Higgins estimates that the construction of the 444 miles of railroad to be built under the new Concession will cost, approximately, £3,000,000, and that the construction should be completed in 1913. In this estimate provision has been made for interest during the period of construction on the Debenture Bonds issued, and to be issued, to provide the necessary funds for such construction. This interest during the whole construction period will be debited to Capital Account, and during such period any interest allowed by the Bankers on funds lying in their hands, as well as the net earnings of the new lines as each section is put into operation, will be credited to such account.

During the present year the earnings of the old system are expected to show a decrease as compared with 1907 of some £15,000, owing to drought and the abnormally bad rice crop, which is the worst experienced in the Island since the inauguration of the railway 20 years ago. This decrease in earnings is largely attributable to the neglect of the irrigation works during the Spanish-American War. In the favourable seasons which followed these irrigation works were not restored, but, as the restoration will now be taken in hand by the Government, who have already voted a sum for this object, not only must the loss of revenue be considered to be of a temporary nature but the prospects for the future are very encouraging.

Mr. Higgins estimates that for the year 1908 the net earnings on the old system of 208 miles (without taking into account the earnings on any of the new lines) will amount to	£113,200
And the charge, during construction, on the "A" Debenture Bonds against revenue is	£68,000
Mr. Higgins further estimates that in 1913, the first year of the completed system, the net earnings of the 652 miles will be about	£300,000
Whilst the charge on the maximum issue of £3,250,000 "A" Debenture Bonds would amount to	£130,000

The experience of the lines so far built justifies the expectation that their earnings will show considerable expansion from year to year as the country served by the new lines is developed.

Mr. Higgins, in his letter, anticipated that by 30th June, 1908, some 112 miles of new lines would be in operation.

Full particulars relating to the constitution and formation of the Company are contained in the annexed Memorandum.

Applications for the Debenture Bonds may be made on the accompanying form.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained from Messrs. Speyer Brothers, No. 7, Lothbury, E.C., or from the Hong Kong & Shanghai Banking Corporation, 31, Lombard Street, E.C.

MY DEAR MR. CATER SCOTT,

Replying to your enquiry as to my view of the prospects of the Manila Railroad Company, I believe that I can do no better than repeat what I stated in our discussions during the negotiations leading up to the granting of the Concession to the Manila Railroad Company, that is, that the roads covered by the Concession granted under the Act of July 7, 1906, of the Philippine Commission, could not but be profitable from their completion, and increasingly so thereafter, under any fair management.

This opinion was based on my observation, and on the views of the officials of the Philippine Government. It was strengthened by the fact that the Engineer who had completed in 1876 a study of this question for the Spanish Government, had similarly reported with reference to the almost identical lines.

That these roads have, under Mr. H. L. Higgins, not only a fair but an excellent and economical management is the testimony of the Philippine Government.

You know how much the Philippine Government desired the construction of the new railways, and it is a pleasure to note, as I do, in the last report of the Secretary of Commerce and Police, "that the Manila Railroad Company is pushing its construction far in advance of the requirements of the Franchise." The Secretary of War has expressed his gratification at this. It is needless to invite your attention to the fact that the early completion of the branch lines of the Manila Railroad Company will place it in a position to profit fully by the more favourable trade relations with the United States, which it is hoped will soon be extended to the Islands.

Very sincerely,
C. R. EDWARDS
(Brigadier-General, U.S. Army, Chief of Bureau).

C. J. CATER SCOTT, Esq., Chairman,
MANILA RAILWAY COMPANY (1906), LIMITED, LONDON.

MEMORANDUM.

THE MANILA RAILWAY COMPANY (1906), LIMITED (below referred to as "the Company"), was incorporated for the purpose of acquiring and holding the whole of the Loan and Stock Capital (except that required for Directors' qualification) of an American Company, formed in 1906, under the laws of the State of New Jersey, under the title of the Manila Railroad Company (below referred to as "the American Company"), for the purposes and under the circumstances shortly below set out.

In August, 1906, a Concession was granted to the American Company by the United States, which comprises not only the existing 203 miles of railway in the Island of Luzon in the Philippine Islands (which were constructed and worked by the old Manila Railway Company, Limited), but also a further 444 miles, part of which is now in course of construction, and the whole of which must under the Concession be completed in 1913.

The Company will, in effect, control this extended undertaking, since practically the whole of the issued capital of the American Company is vested in the Company or the Trustees for the holders of its "A" and "B" Debenture Bonds, and the Company has agreed to acquire all further Bonds or Stocks hereafter to be issued by the American Company, which will also in due course be vested in the Trustees.

Both of the above issues of "A" and "B" Debenture Bonds are secured by a Trust Deed between the Company of the one part and the Merchants' Trust, Limited, of the other part, under which the entire present and future Capital, both Bonds and Shares (less Directors' qualification) of the American Company is, and will, become vested in the Trustees, and made subject to a first charge in favour of the "A" Debenture Bondholders, and a second charge in favour of the "B" Debenture Bondholders.

The Authorised Loan Capital of the American Company consists of 7,500,000 dol. First Mortgage 6 per Cent. Bonds and 12,500,000 dol. Second Mortgage 7 per Cent. Bonds. Its Stock Capital consists of 6,500,000 dol. 7 per Cent. Cumulative Preferred Stock, and 5,500,000 dol. Common Stock. Of this capital 3,000,000 dol. First Mortgage Bonds, 5,500,000 dol. Second Mortgage Bonds, 2,500,000 dol. Preference Stock and 1,500,000 dol. Common Stock, represented the purchase consideration of the existing railway, and were acquired by the Company, and at their request issued to the Trustees for the "A" and "B" Bondholders of the Company.

The consideration for which the Company acquired these Bonds and Stocks was the issue and payment of £1,257,200 "A" Debenture Bonds, £730,000 "B" Debenture Bonds, £1,180,000 Preference Shares, £399,270 Ordinary Shares, and £43,800 cash.

The Company has also contracted, under Contract No. 4 mentioned below to acquire at par such of the balance of the authorised Loan and Stock Capital of the American Company as it may be called upon to do, and under Contracts Nos. 5 and 7, also mentioned below, sufficient moneys have been provided for the purchase of the following Bonds and Stocks of the American Company, forming part of such balance, namely: 1,250,000 dol. First Mortgage Bonds, 1,750,000 dol. Second Mortgage Bonds, 1,250,000 dol. Preferred Stock, and 610,000 dol. Common Stock. The money received by the American Company against the issue of these further Bonds and Stocks has been, or will be, applied in or towards the construction of the further mileage authorised to be constructed under the new Concession.

The following Contracts have been entered into:—(1) A letter dated the 15th March, 1906, from Messrs. Speyer Brothers to the old Manila Company, and a letter dated the 22nd March, 1906, from that Company to Messrs. Speyer Brothers in answer thereto, by which that Company undertook to pay or procure the payment to Messrs. Speyer Brothers of certain sums as remuneration for their services in connection with the prosecution of that Company's claim against the United States for damage to their line done in the course of the Spanish-American War and the obtaining of the new Concession. This arrangement, except as regards the sum of £10,000 payable under the first head, is in effect superseded by Agreement No. 5. The letter of 22nd March, 1906, was confirmed by Messrs. Speyer Brothers by letter dated the 23rd March, 1906. (2) A contract made the First day of January, 1907, between the old Manila Company of the one part, and the American Company of the other part, being an agreement for the sale of the whole railway system and undertaking of the old Manila Company to the American Company, for the consideration in Bonds and Stocks above stated. (3) A contract made the First day of January, 1907, between the old Manila Company of the one part, and the Company of the other part, being an agreement for the sale to the Company of the whole of the above-mentioned Bonds and Stocks of the American Company for the consideration above stated. (4) A contract made the First day of January, 1907, between the Company of the one part, and the American Company of the other part, being a contract by which the Company undertakes in effect (subject to various conditions and restrictions) to purchase in cash at their par value the rest of the above-mentioned loan and stock capital of the American Company as and when required to be issued in order to raise money for the completion of the railway system comprised in the Concession. (5) A contract made the First day of February, 1907 (below referred to as the "Service Agreement"), between the Company of the one part, and Messrs. Speyer Brothers on behalf of themselves and others of the other part, whereby, in consideration of various services and cash commitments hereinafter specified in detail, the Company agrees to issue to Messrs. Speyer Brothers or their nominees as fully paid the "A" and "B" Debenture Bonds and Preference Shares of the Company below referred to as to be issued under the Service Agreement. (6) Two letters, dated respectively 6th June, 1907, and 12th June, 1907, from Messrs. Speyer Brothers to Mr. William Mendel, and two letters, dated respectively 10th June, 1907, and 29th June, 1907, from Mr. William Mendel to Messrs. Speyer Brothers. (7) A contract dated the 16th June, 1908 (supplemental to the Service Agreement), between the Company of the one part, and Messrs. Speyer Brothers on behalf of themselves and others of the other part, embodying and superseding letters dated the 7th August and 10th August, the 2nd December, the 5th December, the 9th December, 1907, and the 17th January, 1908, and passing between the same parties.

The Bonds and Shares issued and to be issued to Messrs. Speyer Brothers, or their nominees, as fully paid under the Service Agreement and the Contract No. 7 above referred to consist of £442,300 "A" Debenture Bonds, £1,100,000 "B" Debenture Bonds, and £820,000 Preference Shares, which were agreed to be issued to them in consideration of their assisting the Company in carrying through the plan of Reconstruction under which the Company was formed, and acting as managers of such plan; of their guaranteeing that the holders of the fixed charges of the old Manila Company would accept the £1,257,200 "A" Debenture Bonds of the Company offered under the plan in exchange for their securities; of their providing and paying on behalf of the Company the £43,800 cash part of the consideration payable under Contract No. 3, the preliminary expenses of the Company, including the stamp duties immediately payable on the Trust Deed, and on £1,700,000 "A" Bonds and £1,830,000 "B" Bonds of the Company, and also all the legal and other expenses incidental to the promotion and incorporation of the American Company, the negotiations for and grant of the new concession and the formulation of and carrying out the Plan of Reconstruction of their paying or providing the Company with the sum of 4,860,000 dol. required by it for taking up (under Contract No. 4 above) Bonds and Stocks of the Railroad Company of that aggregate nominal value; of the services rendered by them to the old Company through their New York House in obtaining the new concession for the American Company; and of their permitting the moneys provided by them for the construction only of the first 150 miles of line to be used also for the construction simultaneously of further mileage and of their maintaining and furthering the credit of the Company by procuring a postponement of the realisation by their friends of the Bonds held by Messrs. Speyer Brothers for their account under unfavourable market conditions.

The liabilities for the cash commitments of Messrs. Speyer Brothers under the Service Agreement have been distributed amongst Messrs. Speyer Brothers, Messrs. Speyer & Co., and the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, with certain other persons and corporations who took no part in arranging the terms of the Plan of Reconstruction or in the promotion of the Company, but are interested in the realisation of the above-mentioned Bonds and Shares.

how Nesta's prudent relatives try to prevent her befriending Mrs. Marsett, a lady of dubious reputation, and how the friendship between the two women works out for good. Spiritual commentaries in art, such as Miss Sinclair's, are indeed almost the only corrective modern society allows us to the bald and often indecent sensational reports of our newspapers on divorce court scandals. And as a spiritual corrective we welcome "Kitty Tailleur."

On their stay at the Cliff Hotel, Southbourne, the Lucys, brother and sister, are struck by "the intolerable impudence of the public gaze" whenever Mrs. Tailleur, a lady of twenty-seven, with "a sweet face, curiously foreshortened by a low forehead and the briefest of chins," appears with her companion, Miss Keating. The men either turn their heads away when they pass her or fix on her furtive and objectionable smiles, or seem unaware of her existence, and the women leave her in splendid and painful isolation. And it is borne in on the widower, Robert Lucy, who at thirty-five has preserved the chivalrous innocence of youth, that he must do something for the protection of Mrs. Tailleur, when he notes how the women drive her from the drawing-room, and how her face, delicate, sad, "with its fixed look of artificial maturity," calls aloud to him for pity. Robert Lucy accordingly introduces himself and his sister to Mrs. Tailleur, at which fact everybody stares with supreme wonder, but the two do not find it easy to get to know her. Mrs. Tailleur appears shy, very reticent, and distrustful of herself, and, oddly enough, she seems to be ten times more afraid of Jane than of her brother. And at this point the situation becomes painfully electric through the sudden enlightenment of Mrs. Tailleur's companion, Miss Keating. Miss Keating, who has been picked up by Kitty at a northern hydropathic, is one of those forlorn and dreary spinsters who become permanently embittered by ministering to a succession of querulous old women and selfish invalids. She prides herself on her intense respectability, since she has nothing else to be proud of, and she becomes the personification of outraged virtue when she learns through Mrs. Jurd that Mrs. Hankin has said that "Mrs. Tailleur is ——." In a striking scene we are shown Miss Keating refusing to speak to her late employer, repudiating with violence all the gifts with which Kitty has loaded her, packing her boxes with trembling indignation, and driving off to the Hotel Metropole. The guests at the Cliff Hotel have, of course, no evidence against Mrs. Tailleur, but their instincts have not deceived them: Kitty has had many adventures, and she is, at this juncture, in the hands of a Mr. Wilfred Marston. Meanwhile Robert Lucy has passed from the stage of chivalrous indignation to tenderness, and from tenderness to love. He has surprised Kitty on the cliff on the night of Miss Keating's departure, crying in an attitude of exhausted misery and sick abandonment, and the next day he asks her to marry him. It is easy to understand that Kitty, who has never met this sort of man before, is overwhelmed by the fact of his chivalry, his tenderness, and his innocence, and that she loves him for these qualities, which astonish her and fill her with shame, exultation, and anxiety. She accepts him, despite her forebodings, and Robert Lucy sends for his two little girls, Janet and Barbara. On the day that they arrive, however, Mr. Wilfred Marston puts in an appearance at the Cliff Hotel.

Mr. Wilfred Marston is, we think, the best drawn figure in the novel. A man of the world, "professing the utmost devotion to good women, the women whom his mother and his sisters knew," he is soon bored by their society, and so has "gravitated by taste and temperament to the women of the underworld." In his cool, hard, and rather brutal fashion he is fond of Kitty Tailleur, and when he learns of the astonishing news of her engagement after ten days' acquaintanceship to Robert Lucy, he determines, inwardly, to retain his hold of her, but outwardly he is careful not to give her secret away, and he supports her deception. Marston plays, rather skilfully, a waiting game, and the scenes in which he argues with Kitty that Robert Lucy is bound to discover her past, sooner or later, and that she cannot, in fact, practise such a fraud on an innocent man, and that to do so will be "a beastly shame," are very close to life. Kitty, however, dares not confess her past to Robert Lucy, and asserts that either "it'll kill me if he knows," or that she will commit suicide.

It is here that the hidden flaw in the novel becomes apparent, the flaw which gravely impairs its force and value as a work of art. While we must allow that the gathering strain of Kitty's agitation is well done, we are not convinced by the tragic issue—Kitty's suicide. And, searching narrowly the pages to understand why it is that the poignancy of her final confession of her past to Lucy, and of her cry, "you can't marry me now," and of his reply "No," leaves us chilled and wondering, we perceive that the unreality lies in Lucy's relation to her, that this man has never really loved her, and is, in fact, however skilfully it be disguised, a figure half unreal. We do not believe that a man who could have been so thrilled with pity for Kitty's defencelessness could, in the first place, have so totally excluded from his thought, the possibility of her being "a woman of no reputation." However idealistic and chivalrous this middle-aged man may be, the fact that she is surrounded by people who are treating her all day as an improper person would have made him doubly anxious about her position, and he would have said: "Even if she has a past, these people are behaving odiously to her." It is with a shock of astonishment that we learn not merely that Lucy fails to grasp what everybody else has understood, but that he does not even wonder whether she has been divorced, or is the victim of some scandal. His imagination, through his "niceness," is absolutely blank! and this, taken in conjunction with his preposterous offer, after Kitty's confession, to find a home for her where he is never to come unless she be "in difficulty or in danger," gives his love an air of sentimental unreality.

It is equally strange that when Robert betroths himself to a woman of whom everybody is talking, Miss Jane Lucy should feel no feminine anxiety about Mrs. Tailleur's past or her vindication. The Lucys behave, in fact, like angels from another world, and though the reader perceives this sub-consciously it is only at the close, when Kitty's revelation brings to her the tragic consequence, that he discovers he has been tricked by the author's dexterity into accepting people who are half lay figures. The characters thus wear an air of having been gently manipulated in order to bring off the tragedy. It is a pity, for Kitty Tailleur's character is drawn with great delicacy of touch, and the effect of Wilfred Marston's hard, cynical hold on her bruised soul is rendered with profound feminine understanding. There is tragedy in the tale, but it is the tragedy of Kitty's life, not of her death that affects us. It is curious that the artistic weakness of "The Helpmate," which mattered less, should spring from the same cause—the author's incapacity to draw truthfully the figure of a "nice man." The author might have gently satirised Robert Lucy's idealism and shown us that it is only masculine egoism with a new face, or she might have made Kitty lie to her lover at first, and the tragedy spring from the lie. As it is, the story is a fine piece of work marred by a central flaw.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The current number of "The Nineteenth Century and After" opens with an article on "The Triple Entente and the Triple Alliance," by Mr. J. Ellis Barker. The tone is hostile to Germany, and much is made of the commercial and political benefits which this country might expect from a closer understanding with Russia. Mr. Barker, however, repudiates the view taken by the German Press that Great Britain tried to isolate Germany, and to hedge her in with a network of ententes in order to raise a European coalition against her. The object of the Triple Entente is, he says—

> "not war, but peace, and it must be assumed that its aim is threefold. It aims at creating a counterpoise to the Triple Alliance, in order to preserve the balance of power in Europe, it aims at taking from the strongest European Power the temptation of breaking peace, and it aims at settling, preferably by a friendly arrangement and without war, some of the great problems of Europe which possibly may come up for settlement in the near future."

Sir Bampfylde Fuller, in an article called "The 'Vision Splendid' of Indian Youth," describes the unrest in India as "a drama presented by a company of juveniles," and thinks that the new departures called for are the strengthening and reform of educational supervision and the control of the Press. Major-General C. H. Owen criticises Mr. Haldane's Territorial Army scheme. Dr. Emery Barnes urges the Lambeth Conference to promote a revision of the present rubric, which compels clergymen to recite the Damnatory Clauses of the Athanasian Creed. M. Augustin Hamon has a lively and penetrating article on Mr. Bernard Shaw, whom he describes as "a new Molière"—that is to say, a serious and pertinent critic of life. Other articles are "Women and the Suffrage," by Lady Lovat; "The Khedive of Egypt," by Mr. Edward Dicey, who describes him, we think, correctly, as willing to be our friend if we will be his; "Poverty in London and in New Zealand: A Study in Contrasts," by Mrs. Grossmann; and "The Empire and Anthropology," by Sir Harry M. Johnston.

"The Fortnightly Review" begins with a study of "The Influence of English Thought upon the French Mind," by M. Yves Guyot. "Calchas" discusses "The Triple Entente," and reaches the conclusion that, unless war is declared at Berlin, it will not be declared. "If the sword is drawn at last it will not be because Germany is isolated, but because the Bismarckian principle of isolating every other Power has finally failed." Sir H. H. Johnston holds in "Britain and Belgium" that, if "we or the other contracting African Powers of the Berlin Act allow, by lassitude or indifference, a continuance of the present state of affairs over two-thirds of the Congo basin, we shall find ourselves involved with Belgium in an uprising of the black man against the white, which not all the Arms Conferences will avail to keep under." Mr. H. C. Minchin contributes a pleasant article on Thomas Fuller; Mr. J. A. R. Marriott writes on Lady Falkland; Mr. W. G. H. Gritten examines the present condition of the Unionist Party; and Mr. Francis Gribble discusses "The Pose of Mr. Arthur Symons."

The first two articles in "The Contemporary Review" treat of the feminist movement, Mrs. Teresa Billington-Grieg dealing with the general question of "The Rebellion of Woman," while Mr. Bertrand Russell confines himself to a discussion of "Liberalism and Women's Suffrage," in which he strongly urges the Liberal Party to support the demand that women should have votes on the same terms as men, i.e., the limited Bill. Professor Dowden contributes a delightful article on "Goethe's West-Eastern Divan," into which a number of graceful translations of the lyrics are introduced. Mr. George Haw has a spirited indictment of the Local Government Board, whose methods he declares to be dilatory, reactionary, hard, and inefficient, and Mr. N. MacNicol argues with force in "The Future of India" that a "responsible share" in its entire administration should be given to the people of the country if "the honour of England and the safety of India" are to be preserved. There is the usual literary supplement, which includes an article by "Museus" on "The Astronomy of Shakespeare."

Markets generally have been steady but idle during the last week. Speculation seems to be at a standstill, but money becomes cheaper and cheaper. The principal events from the London Stock Exchange point of view have been the continued slump in Canadian railway traffics and the London omnibus combine. A certain interest is taken just now, both here and in Paris, in Peruvian Corporation stocks, and some people are also paying attention to Central America. The troubles in Mexico caused some anxiety, which, however, has been allayed. The conflict and bloodshed in Teheran are but little noticed; nobody in the City ever put faith in the Persian Parliament, and the Anglo-Russian agreement is relied upon to prevent embarrassing complications.

The Canadian Railways.

Although the falling off in the traffics of the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific has been prodigious in the last month or two, it must be remembered that there was not quite such collapse of securities in Canada as occurred in the United States. This was due to the superior strength and soundness of the Canadian banking system. But seeing that Canadian railways and land companies, notably Hudson's Bay, did not suffer such a slump as railroad and industrial corporations in the States, it is quite possible that present prices will prove more difficult to maintain in view of traffic decreases. Last year Canadian Pacific rose to 202 and fell to 142. Now, with much worse traffics, they are well above their worst. Even Grand Trunks, after falling from 33 last year to 14 a few months ago, are now at 17. Last year the 5 per cent. Second Preference and the 4 per cent. Third Preference rose to the ridiculous figures of 113½ and 76. It is safe to prophesy that we shall not see them at such altitudes for a long time to come. What has prevented prices from falling to a much lower level is, of course, the harvest prospect. Everything points to the Canadian crop being a very fine one; but it will be some time yet before the railways and trade begin to benefit.

The London Omnibuses.

Until a couple of years ago the London General Omnibus was a very stable and profitable concern. Its ordinary stock of about three-quarters of a million varied in 1904 and 1905 between 129 and 97. In the following year it dropped to 80, and last year (when the dividend was passed) it collapsed to 37. Tubes, trams, and motor omnibuses were the joint causes of its ruin. Whether now that it has absorbed its equally unfortunate competitors, the London Road Car and the Vanguards, it is likely to recover its prosperity is a difficult question to answer. I think it should be able to do so, provided the Board is able to reorganise the service and adjust it to the new conditions. Everything depends upon the competence of the Board and of the managers it employs.

Gilt-Edged Securities.

The rise of Consols to 88 is a welcome result of the combined action of cheap money and a large Sinking Fund. I am told by good brokers in the City that a large and steady investment business has been going on in the best classes of securities. The rise has been retarded by the large output of new issues, which has been much greater than last year. But in some cases the appreciation has been marked. Thus the Pennsylvania bonds are already at a premium of more than 6 per cent. It is natural and usual during the hot weather that speculation in other types of securities should be dormant, and the uncertainties of the Presidential election accentuate the apathy of Wall Street. Berlin seems to be in a rather more comfortable frame of mind now that the Kaiser is off for a holiday. holiday.

Diary of the Week.

The standing, and, it would appear, never ending, quarrel between Sir John Fisher and his adherents on the one hand, and Lord Charles Beresford and his friends on the other, has been brought to something of a head during the week. A special Press campaign appears to be carried on against Lord Charles Beresford. The two chief offences charged against him have been that he refused to shake hands with Sir John Fisher at a recent Levée and that last week during the Fleet manœuvres he ordered the "Argyll" and the "Good Hope" to turn towards each other from a distance of about 1,200 yards, and that a collision was only averted by Sir Percy Scott's refusal to obey orders. It seems to us that it is no credit to British journalism to circulate such a story at a time when Lord Charles Beresford was cruising on the coast of Scotland, and could not be communicated with. Finally, the question has appeared in Parliament, the Prime Minister declaring that the Government had no knowledge of the alleged dissensions "apart from unverified rumours," but that they would not hesitate to take action if they found that a state of things existed "detrimental to the discipline or smooth working of the fleet." Furthermore, he declared that the direction of naval policy lay with the Government, and that it was the business of naval officers not to criticise or discuss that policy, but to carry it out. Having made this firm but moderate statement, the Government wisely declined to answer further questions on specific points of discipline. As a matter of fact, we believe that the newspapers have greatly exaggerated the state of tension in the Navy, and that no acute personal difficulty has of late arisen in it. For example, two statesmen were present on the spot when the Levée incident occurred. One saw nothing, the other was doubtful as to what he saw. But it is clear that if the trouble arises afresh, the Government will have the support of the country in getting rid of the two main parties to it.

On Thursday the Old Age Pensions Bill passed through all its stages in the House of Commons. "The Spectator" advises the Lords to reject the measure, but this course is clearly unconstitutional, and it is repudiated by the "Times" and other Tory supporters. The Government maintained its sliding scale against the more logical scheme advocated by Mr. Holt and proposed in this journal. But the Prime Minister promised to watch its operation, and to amend it if it was defective. The only other debate of consequence was Mr. Harold Cox's attempt to substitute a system of rewards for industry, with a rigid test showing that the applicant for a pension had, from the age of 67 to 70, done 126 weeks of work, or 42 weeks a year. The Attorney-General promised that the Bill should apply to seamen and soldiers, and to working men who were temporarily employed abroad.

The third reading debate destroyed the hope of the destruction of the Bill by the Lords, which was clearly, if indirectly, repudiated by Mr. Long, and less obviously by Mr. Balfour. Mr. Balfour expressed sympathy with the objects of the Bill, but declared that its cost would be eleven and a-half millions, and that it merely meant an extension of outdoor relief under cover of a five-shilling pension. He also criticised the machinery and the capacity of the Inland Revenue officers. Mr. Masterman made a skilful and truthful defence of the measure, correctly saying that the bulk of the Opposition criticism applied to any scheme that was not universal. Mr. Snowden spoke with cold disfavor, pinned his party to a universal scheme beginning at 65, and declared that the industry test was such that Jesus Christ could not have satisfied it. Mr. Crooks was much more sympathetic, and Mr. Lloyd George emphatically repeated his pledge to deal with the pauper question next year. Only ten members voted against the third reading, which was supported by 315.

The Russian Government has at length realised the scandalous and perilous situation created by the activity of its agents in Persia, for whom it now admits responsibility. An official communiqué tries to justify Colonel Liakhoff, though it points out consistently enough that the Russian Government had to forbid his appointment as Governor-General of Teheran, and stop him issuing ukases under his own signature. He has been ordered to "abstain from participation in political party strife," and the Russian officers not to direct active measures against Parliament. These instructions, even if they were sincere, have come after the mischief is done, and they are not sincere because they leave the amplest room for active intervention to the Russian officers if only they keep their names decently in the background. There is only one way of ensuring that Persia shall work out its fate without foreign interference, and at the same time of restoring any confidence in the Anglo-Russian Agreement. That is the recall of the Russian officers and agents in Persian service, though we fear that now even that measure would be too late to give the Constitutional Party a chance. Official reports from the royalist side declare the country quiet and grateful, but less partial observers record frequent outrages and arrests in Teheran, while fighting still proceeds in Tabriz, though there the Russian Consul-General has been trying to make peace on terms and under circumstances not very intelligible.

The second reading of the Eight Hours Bill for Miners was carried on Monday by a majority of 278—391 to 113. A few Liberals voted against it, and about an equal number of Unionists for it. The best defence of the Bill was Mr. Churchill's, who closely examined the economic case, and retorted on Mr. Bonar Law's clever argument that the measure would increase the cost of production that such a plea was absurd in the mouth of a Protectionist pledged to a great artificial scheme for raising the price of hundreds of articles. The same lugubrious prophecies now directed against the Bill were hurled against the Ten Hours Bill, and against the repatriation of the Chinese workers on the Rand. The change was a civilising one—a sign and precursor of a world-movement for reconciling industry with the laws of science and health, and with feeling for human rights.

The Special Committee appointed to report finally on the question of a national insurance of our shipping in time of war have decided against it, with the important exception of Sir George Clarke. The Committee are hostile to national insurance on the ground that the expense would be enormous and that many fraudulent claims would arise, that there would be a large transference of goods from foreign to British owners, and that it would not be fair to hold the State responsible for a special kind of private loss. The Committee conclude that the only possible form of national guarantee of British shipping is a powerful navy. We think the Committee have treated somewhat lightly the enormous rise in premiums and prices which a naval war might bring about, and their report furnishes a new and powerful argument for the abolition of the right of capture of private property at sea. This, with a strong navy, appears to provide all the insurance that our trade and food supplies require.

M. Jaures on Tuesday directed the Chamber's attention to a grave incident in Morocco. The Government, a few weeks ago, sent instructions to General d'Amade not to intervene between the rival Sultans or move outside the Shawia district. These instructions were read out in the Chamber and sent to the Powers. They were, therefore, a formal pledge to France and to Europe. Several days later General d'Amade went to Azemmur, the only port in the possession of Mulai Hafid, and a town lying outside the Shawia. There he compelled the Hafidist Governor to retire, and the city to acknowledge Abdul Aziz; only the day before an Azizist force had assaulted the town and been driven back. General d'Amade therefore deliberately broke the double pledge given by his Government, and the Government publicly censured him. M. Jaurès demanded to know what the Government intended to do to make its generals respect the will of the Chamber. M. Pichon made the lamest of defences of General d'Amade, and said the Cabinet knew nothing of his collaboration with Abdul Aziz, though this vital fact was reported by every news agency. The President got the Government out of the difficulty by cutting the discussion short in the brusquest manner; but it is reported that several Powers intend to protest against General d'Amade's conduct. M. Jaurès thinks, with good reason, that a final effort is being made by d'Amade to help Aziz to recover Mawakech. It is quite certain that the Jingoes are fighting hard, and the cause of sanity would profit if our Foreign Office said plainly it would not support their adventures.

Three days' fighting and a certain amount of bloodshed have put one President in place of another in nominal control of Paraguay. The revolution was made by the army, for Paraguay is in the hands of a military oligarchy which tired of President Ferreyra after two years. The people of Paraguay are very stout fighters; no nation has ever put up a better fight than they did against Brazil, Argentine, and Uruguay in the war of 1865-70, which wiped out almost the whole population. But before that war the little land-locked Central American Republic was innocent of revolution. It was ruled by a succession of despots belonging to the family of Rodrigez de Francia, who threw off the Spanish yoke and carried on the tradition of paternalism, exclusion, and quasi-Socialism created by the Jesuit founders of the State. The introduction of a modern Constitution has brought with it modern ills, though, probably enough, Brazil, which has long had its eye on Paraguay, could throw light on some of its little neighbour's political troubles.

The Duma's rejection of the battleship credit, and M. Stolypin's generous determination not to make it a casus belli, turns out to have been very much of a comedy. The Premier went to the Imperial Council for the money. The Council granted it, and when the Duma still refused, paragraph 13 of the Constitution came into force, which put into operation the previous year's Budget when the two Houses cannot agree. Last year's naval Budget provides ample funds for the battleships. Of course, it did not receive Parliamentary sanction, and so the country is committed to a huge naval programme, to be carried out by the very men who wrecked the old navy. And the Duma submits. The Finnish elections have made practically no change in the constitution of the Diet. The Socialist Party is still the strongest, and practically as strong as before. As the Russian Government carries its zeal for restricting Finnish autonomy so far as to include a Finnish agricultural college among Imperial concerns, and as all Finnish parties are firm in the defence of Finnish liberties, the new Diet has a stormy future before it.

Captain Kincaid Smith, a Liberal Imperialist member, attempted, on Wednesday, to commend to the House of Commons a Bill providing for general—i.e., compulsory—military service. It provided various periods of military training between the ages of 18 and 30. The House refused to read the Bill a first time by a majority of 250 votes to 34—a very useful set-back to this dangerous movement. The case for conscription was demolished in a sentence or two by Mr. Harold Cox, who said that any such imitation of the Swiss system, excluding, as it did, lunatics, members of the House of Commons, habitual drunkards, and other undesirables, would put 4,000,000 men under arms, at a cost of 19½ millions a year. Captain Smith did not explain the purpose for which this force would be required, and what use it would be after the destruction of the Navy, the only case in which it could come into operation.

The Labor Party has passed the following resolution on the exclusion of Mr. Keir Hardie from the Royal Garden party. It has been forwarded to the Lord Chamberlain:—

> "That the action of Mr. Hardie regarding the King's visit to the Czar, which incurred the displeasure of His Majesty, and led to Mr. Hardie's name being removed from the list of Members of Parliament recently invited to Windsor, having been taken by instructions of the Party, the Party desires to associate itself with Mr. Hardie, who, in its opinion, exercised his constitutional right on the occasion of the Foreign Office debate, and it therefore requests that until his name is restored to such official lists the names of all its members shall be removed from them."

The "Diario de Noticias" publishes some details of the illegal advances to members of the Royal Family and others which are maintaining public feeling in Portugal at a red heat. In the case of the late King they began as long ago as 1890, in the case of the Duke of Oporto as 1902, and of Queen Amelia as 1903. Even Senhor Franco estimated the total sum handed over to the Royal Family alone at £171,000; but it is certainly much larger. The proposed new Civil List is being bitterly contested, for it is really larger than that granted to King Carlos, because it puts the cost of maintaining some palaces and of the King's travels on public funds, while it makes practically no provision for extinguishing the illegal advances. At a great Republican meeting held in Oporto on Sunday, the Royal Family was denounced for screwing the last copper out of a poverty-stricken people, and the Government for not having learnt anything from the events of January 31st, while the assassins of King Carlos were acclaimed as the saviours of the country. How delicate the situation is is indicated by a debate in the Upper House. One member—the private secretary to the late King—wanted to know why nothing had been done to pursue the score of men who had taken part in the murder, and laughed at the idea that they were Anarchists. Everybody in Portugal knows that the King's assassination was not an Anarchist crime, but the Premier had to maintain the contrary, simply because the Government dare not stir in an affair which involves every party and many eminent politicians in Portugal.

The Pope has brought about an important change in the organisation of the Roman Catholic Church. He has taken Great Britain, the United States, and other non-Latin countries out of the category of "missionary" lands, and, as such, subject to the congregation "De Propagandâ Fide," and transferred them to the more ordinary organisations. These are to be re-constituted, and old medieval tribunals like the Rota are to be endowed with fresh powers. The change appears to have no special religious significance, though it marks the growing importance in the Roman scheme of the non-Catholic countries, which are rapidly eclipsing the nominally Catholic lands, and whose wealth and population may in time give them the dominant power in the government of the Church.

No single statesman, save Pobiedonostseff, did more in the last century to influence the destinies of Russia than General Ignatieff, who died in retirement last Friday. He it was who prepared both the great adventures and rendered inevitable both the great wars in the Near and the Far East. It was his clever policy, while Ambassador in Pekin in the early 'sixties, which induced China to make over the Amur territory and the port of Vladivostock to Russia as a free gift and a token of gratitude. He seems to have persuaded the Tsung-li-Yamen that he alone procured the withdrawal of the Allies after the stupid and brutal march on Pekin. As Ambassador thereafter for fourteen years at Constantinople, he was the right hand of Panslavism. He created the Bulgarian nationality by fostering the Exarchist Church; he accomplished the final breach between Russia and the Greeks; he deliberately brought about the Russo-Turkish War; he drafted the treaty of San Stefano, and so set in action the perpetuum mobile which we are still watching to-day. The worst feature of his activities in Turkey—apart from his notorious duplicity of method—was his steady encouragement of all the corrupter and more reactionary influences at the Palace. He intended that Turkey should rot, and he bought and promoted the Pashas who would most surely degrade her, as he discredited and opposed the Liberal Turks who might have saved her. To that model Russian statecraft is still faithful, in Persia as in Turkey.

The death of Mr. Joel Chandler Harris, the creator of "Uncle Remus," will bring many pleasant literary memories to mind. The figures of Brer Rabbit and Brer Fox, the victories of one and the defeats of the other, have become familiar to many thousand English readers; indeed, Sir Frank Gould's re-setting of their personalities and adventures has thoroughly woven them into our contemporary political satire. The figures, and the atmosphere in which they lived, were, of course, no invention of Mr. Harris's. They were part of the plantation folk lore of the American negroes of the Southern States, collected with the utmost care and diligence from the lips of many Uncle Remuses of real life. Mr. Harris spoke of himself as the editor and collector of the tales, and as providing their literary setting. We have heard other such stories from American ladies brought up on plantations before the Civil War, and many are closely paralleled in Mr. Theal's Kaffir tales. But that is not to depreciate Mr. Harris's delightful art. Uncle Remus himself belonged to him, even if Uncle Remus's stories did not.

The University cricket match was fought out between two mediocre elevens stronger in bowling than in batting. They happened to be well matched, and the result was an exciting game, the issue of which was uncertain until within a few minutes of its close on Wednesday afternoon. Finally Oxford won by two wickets, but the change in the weather from dry to wet greatly lightened her task at the critical moment. The game did not produce any cricketing feat of great brilliancy, the scores being low and the runs being rather flukily obtained. Its most interesting feature was Mr. Teesdale's batting in the second innings with a battered finger. Had he succumbed Oxford must have lost the match.

Politics and Affairs.

THE QUARREL IN THE NAVY.

It seems to us that the language which the Prime Minister applied to the rather scandalous situation within the Navy was entirely proper to the occasion which provoked it. Mr. Asquith said in effect, "The Government has nothing to do with mere personal differences among its servants in the Navy or elsewhere. But it wants those servants to understand clearly that the nation's interests come first, and that if the dislike of one high commander for another, or of a high official for a high commander, is so acute that our fleets cannot be trusted in their hands, one man or another or both will have to go." This is ground on which, as the conduct of the Opposition in the House of Commons showed, the First Lord will be all-powerful. But in the exercise of judgment on personal matters, we are bound to use some discrimination. All actors in the drama of life know that under the apparently smooth scheme of its surface workings an immense amount of friction goes on. And jealousy is the special prepossession and bane of public or semi-public men—be they statesmen, artists, journalists, soldiers, or even ecclesiastics. The wise superintendent of such departments of work makes allowance for this frailty of our human nature, takes account of it in his dispositions, and soothes the acute sensibilities of its victims.

The Navy has for some time been the theatre of this passionate sensitiveness. Its two most salient figures—Sir John Fisher and Lord Charles Beresford—have undoubtedly succeeded in dividing both the service and "society" into schools of vehement and active partisans of the one personality or the other, and of the ideas in organisation, ships, and gunnery which they represent. Thus the "Dreadnought" controversy and the mobilisation controversy are fought out over the bodies of these redoubtable protagonists. Both appear to command adherents in the Press and to make free use of their advocates. During the last few months, we are bound to add, the guns have been trained with special severity and concentration on Lord Charles Beresford. A private incident, which may be quite trivial—his refusal to take Sir John Fisher's offered hand at the Levée—has been treated as if it were an offence against the State. And within the last week the "Times" has most improperly published a story reflecting a charge either of incompetence or of gross malignity. We shall take leave to doubt the story of the alleged signal to the "Good Hope" in the color with which it has been surrounded, and to suggest that its publication, at a time when Lord Charles is at sea and in ignorance of the attack, is equally discreditable to the officer and the newspaper responsible for it. Only one object can lie behind these attacks, and that is the dismissal of the incriminated commander. But what sober Government can take account of such a proceeding save by way of condemning or ignoring it? Last year there were many who thought that Lord Charles's language and demeanour had exceeded the bounds of discipline. But no man of character and distinction can be successfully assailed by methods so revolting. The Government can only recall the service to its duty in moderate but clear terms, and if it still fails to set bounds to the extravagant egoism of talented men, it will be compelled to clear the Navy of the whole contention and of the men who sustain it.

This, we take it, is the common sense of the situation. But we need not exaggerate its seriousness. Differences of opinion among "experts" have their uses, for they seem to dispose of the singularly ill-considered view which elevates these excellent servants into the position of masters. The statesman is, after all, the assessor of technical disputes, for he represents, if he has a good head, and is at pains to sift his information, the power of broad survey which the adept in details so often lacks. Just now the whole strategy of the fleet is in doubt, owing to just such an error of policy and calculation. There is not an intelligent student of naval affairs who does not now deplore the initiation of the "Dreadnought," coupled with the boast, advanced at a time when our own superiority in naval power stood at its culminating point, that it rendered obsolete all preceding types of battleship. But the departure has been made; every naval Power has taken the hint and concentrated its shipbuilding forces on "Dreadnoughts," and we are entered for a world-competition in vessels costing a couple of millions a-piece, with the further obligation to build docks and harbours ample enough and deep enough to contain them. This is what unfettered expertise has done for us and for the society of the more powerful civilised States. We have now to decide the question which Sir Cyprian Bridge raised in our columns last week, whether this last monstrous birth of fear represents the most powerful engine of offence that rides the waters. In other words, the technical problem is whether under the new system of "fire control," the "Dreadnought" can deliver a heavier, more concentrated, more quickly delivered mass of projectiles than any rival war vessel. On this question, we are bound to say that the existence of a sceptical school in the Navy is of advantage, and a wise administrator will be slow to suppress it.

Beyond this technical difficulty, lies that of policy, and here the facts must be closely scrutinised by the friends of peace. For the present the "Dreadnought" holds the seas, and the problem of naval supremacy is reduced to the point whether our immense superiority in earlier types, such as the "Nelson" and "King Edward" classes, coupled with our start in "Dreadnoughts," does not guarantee us against the revised German shipbuilding programme at every capital point of its development. The answer is surely in the affirmative. There are two "danger-years" in the German programme. The first is 1912; the second is 1915. A moderate rate of "Dreadnought" building gives us the advantage all through this critical period. Germany is no doubt building fast, faster than she has built before. But, if she can construct ships, she cannot build docks to hold them at anything like the same rate. For years to come her "Dreadnoughts" will be practically useless to her, for she will have no places of refuge and repair for them. Therefore, no positive ground of collision can exist owing to a dangerous rivalry of strength. None the less, the relationship of these two great countries, engaged in an almost avowed rivalry of shipbuilding extending over a long series of years, during which they will be mortgaging each other's revenues and crippling each other's social activities, is deplorable, and no effort of statesmanship should be spared to improve it. We believe that the Government are deeply sensible of the importance of an understanding with Germany. Is not Germany equally sensible of the vital significance of such an arrangement? If the leading statesmen in the two countries are equally impressed, their good-will can surely be embodied in a definite act of State.

THE FINAL FORM OF THE PENSIONS BILL.

The Pensions Bill is practically through Parliament. A small minority of belated theorists still protest against its passing, and the "Spectator" demands that the House of Lords shall throw it out altogether. It flatters itself that the country would understand such action and approve of so drastic a destruction. This view is remote from real affairs. The leaders of the Conservative Party know better. Already the bulk of the party newspapers are endeavouring to explain that the Bill owes as much to the support and suggestion of the Opposition as to the efforts of the Government, and ingenuously strive to deflect into the coffers of the Conservative Party some of the estimated gratitude of the country. Great political parties do not commit suicide for the sake of academic argument. To the few the action of the Lords might appear as a justifiable treatment of a scheme admittedly incomplete, requiring, and, indeed, demanding, modification in the next few years, many clauses of which had not been discussed at all in the House of Commons. To the many it would simply stand as the insolent refusal of the House which has no concern in national finance, to allow the elected Chamber to provide pensions for the aged poor. We could wish for no more blind stupidity on the part of our enemies than for such a course to be pursued. It would secure a renewed lease of power to the Liberal Government. Incidentally, it would settle the question of the veto of the House of Lords.

The Bill has been subjected to severe criticism. Much of this criticism has been justified, and has succeeded in its purpose, to the great bettering of the Bill. But other kinds are the necessary and easy accompaniment of any partial scheme of pensions. It was interesting to watch the official Opposition and the House of Commons waking up day after day to the difficulties which have been the commonplace of the Social Reformer for more than a decade. Wherever Old Age Pensions have been seriously discussed, the barriers which have guarded and limited all restricted schemes have inevitably collapsed before the force of human logic. Just as in the case of education, no intellectually watertight scheme can stand up before the secular solution, so, in the case of pensions, it is not only Mr. Charles Booth, but all serious students, who have been compelled to acknowledge the inevitable deficiencies of any but a universal system. The moment you accept an age limit, a pauper disqualification, a test of industry or thrift, an income barrier, either with a fixed limit or a sliding scale, immediately a plausible and often unanswerable plea can be made for justice to those who stand just on the wrong side of these boundaries. The task of the Government was less that of defending the barriers as desirable in themselves than of exhibiting the financial necessities which compelled them to impose such restrictions against men and women who might be both deserving and needy. The only argument was the argument of money. The Government scheme will probably cost eight millions at the beginning, and increase automatically in expense every year. We may well accept this additional burden as a generous instalment.

With this guiding clue much of the criticism with which the scheme has been bombarded occupies its right position as being general rather than specific in character. Thus on Tuesday Mr. Balfour and the Opposition made much apparent play over the difficulty of ascertaining the ages of the applicants, with registration of births only commencing in the later 'thirties in England, and twenty years later in Ireland. Every oldish-looking man or woman would claim to be seventy, they asserted, and who could disprove their claim? But that is not a criticism of the Government system. It is a criticism of all systems of old-age pensions. Even with the contributory schemes, suddenly so dear to the Tories, the assertion is vehement that, for the moment, they would commence (as in Germany) with the present old people without contribution, and immediately, be the limit sixty, or sixty-five, or seventy, there would arise the same uncertainty in regard to age. Again, the machinery of the distribution was fiercely opposed in a criticism which lacked any serious standard of reference. The Government Bill proposes an Imperial Officer as representative of the Treasury, a local committee to sanction the pensions, a central authority to consider appeals. "Think of the invidious and unpleasant work of discrimination," said Mr. Walter Long, "that this officer would be compelled to perform." But the "invidious and unpleasant work of discrimination" is inevitable in all schemes, except the universal one, and the universal one would cost twenty-five millions. Again, the paupers have been excluded for two years. Their exclusion is the weakest point of the scheme; their indefinite exclusion, as we have successfully argued, was indefensible, and, happily, it has not been maintained. But the Government were able to retort that the immediate inclusion of all paupers would cost three millions a year. And this practical reason prevailed.

Looking to-day at the scheme as a whole, we can see it as a great enterprise in itself, greater in its possibilities of development. Many obvious and attractive by-paths have been avoided. The contributory alternative—unfair in its tendencies, impossible in its working in any country without the regimentation and registration of the German Government—has been altogether rejected. The age limit is high, excluding the bulk of the artisan populations of the cities. It is the rural districts, and (we may gladly recognise) such poor regions as Ireland, which stand to gain most out of the national bounty. But the height of the age limit merely remains as necessitated by financial limitations; it can be reduced and reduced step by step, whenever those financial limitations can be removed. The scheme, again, most fortunately remains utterly independent of the English Poor Law system, employing neither the relieving officer nor the Guardians, and involving no trace of the pauper disability or dishonor. It has abandoned the fixed limit of income in favor of a sliding scale; and if that sliding scale involves, we fear, some discount on thrift, it is at least free from the reproach of the original measure that the man who had saved a little over ten shillings a week was positively worse off than the man who had saved a little less. One or two blemishes remain. Undoubtedly the sliding scale proposed by Mr. Holt on Monday night—a "graded" scale, very similar to that outlined in this paper—is greatly preferable to the "flat" scale of the Government, which gives to all with incomes between eight and thirteen shillings a week the same total of income. The sense of the House was with the amended suggestion; the arguments in its favor were irrefutable; the Government scheme was only carried by a direct appeal from the Prime Minister promising alteration, if the difficulties foreshadowed arose in actual practice. The Chancellor appealed for the "flat" scale on the ground of economy; the "graded" scale, in the Treasury estimate, would cost nearly a million more. But this estimate was a static rather than a dynamic one. It dealt with incomes over eight shillings a week at present, making no calculation for the reduction of incomes above that to eight shillings which would immediately follow the initiation of the scheme. That reduction would in part be stayed by a scale which offered advantages to those who possessed more, instead of reducing all to the dead level of a fifteen shilling income, and would undoubtedly prove cheaper in the long run. A second blot—the exclusion of the pauper—may in part be mitigated by the raising of his income by the Guardians, as the financial obligations of the ripening pauper class are switched off from them on to the pension scheme; and in any case it is very sharply limited to a two years' time limit. The third subject of criticism—the so-called Thrift and Industry Test—remains, and remains undiscussed. Its operation in practice will need most careful watching. It may remain a dead letter. It may become a source of petty tyranny. In any case, we may doubt its long survival.

Apart from these minor defects, the Bill remains a memorable, an epoch-making, advance in social well-being. This Government has undertaken a work which has baffled all its predecessors. It has carried to completion an enterprise of extreme delicacy and difficulty. It has set a standard of social advance in a region where for long we have lagged behind other civilised countries. The commencement of this scheme will give to this Parliament just that element of vision and large endeavor which it has hitherto failed to stimulate or supply. The future will discover many points to modify, unforeseen difficulties in practical application, results often the opposite of the intention. But the future nation, when in full enjoyment of a universal system, automatic in its operation, logical in its consistency, will still have gratitude to those who for the first time in history offered a national guarantee to its aged poor, of a more just and seemly ending to a long life of labor in field and factory than the shambling through the workhouse towards a pauper grave. The nation has now shouldered that burden; it can never be cast off.

THE NEW RAILWAY SITUATION.

The proposed fusion of the Great Northern, Great Eastern, and Great Central Railways, following a similar proposal upon the part of the three great Scottish lines, which, when fully developed, will probably bring all the North British roads into a single trust, indicates the adoption of a new transport policy likely to affect in important ways the industrial and social interests of the nation. Certain enormous wastes in competition between railways become intolerable alike to directors, shareholders, and the travelling and shipping public. That competition, which consists in two half-empty trains leaving two adjoining stations at the same hour, and travelling to two adjoining stations a hundred miles away, serves any really useful purpose, is becoming more and more incredible. As Mr. Davies puts it in his well-informed little book ("The Nationalisation of Railways," Black), "Why on earth a passenger coming into the Brighton Station at London Bridge should be compelled to walk (and perhaps have his luggage transported) half-a-mile before he can reach a parallel platform, simply because it belongs to another company, when a hole in the wall, or a subway, would enable him to get from one platform to another, is beyond human comprehension." Yet these and similar absurdities and burdens imposed on travellers are trifling as compared with the loss and injury sustained by our industries through the waste of loading and unloading, the waste of time, the uncertainty, and the expense, caused by the working of a railway system which has no single central management, and which in its material form is broken by countless gaps and discrepancies. Mobility is an essential of modern liberty, and the present arrangement of various private toll-bars is now seen to be as intolerable on our railways as it was long since recognised to be upon our highways. So far as rates are concerned, competition has long been unreal and unreliable, and it is to the interest of the public as well as to that of the shareholders that it should give way to close and effective combination.

The growing eagerness of shareholders to seek this remedy, in view of the increasing expenses and declining profits of their properties, was manifested a few days ago in the influential memorial presented to Mr. Churchill. In this the memorialists urged the expediency of further combinations, to which the great central systems of the Midland, North Western and Great Western should become parties. Though such great bodies move slowly, there can be no reasonable doubt that we are entering an era in which even the appearance of competition for passengers and traffic will be abandoned. Traders, we feel sure, will welcome such a change, provided they have reasonable assurance upon two heads; first, that a really enlightened, scientific management of transport will replace the existing rude, unprogressive, and in many ways obstructive system; secondly, that adequate guarantees are secured by the Railroad Commissioners and the Board of Trade against the abuse of the formal monopoly that will have come into being. We confess on our part to entertaining grave doubts on both these heads. The attitude known to be adopted by most of the managers and directors of our railways towards the recent endeavors of official and unofficial reformers to secure efficiency and publicity of railroad accounts, is not encouraging to those who desire to see a sound economy of transport. We believe it is still true, that with one or two exceptions our large railroads have none of that information regarding the detailed cost and profits of its business which every intelligent manufacturer possesses. Such essential knowledge as that of the average receipts per passenger per mile, and per ton per mile for goods traffic, is still lacking in the statistics of our leading lines. Not long ago one of our most competent experts pointed out that passengers and goods trains were loaded no more heavily in 1900 than in 1880, and that the cost of moving goods had largely increased during a period which, in other countries, notably in America, had been attended by enormous economies in haulage. There is, we fear, yet little recognition of railroading as a science requiring skilled selection and organised training in its administrators, nor are we sanguine that the mere process of amalgamation, with certain obvious economies, will rescue the industries from this incompetent empiricism. This language will only appear too strong to those whose sole test of railway efficiency is to compare the speed and comfort of a few first-grade passenger trains between great centres of population.

Of not less importance is the other issue, that of security for the public against the possible abuses arising from the grip of a single railway system, or a close federation of systems. To this fear M. Clemenceau gave forcible expression in the recent debate in which the French Senate ratified the proposal of the Assembly to take over the Western Railway. "I cannot refrain from calling attention to the feebleness of the weapons put into the hands of the State to defend the public interests against the pressure of the private companies." It is this fear that underlies the movement for nationalisation here, which has within the last few months taken orthodox form in a Society for promoting this end. Almost every other great civilised nation to-day, with the exception of the United States and, in part, of France, owns and operates its railways, and though in some cases military causes, which weigh more lightly here, were largely instrumental in this policy, such a course seems consistent with the accepted modern ideas of Government. We may remind our readers that from the earliest introduction of the railway the belief that some day the State would wish to own and operate the industry was present to our Parliament, and that express conditions, though too hard for realisation, have been actually laid down by statute, through the initiative of Gladstone, the most anti-Socialist of statesmen. The recent revival of the project has been no loose Socialistic notion, but has arisen from numerous resolutions adopted by Chambers of Commerce and Trade Protection Societies, which were brought to a focus in the powerful advocacy of Lord Brassey in his address last autumn to the Congress of Chambers of Commerce. Although it is inherently unlikely that a proposal of such magnitude, involving such difficulties of financial and political arrangement, will mature rapidly, the new shift in the railway situation must evidently be held to bring this issue within the range of practical politics, though not necessarily of immediate expediency. It is upon the whole more probable that, advancing in our cautious way, we shall prefer to undergo a decade of experiment in fuller State control of railway rates and conditions of working, before we have learned the lesson that effective governmental control, apart from direct public management, is impracticable. Whether, having learned this lesson, we shall continue to prefer the retention of an inadequately controlled private railway system to nationalisation, will depend, partly, upon the enlightenment displayed by the private monopolists in the use of their enormous powers; partly upon the amount of confidence which a British Government possesses in its ability to run so large a business without succumbing to the new dangers of political corruption. These dangers it would be foolish to ignore. They can only be provided against by such reforms in electoral and other governmental machinery as will prevent an undue exercise of political power by any body of public employees. Though these issues do not belong to immediate politics, it is advisable that some clear thought should be directed to them, for the trend towards nationalisation of railways in the not distant future is swift and undeniable.

THE POWER OF A MODERN NEWSPAPER.

The first instinct of the natural Englishman when he reads of a peculiarly unsavoury French scandal is to thank Heaven that nothing quite like it would be possible in this country. His maturer reflection will probably be, if he is intelligent and candid, that, if it were possible, he would never hear of it. French public life breeds, on occasion, a peculiarly flagrant type of corruption. But it also evolves a recklessness and a courage in exposure which would be thought almost indecent among ourselves. We have nothing like the General Staff which victimised Dreyfus; but have we anything like the moral force, the political swordmanship, the wit, the audacity, the intellectual perseverance of the men who did him justice, restored him to the army, and ended by making General Picquart their Minister of War? A libel case of unusual interest has served this week to unmask the "Matin" as perhaps the most dangerous and the most powerful newspaper in Europe. We have our own Americanised Press, but so far as our knowledge goes, it would be unjust to compare it seriously with the "Matin." Outwardly, however, the resemblance is very close. There is the same rather brazen and formless smartness and vitality, the same absence of any consecutive or consistent policy, the same catering for a public which delights in crimes and scandals, the same restless eagerness to anticipate facts, the same suppression of inconvenient news, and finally, the same measure of success in a fabulous circulation and immense profits. The "Matin," however, differs in two particulars from its English rivals. It aspires much more steadily to play a great part in politics, and of late years it has even seemed to be the official organ of successive Ministries. It is at the same time more obviously governed by Stock Exchange motives. Its sole proprietor, M. Bunau-Varilla, is a financier, who made his fortune in Panama and sunk it largely in the Belgian Congo. Our kings of sensationalism are journalists who made their money by newspapers. M. Bunau-Varilla is first of all a financier, who bought a newspaper, partly for profit perhaps, but more probably in the hope of influencing politics and the Bourse.

The case itself is relatively simple. The "Matin" accused M. Humbert, a prominent Senator, of being an accomplice in the alleged frauds of a company-promoter, M. Rochette, now under arrest on charges similar to those brought against Mr. E. T. Hooley. It was unable to support this accusation by a single relevant item of evidence, and was condemned to pay the maximum fine and damages, to the amount of £2,000. The real interest of the case lay in its amazing ramifications, and the subtlety and variety of the methods of "pressure" which it revealed. M. Humbert had been at one time the Secretary of the "Matin," and was its protégé and political figurehead. M. Rochette had been a good customer—on his own showing he had paid it 200,000 francs for favorable publicity for his promotions. The origin of the quarrel was apparently that M. Humbert began to write for the "Matin's" rival, "Le Journal." Its real grievance against him was "ingratitude," and it was able to prove that it obtained for him, from successive Ministers, (1) his rehabilitation after being involved in a military scandal; (2) his appointment to a post in the War Office; (3) his decoration; (4) a well-paid sinecure; (5) a degree of influence which enabled him to obtain orders from the Government for firms in which he had an interest. Here was an illustration startling enough of the political power which the "Matin" wielded. But in great things and small there was scarcely a limit to its omnipotence. An Ex-Minister of Justice declared, we do not know with what measure of truth, that it sought from him the post of judge for one of its creatures, and was amazed and indignant at his refusal, which it punished by accusing him of "fraud." It could apparently command some of the minor judges in Paris. Some of them would assist it to "interview" their more interesting prisoners, and supply them with good criminal "copy" in advance of a public trial. Its most audacious methods went unpunished. It even sent a reporter on one occasion—as the ex-Minister M. Chaumié stated—disguised as a high detective to a prisoner's house, seized his papers, read them, and published them, and then quietly returned the originals to the Prefect of Police. It was allowed, for the purposes of advertisement, to organise a marching competition in the army, and afterwards to hold a festivity gratis in the State Opera House. Another grotesque advertising device, the Blanchet exploring expedition in Africa, ended in a fiasco which cost the Republic some £2,500. The bill, as "L'Humanité" has proved, was presented to the "Matin," but payment was never enforced. It derived its electricity, as M. Labori reminded the jury, by the favor of the City of Paris, from a special cable constructed against all regulations and never paid for. But perhaps the quaintest little detail of all is the fact, dug up by "L'Humanité," that its proprietor enjoyed, with the President of the Republic and the Ambassadors of the Great Powers, the right of passing the octroi stations of Paris in his automobile without submitting to an examination. All the while it was making and unmaking Ministers by threatening to pursue them with some scandalous campaign, and influencing Republican policy, usually in a reactionary sense, by attacking the proposed income-tax, or organising the revival of capital punishment.

There is only one parallel to this omnipotence based on political blackmail—the power of Tammany Hall. It is distressing, not merely because it illustrates the ease with which a democracy of newspaper readers can be gulled, but still more because it suggests that Ministers who could be so easily terrorised by a vulgar and capricious despot, must have very vulnerable reputations. The end is not yet. For the moment the "Matin" seems to have suffered a severe blow, and has begun to dismiss contributors and squander apologies, in the hope of avoiding the libel actions which other victims are initiating in the wake of M. Humbert's success. But just as the trial was drawing to a close, it embarked on the boldest adventure of all. It is attempting to blackmail the Republic itself. It is avenging itself for its disgrace by advertising a Royalist Pretender. In a sprawling illustrated article in its place of honor, it interviewed the Duc D'Orléans, displayed his disavowals of anti-Parliamentarism and clericalism in the boldest type, and concluded the puff by assuring him, through the mouth of its special envoy, that he had succeeded in shaking some of its prejudices against the restoration of the monarchy. Here was a clear threat to Ministers and Senators, judges and juries, that it will initiate a royalist campaign, if they dare to attack its omnipotence under the Republic. This desperate and rather ludicrous device is probably the last hopeless bid for power. It must end by alarming even the "Matin's" public, and giving courage to its meanest victims. But the moral, one fears, will not be generally drawn until civilisation has suffered yet more severely from the mischief of an irresponsible Press. Ultimately, one suspects, society will seek safety by the means which the French and German Socialists have already adopted. "Vorwärts" is the one powerful and successful daily newspaper which is beyond the caprices of an individual capitalist, because it belongs to an organised party. M. Jaurès' brilliant little paper, "L'Humanité," is also the property of thousands of working-men shareholders, who have each subscribed their 25 or 50 francs to make a platform in the Press for their favorite deputies and leaders. Honesty and independence still survive, by an heroic struggle, in the daily Press of every country, but they survive in spite of the system which makes them dependent on the capital or the subsidies of wealthy men, and not because of it.

Life and Letters.

A STUDY IN "OVERLOOKING."

SINCE the middle of the year 1905 there have appeared in some of the weekly papers a few articles signed "Dorothy V. Horace Smith." Others, which did not bear this signature or were unsigned, were obviously the work of the same lady, with whom we became better acquainted last year through "Miss Mona." After I had read "Miss Mona" for the first time I saw it must be read again, and that the articles must be re-read, for here certainly was a new writer who was not an echo. It was evident that she had many and great gifts, and yet it was more than usually difficult to define them, for, in accordance with Goethe's ideal, they all act together. The effect produced depends not on striking situations, but is cumulative from common events, and achieved through ordinary people. Every one of these common events is really of consequence. Miss Horace Smith's writing, in fact, resembles a landscape by a master, in which the color of a bit of stone cropping out beside the road, and the shape of the hedges, are equally necessary with the predominance of one sort of tree over another, and with the outline of the hills. Here, for example, is a paper on an out-of-the-way Norfolk sea-village. When you have finished it you possess the village completely, but if you turn back to discover what are the particular points in the description, you find there are none. A butcher from whom the visitors in vain try to borrow a newspaper is just as important as the abandoned old Hall with its deserted garden and sea-blown trees. So again, in another paper, suggested also by a village in the east country. A donkey which fell sick and died is as essential as a little white-sailed boat which, with two people in it swept under a bridge late one summer's evening "whilst I stood pictured for them up against the sky."

There is a warning prefixed to "Miss Mona," that there are no portraits in it. This may be true, and yet, if ever a book was a record of experience this is one, and it is the experience which gives its value. Miss Mona was a young Churchwoman who desired to do some good in the world, and also "had need to stretch herself, to range beyond the limits of her home." She, therefore, started a Bible class for boys in the poorest part of her parish. She had much to learn, and the first thing was "not to mind," for her boys were very rough. Particular prominence is given to this lesson, and it distinguishes Miss Mona's method from those which are established and orthodox. Not only did she not mind what she could safely neglect, but if she could do nothing with what might be of consequence, she did not mind it. There was so much within her own compass which must be minded. She aimed first of all to breed confidence. She went as far as she could into the nature of her boys, for she knew that love is receptivity. Savagery was subdued by example, by her mere presence. There are not many boys or men inaccessible to courtesy, especially from a woman. She did not give them a course of definite dogmatic instruction. She talked to them on religious matters, but she took great interest in their games. They became easier believers when they found out she understood all about cricket. She was in no hurry with her creeds. She left to the clergy in the main the exposition of the articles of faith, which they could explain properly, and she could not. We are introduced to some of the boys. One is John Smith, who, the first Sunday he came to the Bible class, called one of his classmates into the backyard and had a fight with him. Miss Mona looked on and did not interfere, but one day after a cricket match, when the boys had tea in the schoolroom he slunk back to help Miss Mona to wash up after the rest had gone. "Of course, he would have hated it for such a story to have got about." Another was Edward Seaton, of a totally different order, son of a man who kept a general store. Ned was determined to get on, attended evening science classes, and tried to puzzle Miss Mona, whom he really admired, with Biblical difficulties. The two boys are brought together at Miss Mona's house and the contrasts of character are displayed with great dramatic skill. Miss Horace Smith must have had reality before her eyes, although the development, point, and humour are her own. Ned left Lavender Mead, where Miss Mona lived, went to a manufacturing town, and got a good situation. After three years' absence he came back on a visit and met his old teacher. He was now Edward Seaton more distinctly than before. Drink was the curse of Birlington, he told Miss Mona. "Poor things," she said, but Ned replied that the poor things had got it in their own hands and were not obliged to go to the public-house. He had been in the habit of attending St. Luke's Church, but he left it because he did not agree with incense, and there was a draught under the door which was "chronic." Besides, the Vicar believed in miracles, and the Laws of Nature could not be broken. Miss Mona asked him to supper as in days gone by, but he said no, "he must get back and look up some more old friends." She must have been a little sad. John Smith, however, came in, not for supper, but because he had some news to tell. Miss Mona asked if it was exciting. "Well, nothing exactly exciting," was the reply, but it turned out that a cousin in America had left him four thousand pounds. She inquired what he had done with it.

"'I don't know where it is,' said John. 'I only know I've got none of it.'

"'Oh! John, what foolish thing have you been doing?'—Miss Mona was quite frightened—'Who was the lawyer? You should have asked my father.'

"'It had nothing to do with the lawyer, and I would have asked your advice, miss, only you'd given it once before. You told me what you would do if you came in for a fortune.'

"'What did I say?' stammered Miss Mona. 'I am so stupid.'

"She had turned quite pale.

"John hastened to assure her.

"'What I did,' he said, 'I did of my own accord. It had nothing to do with what you said, only, remembering what you said, I knew you could raise no objection. Besides, it's nothing to make a fuss about. I got rid of it—gave it away.'" It had gone to different societies which he thought would know better than he what to do with it. He had studied, under Miss Mona, to some purpose the story of the young man who had rich possessions. She trembled, and, for a moment, drew back, when she saw what she had taught was actually believed and had taken shape. Christ had not told everybody to sell all.

"'He told me that night,' said John humbly."

He had often seen tears come into Miss Mona's eyes when she was glad, but he had never before seen them running down her cheeks.

This part of the story has necessarily been much abridged in my abstract, and has been almost spoilt in the process, for in the original there is hardly a line which does not tell. Enough, however, has, perhaps, been given to make my readers see that this is not a Bible-class tale for a Parish Magazine. The three characters are as interesting, the contrasts are as well marked, the situations as affecting, and the emotions as natural as in the best of plays or romances.

Miss Mona, through the death of her father, had to descend to a little suburban villa in Maple Road, and make suburban acquaintances. Her neighbours were much taken up with "good works," which, being interpreted, meant flowers, embroidery, cassocks and kneelers at St. Saviour's, very Ritualistic and almost Popish. She visited the Church. "Absurd reasons were adduced for doubtful doctrines, and questions were begged, and answers evaded, and God's final blessing invoked on it all. And yet if, as she imagined, quite half the women and more than half the men, including the preacher himself, saw through the gaping proofs and the threadbare, flimsy arguments, the fact remained that they continued to sit there, apparently satisfied, and came again week after week." She determined to worship at St. Saviour's. A remarkable chapter is this. She was religious: there was no insincerity in the "advanced" devotions in which she now took part, but we notice in her a certain overlooking, and we feel that the Vicar would have been puzzled with her.

She went on with her work, and her discouragements were many. She needed support for herself alone, and she needed more for this duty. If she failed in it she would be a failure altogether. Her consolations were all her own, but there is this to be said for those we discover for ourselves that they are more likely to be serviceable than those which other people discover for us. When some of her boys came back to her after long absence, she saw that a great part of what she had taught by precept and example had never touched them. But —" would she have had them understand all she had understood?"

Miss Mona, one bitter Christmas, was obliged to tell her boys she was unable to give them their Christmas presents. Amongst the few things of any value to her which she had saved when she moved into the villa was a picture not then considered to be worth much. She now read in the newspaper that a picture by the same artist had been sold for four thousand guineas. Was it right that four thousand guineas should hang on her walls, and that her charities should be starved and she should be pinched body and soul? But those hills, the quiet pool, the brook, had redeemed Maple Road. Her father loved them; ought she to part with them? There was an "ought" on both sides, and the difficulty of life is not the conflict between "ought" and "ought not," but between rival "oughts." She sat down and wrote to a dealer for a purchaser. The next chapter is one of the best, but I must be brief. The dealer sent a buyer who turned out to be Edward Seaton, now rich and still more completely Seaton. His good-natured vulgarity and impenetrability are very humorous. Her villa was "charming, with such a pleasant outlook," and she did not look a day older than she did fifteen years ago. "It would give him unbounded pleasure to stand in the room in which he was born. He could picture it vividly—the yellow paper in the parlour with the pink chrysanthemums (the dear old dad's most execrable taste!), the matting on the stairs, the handle off the bedroom door. "'Ah! my poor mother! she's gone now.'"

He was attached to his early home, but he apologised with the superfluous explanation that he had lived there all his early life. After, perhaps, half-an-hour's talk, Mr. Seaton looked at his watch: he must not waste any more of Miss Mona's time, and he must catch the four-thirty back to London. The picture was to be shown there before it went to his place in Gloucestershire, and he would send Miss Mona a card for the exhibition. When he had gone, she cried. Can we wonder? Maple Road; the departure of her father's lovely landscape, which had beguiled her loneliness and had served to transport her to a world of dreams and yet of reality. Of what service could its magic charm be at the "place" of E. Seaton, Esquire? Who would be enchanted there? But more painful still, E. Seaton, Esquire, had been her pupil. She sought for compensation in the thought of John Smith, who had left her district. She wandered into his parish church one Sunday evening hoping she might meet with him, and she heard his funeral sermon, a noble sermon, which I should like to print, every word of it, marked by that same mature overlooking philosophy noticed before.

So ends "Miss Mona," tragically, we may say. The heroine remains in Maple Road with no prospect of leaving it; Edward Seaton, Esquire, has taken her "Vale of Llangollen," and she will see it no more; John Smith is dead; but we can hear a note like that which rises triumphant in a funeral march.

All Miss Horace Smith's work is that of an artist. Her meaning is to be classed with those meanings which are almost no meanings and are, nevertheless, precious and delightful. We never feel that we have got all that can be got, and we return again and again. She sees where real significance lies. She does not exaggerate, and her style is characteristic of her. It is not labored, inverted, or brilliant, but as pure as that of the "Vicar of Wakefield."

MOLIÈRE AND MODERN DRAMA.

The difference between Molière in text and Molière in production is greater than the difference between Shakespeare or Ibsen in text and Shakespeare or Ibsen in production, for Molière is, as Matthew Arnold has suggested, a great theatre artist rather than a great dramatic poet. It is only when we see such a play as "Tartuffe" on the boards that we get an adequate idea of Molière's dramatic invention. And we should appreciate the privilege of seeing M. Coquelin in Molière parts. M. Coquelin adds a Mascarille and a Tartuffe to our consciousness, and he enlarges our conception of the actor's art. As Mascarille in "Les Précieuses Ridicules" he expanded with Gallic humour. His exuberance expanded the audience. And what a contrast between this robust vulgarity and the unctuousness, the stillness, the creeping movements of his Tartuffe in the previous half-hour! When M. Coquelin creates his Tartuffe he puts before us, not merely the hypocrite, but the impotence and the cunning that take refuge in hypocrisy. It is as though he went below human nature and discovered a creature at once vulpine and slow. It is like some soft-footed animal that pads away through the silence, becoming still at a shadow. Tartuffe is the essential parasite; his hypocrisy is like the black cloak that M. Coquelin gives him, a sort of protective coloring. Everything in M. Coquelin's make-up was memorable; the cloak, the sleek, reddish hair, curling at the ends, the close mouth, the covered eyes. The parasite's eyes had become slits, and one of them was closed; it was as though the creature had fallen from the nobleness of vision. He seemed to apprehend things through a lower sense. When he stood in absolute stillness, like a thing feigning death, one was aware of almost imperceptible feelings crossing his face. Something had startled him, and the moment afterwards we understood his alarm.

M. Coquelin's acting is in key with a play that is made up of generalisations—moral generalisations and comic generalisations. Tartuffe himself is a generalisation, and Orgon, Cléante, Valère are generalisations also. The most delightful situations may be described as generalised comedy, as, for instance, the entrance of Tartuffe, his first speech, and the scene with the servant, Dorine, that follows. Many of Molière's broad effects come out of traditional stage business. The scene where the homecoming Orgon asks after the welfare of his household is out of the traditional and permanent comedy.

Orgon: . . What has happened? How is everybody?

Dorine: The day before yesterday mistress was very feverish, from morn to night; she had a terrible headache.

Orgon: And Tartuffe?

Dorine: Tartuffe! He's all right, stout and fat, with blooming cheeks and red lips.

Orgon: Dear old boy!

Dorine: In the evening she felt very faint, and the pain in her head was so great that she couldn't touch a bit at supper.

Orgon: And Tartuffe?

Dorine: He ate his supper by himself before her, and devoutly made off with a brace of partridges and half a leg of hashed mutton.

Orgon: Dear old boy! &c., &c., &c.

The essential difference between the play of Molière and the play of the modern dramatist is that Molière deals with types, whereas the modern artist is occupied with the individual. The discovery of the individual has broken up a certain type of comedy. Comedy is very often, to use a phrase of Walter Pater's, tragedy seen from the other side. The individual demands to be shown from every side, and so the idea of "Tartuffe" in its working out by the modern dramatist might become as tragic a play as "The Wild Duck." One side of the play is the unmasking of Tartuffe, but the other side is the disillusioning of Orgon. Tartuffe had not infected this good man with his hypocrisy; indeed, he seems to have given him an ideal of piety and restraint. If Orgon were less of a type his appearance from under the table would not be a signal for laughter, but for a tightening of the heart-strings. And Tartuffe? It is necessary to give the impostor a good exit after his exposure; he should have a momentary triumph, and in his triumph there should be some surprise for the audience. Molière achieves Tartuffe's exit through a stage device. Tartuffe actually owns Orgon's house and goods. They have been made over to him, and this fact has been kept from the audience until the moment when Tartuffe turns. The device is good of its kind, but the modern dramatist (provided he were a genius) could go one better than Molière. He could get the triumph and the surprise by a flash of self-revelation from the parasite.

"When sudden . . . How think ye, the end?
Did I say 'Without friend'?
Say rather from marge to blue marge
The whole sky grew his targe
With the sun's self for visible boss,
While an arm ran across
Which the earth heaved beneath like a breast,
Where the wretch was safe pres't.
Do you see? Just my vengeance complete,
The man sprang to his feet,
Stood erect, caught at God's skirts and prayed,
So I was afraid."

The construction of "Tartuffe" is, of course, in different terms to the construction of the modern play, with its developing psychological interests. Molière is not under the necessity of revealing the individual through detail of speech and action. He hardly prepares an "entrance" for his personage. The actual appearance of Tartuffe is deferred until the third act, and then he is brought on, casually, as it would seem. Molière has grasped the type so assuredly that he can give us the impression of the man on the moment of his entry and a few moments afterwards he can precipitate him into the very crisis of the play. "Tartuffe," in its construction, has firmness and sequence, but its order is different to the logical development of the modern play. Molière and Ibsen approach the stage from opposite sides. To Molière the play is a succession of situations more or less closely related; to Ibsen the play is a dramatic theme, ordering itself into a succession of scenes or situations rigidly subordinated to the idea. The logical play lacks diversity, and it becomes wearisome, because the mind of the audience is contracted to a single issue. The most logical of Ibsen's social plays fail of their full intention because of their lack of variety. In Molière's the scene is not rigidly subordinated; it has a life of its own, and so the whole play has abundance and diversity. The great theatre artist has learned in the booths on his village green that the audience wants to make his play something of a variety show, and that they eagerly welcome the "turn." In "Tartuffe" Molière gives "the turn" again and again. The scene in the second act, where the servant interrupts Orgon's arrangements for his daughter's marriage, is unnecessary for the play, but delightful to the audience.

We are in danger of becoming obsessed by the orderly drama, and it is well to have our attention directed to the fact that dramatic genius is not in the faculty of orderly exposition, nor is it power of creating character, nor of making fitting dialogue. Dramatic power lies in the sense of situation, in the power of making startling combinations within the limits of probability. The sense of situation is the real dramatic quality. And, like the living organism that is made up of a number of diminished organisms, the play is a synthesis of little plays.

THE CITY OF DEAD WATERS.

The way there leads southward from Nîmes, by a little toy train that wanders quietly over the level land. The scene is at first the landscape of Provence: white stones interrupting the brown earth, the vineyards everywhere, everywhere the earth shining. Then it changes: to the marshes, stretching to a far distance; stagnant pools, long ditches of brown water, rank, stubborn reeds and grasses. Suddenly, from the heart of this desolation, there rises a high brown wall, broken by successive towers, with an enormous round fortress crowning one end of it, and no visible signs of human habitation. The train draws up under the shadow of that huge rampart: a gateway opens, leading within; on all sides are marshes and waste places, where no man comes. A city straitly guarded by that inviolate wall, set in a region unsuited for man's dwelling-places, is the City of Dead Waters.

The sense of fatigue and of an immense weariness broods over Aigues Mortes. The walls have resisted the ravages of time for six hundred years. They remain as perfect to-day as when they were first raised as a barricade against the Saracen. No ivy or kindly growing things tug at their sullen strength or set themselves in the crevices of these large, smooth, polished stones. No wind scatters the crumbling edifice in the restoration of dust to dust. Time makes no effort to assail them: it passes them by, forgetful, contemptuous, leaving the city and its people to abide there, in the marshes, outside the effort of resistance and defeat, for ever unheeded and alone. You can march round them, upon the echoing way where once armed men kept eager watch against invasion: up and down the stone staircases of tall towers, along the even-paved path which still rings firm to the feet: looking down on the one side to the little straight streets of a little forgotten town: looking down on the other to the dead waters and barren sand and quiet green grasses which stretch from the actual wall towards a limitless horizon. Nowhere are the boundaries more clearly defined between man's territory and the regions beyond. The city stands at the place where sea and land are mingled, in a kingdom owning complete allegiance to neither, as independent as a ship at sea, and with as definite limits: the high brown walls just protecting this tiny vessel that man has pushed out into the desert, and left there, seemingly as dead as a ship for ever becalmed on a sea, without motion or anger: a vessel floating unchallenged through the centuries, so negligible as to remain unhurt by time and change.

No city so completely excites the feeling that it could be taken up in one's hand, lifted from a surrounding with which it has no sympathy, into which it has struck no root. From the summit of the huge Tower of Constance, one looks down upon its rectangular streets with the grass growing in them, and withered plane trees with yellowing leaves and little white houses with green shutters: all leading to the central place with the statue of St. Louis there, all sharply limited by the rectangular boundary of the high brown walls. From the land gate creeps the thin brown thread of railway, the solitary link (as it seems) of this dead city with the cities which are still alive. From the sea gate stretch the quiet lagoons, one behind the other, locked in their boundaries of sand. Until beyond them the sand itself drifts away, and the sun shines and sparkles upon the unchallenged, blue, tideless sea. Tiny streets within a huge, unchallenged rampart of the Middle Age, set in the region where mingle sand and sea and sky—that is Aigues Mortes.

Once the city was joyfully alive. Hither came St. Louis at the beginning of his reign to embark upon the Crusade which was to leave him a prisoner in Egypt: hither, again, twenty years afterwards, he sailed for Tunis, to his death, in the last of those amazing enterprises. The Lords of medieval Europe, Brittany, Burgundy, Montferrat, all the battle array of the Middle Age whose names are like a song, encamped here for many busy months; sailed away one August morning southward to the singing of the "Veni Creator"—for the most part never to return. Those who struggled back again found a dream vanished: they had sailed into another world.

It is another world also that the custodian of the Tower of Constance will show you, not without pity, as he reveals recollections, in that huge cliff of stone, of the prisoners confined there, through a death in life, in an age which had forgotten the dream of a renovated society, and was hasting towards an ultimate overthrow. It is a far cry from Louis judging his people under the royal tree, or embarking from Aigues Mortes to wrest the sepulchre of Christ from the hands of the infidel, to the government of Louis XV., the most corrupt and squalid in human record, torturing a few weak women for the crime of heresy and revolt against the faith which was outraged by the allegiance of so evil a Court and company. But the other historic memory guarded by this sleeping city is of the confinement of a few Huguenot women in these darkened chambers, to which the light scarce penetrates, striking downward through the long narrow windows set in deep thicknesses of stone. They have scratched the plaints of their misery upon the walls of their prisons: they left pitiful relics there, lately discovered: children's shoes, pieces of earthenware, letters of protest and despair. Nine, twelve, twenty years after their first confinement these letters tell of unavailing effort, from husband or son outside, directed towards their release: petitions to local Governors, to the Intendant of Languedoc, to the Royal Clemency itself: all for the most part unheeded. At length, twenty years before the Revolution, the prison is closed for ever. Fourteen women still remain: all suffering for the crime, says the companion of their liberator, "that they had been brought up in the same religion as Henri Quatre." The youngest was fifty; she had been there since she was eight years old. The permission was only to release three or four; but "these unhappy women," said the liberator, "had all an equal claim on justice and humanity. I could make no choice between them." The Minister in Paris was enraged at such a lavish exercise of clemency, not knowing that the Revolution was already knocking at the door. "They did such things—in those old days," is the explanation of the custodian, with an expressive shrug and deprecating motion of the hands, recording the story for the benefit of successive tourists—if without surprise, yet with regret. A child of the Revolution, a Government servant, whose scanty remuneration in this forgotten place is eked out with the largesse of the occasional visitor, he is yet proud to declare himself a Socialist, and to comfort himself at times with a vision of more equal justice amongst mankind. He speaks—with infinite delight—a few words of broken English: he cherishes ambition to visit England—to visit especially London—the abode of so many of those travellers whose names, he demands, shall be inscribed in his visiting book: a great and beautiful city (as he pictures it) exceedingly different from Aigues Mortes. He bears the evidence of disease, as indeed do all the inhabitants: for those high brown walls, which have resisted so exultantly the onslaughts of men, offer no protection against the deadlier attacks of the marsh fevers. Yet even here there is evidence of resistance and of aspiration. The tricolor flag, the appeal to "Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité," decorates the tiny toy town hall. Placards on the wall announce to the citizens of the Republic that the sitting deputy, representing a fusion of the Socialist-Republicans, the Democratic-Socialists, and the Socialist-Independents, will have the honor of addressing his constituents at a certain date. Sitting in a sheltered spot just outside the sea gate, in the early afternoon, may be seen the survivors of the city: the still enduring adult life, gathered under the high walls, gazing incuriously at the stranger who has accepted the foolishness of a journey to the City of Dead Waters. In their ragged, sad-colored clothing, their aspect of acquiescence, the evidence of poverty and of fever stamped upon their battered bodies, one is astonished at the vivacity which can still fissure them into contending sections of political parties, at the force of hope which can still kindle and illuminate their lives with the vision of a brighter dawn.

But acceptance remains as the ultimate impression: acceptance, with a certain meekness, of the unchallenged dominance of an unhuman world which only does not exhibit its strength because its supremacy is assured. Man has been permitted to build this city, by the borders of these long lagoons, on this stretch of secure sand, in the midst of a large desolation. He may shelter behind his high walls, carry out quietly the business of his little life, raise his watch tower, gather in his salt and seaweed, bury his dead. But he must carry out these occupations with some humility, without too vigorous a proclamation of his importance. For he is only encamped here, and only for a time, in the kingdom of other gods: set in a region where the crying of the wild fowl and the moaning of the wind, the rank scum-covered pools and strong sea grasses, the league on league of sullen swamp and sandy shore, proclaim the abiding triumph of those forces of night and its terrors which are hostile to the kindly ways of man.

THE INTERVAL.

Slowly and slowly the stealthy, stretching blue pervades the sky; and for a while all else seems gloomier. Then gradually the weird transparent deepness of the dawn descends and floods the streets. So that the houses and the buildings come to shape out of the empty nothingness of night, and jag the faint, increasing glimmer overhead with broken silhouettes that grow and grow. During a space the soft strange luminousness makes all things seem unreal. Then with a curious suddenness it is light.

The day is come; and in the first fresh clearness of its early hours there is repose. The City of the Great Unrest is wrapped in the innocence of sleep.

For when the full light of morning has succeeded the wonder of the dawn, only the remnants of revelry return to bed, and only the beginnings of work are heard to stir. The queer, clear quiet of early day prevails. And the solemnity of stillness seems more strange, because of the interminable surrounding miles of crowded emptiness. It is the awful contrast of a face in death.

The flashing illuminated clatter of the night has hardly ceased; you recollect the rush and turmoil of the day before; the roar is with you still. But, as you walk, the twittering of the sparrows sounds loud, by reason of the all-pervading calm; and the features of the city seem grown cold.

Without the accustomed crowds, new aspects of places are revealed, and well-known spots look unfamiliar. Great junctions of conflicting streets are peaceful spaces, with curiously shaped bits of pavement here and there, and gaps and isolated blocks of buildings around. The roads seem broader by their emptiness; and the statues and monuments tower strangely in their solitude. The shops are mere blind windows, grimly shuttered, or cavernous displays; and vistas of broken picturesque facades, above them, attract the eye. The empty pavements show unexpected dips and twists; and posts, and seats, and olden package-rests, unnoticed previously in the crowds, stand out upon the vacant kerbs; and extra pillar-boxes, grown big and lonely, rise up at unsuspected corners of the streets. The parks are railed and gated wonderlands of mystery.

And on and on in front of you, and stretching back and back behind, and cutting and crossing every way, and meeting and opening up on every side, are stark, contracting avenues of emptiness—the eerie, overwhelming emptiness of unpeopled streets.

Through all this silent void of vacancy, only disjointed, isolated life is seen; and all that is seen seems garish or unnatural, by reason of the loneliness and light. For in the tranquillity of the Interval, all but a few small areas of activity are still, and only extremes of work and play, and destitution are not at rest.

With a sudden intermittent unexpectedness you meet them; and they come and go. A policeman strolls listlessly, with silent tread, and walks by force of habit close to the houses, where the shadow was; or stands in the doorway of a shop, with the weary apathy which comes, with watching, at the dawn. With a hollow flop and a louder trundling of wheels, a carriage of late, last revellers of a dance goes home; and at the open window a flushed face leans, from out great piles of white, in a languorous abandon, to catch the morning air; and back against the cushions, jewels shine upon a woman's uncovered throat, palely by reason of the morning light. A cat pads unconcernedly across the road, with a sinuous sway of rippling fur, and slithers through the railings of an area gate. And every here and there, upon a seat or in a huddled, muddied bundle on a step, one of the evil shadow-creatures of the night, too worn-out to creep into a corner where the light comes last, lies with a carefully shielded face; and a naked bit of shrunken leg above the bursted boot, or the matted tangle of the sunken head betrays their misery. The cool, fresh daylight makes their plight more horrible.

Occasionally a shabby nondescript, not tramp or citizen, trudges by; and the odd unfathomable preoccupation of his look raises a wonder at his early walk. A youth, in a buttoned-up overcoat and opera hat, swings jauntily along; but the furtive blood-shot eyes and the brutalised refinement in his face belie his nonchalance. Or something shivering, that was once a woman, slinks past. And now and then dilapidated cabs tittup and jangle harshly through the streets; and in the one or two of them that meet you, the haggard weariness of travel or dissipation stares out or leans back and sleeps. A lank, flat-footed waiter dodders quickly home, and an early laborer strolls leisurely to work. The glow of the coffee-stalls has disappeared; and the scraps and debris of the night's repasts, strewn on the ground in front, add to the meanness of their morning look; the owner sits inside and nods.

So, in the first fresh stillness of another day, only occasional reverberations of the city's herded life are heard—a tramp, the whispering scrape of worn feet, the growing, dying clatter of a cab, hoots from a river tug, or a hidden cough; and all is still again. The silence seems to fill and permeate the gaunt blank rows of houses, and settle down; so that the echo of your tread sounds rude. For all around is hidden, sleeping life.

In all this silent, hollow emptiness, where work, and play, and sin, and sorrow sleep, a certain wonder grows; and the pathos of the temporary peacefulness stirs the mind. Because the oblivion of the Interval is so short.

It is as if, in the City of the Great Unrest, the people had to hurry at their sleep. The crowds who fight and cringe for a competence are hardly rested; the herds who drudge for the wherewithal to live are tired yet; and they who plot for wealth still think in their early sleep. Fair women, sighing from a day and night of fevered gaiety, have only recently undone their hair; late revellers have but closed their aching eyes; and legions of pleasure-worn wealthy toss in the first half-conscious fidget of weariness. Hot, wide-eyed scheming and self-questioning have lately dozed; and they who would willingly forget the night have just succeeded in forgetfulness. But the beginnings of another day's intensity already stir.

Very soon all must commence again. According to their circumstances, they must set their face, or frown, or smile, and hurry through another day of hopeless toil, or busyness, or merriment. Of their necessity or unsatisfied desire, they will cheat another night with various, excited gaiety. And many must meet a waking weight of anxiety or shame.

Because, with the renewal of the city's rushing day, the burden of remembered difficulties, or wrongs, or iniquities returns; and during the night new sin has grown old. All must be faced, and grappled with, and hid.

Thus the empty stillness of the peaceful streets is fraught with a certain weird significance. The sleeping oblivion of the city seems ominous. For almost immediately the rush and struggle cease, the struggle and the rush begin again—impelled by the inevitable intricacies of herded human lives. The Interval is only a little lull between the storms.

The Drama.

THE ART OF STAGE DANCING.

It is interesting to observe the arrival in London of a beautiful form of dramatic art—that of stage dancing. For many years one kind, the Milanese ballet, has flourished among us, mysteriously associated with the music-hall "turn," with which, in the nature of things, it has no special connection. Garish in color, highly conventional in its setting, it has now and then given scope for the talent of artists so full of expression and so personally graceful as Mdlle. Genée. It is quite harmless, being usually devoted to the innocently absurd in theme. As M. Jourdain's instructor says, "il se donne en bergerie," and it has remained fixed in its eighteen-century artificiality. But the Italian ballet can never quite satisfy the lover of the dance. All art is immensely difficult to acquire, but when it is presented it must suggest ease. This the ballet in its usual form does not do. For the artist it involves a most painful and laborious training, and its most brilliant steps, like a flashing succession of pirouettes, and the recurring work "sur les pointes," are more like feats of gymnastics than representations of an art closely associated in its best days with great music and drama, and with the expression of deep human emotion. The short skirt of the leading dancers in the modern ballet rather emphasises this gymnastic side of the accomplishment. It ill suits the flowing lines of the woman's figure, which in the cases of the principal dancers is stiffly held from the waist upwards, and reveals the hardships and penalties of the artist's task, such as the over-development of muscle which severe and prolonged training in the school and at rehearsal brings about. Genée, with her remarkable lightness and slimness, her buoyant artist's temperament, her amiable and expressive face, and her capacity for those brilliant physical tours de force for which the ballet gives scope, has done much to keep it in the line of beauty. But, after all, it is dancing divorced not only from its old association with religious feeling, and with the graver functions of public life, from which Plato would never have separated it, but largely from the sense of plastic beauty that feeds itself on memories of Greek art.

Therefore one cannot but feel that a certain advance has taken place when the stiff dress and formal attitudes of the ballet are cast aside, and we come back to the flowing line and to natural draperies, giving suppleness and variety of movement to the body. This appears to be the main object of dancers like Maud Allan and Isadora Duncan. Then one comes to subject. Both these artists, I imagine, eschew the old ballet form and detail, and aim at freer and also more subtle effects. They desire to interpret the quickly changing emotions which music—especially modern music—awakens. They fit the dancing to the music, instead of calling on the musician to seek some simple method of displaying the mechanical accomplishment that finds expression in entrechats and arabesques. The contact between dancing and the human emotion—be it joy, sorrow, fear, faith, or despair—illustrated thus becomes direct, and the slight but wearisome futilities of plot and pantomime which hamper the Italian school disappear. This, I suppose, is what gives charm to Miss Allan's rendering of Mendelssohn's "Spring Song."

But then this lady—whose work I have not seen—seems to have made one absolutely inadmissible choice of subject. What can be said for such a deformation of the purpose of art as is implied in a "Salomé" dance? The story of the life and death of John the Baptist is woven, lightly and mysteriously, into the pattern of the Gospel story, and no man whom perfection satisfies desires to add one alpha to it. But Oscar Wilde, a pervert himself, chose to turn the tale of the prophet's murder into a piece of delicately fashioned, but not less perverted, sensuality. In doing this he missed its intention and spoiled its beauty. We want to know nothing more about Salomé than that she danced before Herod, and that the price of her dance was the prophet's life. No lover of literature or of art cares to see a dead man's head postured before on the stage; still less does he desire to see the moral of the Bible story—which Bunyan repeated in the martyrdom of "Faithful" in Vanity Fair—obliterated, and its significant and sombre setting materialised. I can no more witness a representation of this character than I can see horses disembowelled at a bull-fight.

Miss Duncan has chosen much safer ground than this. In the delightful representation which she gave at the Duke of York's Theatre on Monday night, she chose to illustrate a series of dances and choruses from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide." I don't know to what extent she made use of Noverre's ballet devices, but I did not discern in her dancing any very close or strenuous endeavor to enforce the dramatic ideas of the poem. Her idea seemed rather to reproduce in a series of connected movements, answering generally to those of the musical suite, some of the most beautiful and best remembered groupings on Greek vases. Thus she was at one moment, and in harmony with one kind of musical idea, a flute-player in procession, at another a crowned Bacchanal, or a ball-player, or a Niobe, one arm out, appealing to the bolts of Heaven, or, as Iphigénie should be, a dedicated priestess of Artemis. Studied, and almost precise as these representations were, so that if a hundred photographs had been taken of the dancer they would have revealed a hundred familiar figures and attitudes, their combined effect was one of singular charm. "A good dancer," says Carlo Blasis, "ought always to be able to serve for a model to the sculptor and painter," and this was clearly Miss Duncan's aim. Miss Duncan was dressed in various forms of the classical tunic, longer and shorter, some of the fashions being borrowed, it appears, from the Tanagra statuettes. Her face lends itself to a certain benignity and blitheness of expression, but it is not at all classical, and her figure suggests dignity rather than the dancer's lightness of poise. But her steps, especially in the processional dances, were free and most pictorial, even if a little deliberate and passionless, and the solemn rhythmical march, in which she used the music as a very loose illustration of her movements and gestures, was nobly symbolical. The surroundings were entirely simple. She had no scenery, the stage being closed in with a square formed of high grey-brown curtains, through the foldings of which at the wings she and her young pupils made their exits and entrances. Thus, by sweeping away the whole conventional apparatus for the adornment of the scene, she greatly enhanced its effect. But the full finish of her highly-cultivated method was seen in her pupils. There is nothing in the world like the young dancer, and some of these pursuing and retreating little figures, in their light Greek drapery, might well have figured on the urn on which our English poet found his perfect vision of beautiful form. The representation was received with a rapture which shows how easily the art of stage dancing may be made to give delight when famous models are revived, and the seeds of old thought and feeling renewed through such a master of dramatic expression in music as Gluck.

Music.

AN ARTIST AND SOME "STARS."

The opera season at Covent Garden is nearing its end, but, as usual, the last few weeks have been among the most interesting. One cannot look back on the season as a whole with any strong regret that it is a-dying, for opera has become so much a question of supply and demand, in a strictly commercial sense, that the repertoire is at the mercy of the popularity of certain artists. The syndicate does all it can. It would give us some of the modern French operas if there were any French singers who would be likely to attract the subscribers. It is a curious fact that although modern French opera is the most vital of all opera, modern French singers are mediocre. That they are competent to perform the works of Debussy, Charpentier, and Bruneau is not to the point from the Covent Garden view of the matter. They must also be able to draw as "stars." Properly speaking, no stage composition can be really performed to perfection without "stars." There can be no question that ensemble will not take the place of genius. Coquelin, Ternina, Duse, and Réjane were, and are, "stars." Their individual talents attract just as the vocal gifts of Melba or Tetrazzini attract. Imagine "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" without Coquelin and you have some idea of the point of view of Covent Garden subscribers. For a long while it was unbearable to see and hear any Isolde but Ternina's, or any Walther but Jean de Reszke's. And there is artistic reason for this. These great artists did bring out the higher poetry of Wagner's music dramas. The best ensemble in the world could not do that. Unfortunately, opera is too accommodating a nursery for the vocal egotist. A great actor can make us accept a poor play with equanimity. M. Coquelin, for instance, makes Halévy's milk-and-water "Abbé Constantin" acceptable, but there is not the same gulf between this sentimental little drama and a great work of art, such as "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," as there is between such trash as Verdi's "Traviata" or Donizetti's "Lucia" and Bizet's "Carmen," or Wagner's "Tristan." The language of music is not stationary. Its very indefiniteness prevents that. The old operas are insane, and were built for an insane idea of singing, whereas old plays are often more modern than new, and, good or bad, most dramas have some element of natural human feeling in them.

Then there is a great difference between "star" actors and "star" singers. The "star" actor, unless he overdoes his business, is an artist. He makes his great effects because he is an artist. A "star" singer, on the other hand, may be a mere human phonograph. The voice in singing has an intrinsic value. There is no one quality for which a great actor can be thus admired. At Covent Garden during this last season we have been the victims of the intrinsic value of the voice. Tetrazzini and Melba, Melba and Tetrazzini, have played a kind of operatic see-saw. Whenever they have appeared it has been the singer and not the opera to which we have listened. Within limits there is pleasure in listening to the unhuman and instrumental perfection of Melba's voice; and there is a thrill in hearing Tetrazzini's astonishing trills. But we have had to pay a tremendous artistic price for that sensuous enjoyment. Before the glory of Tetrazzini came upon us, Melba almost alone inflicted the insane music on the opera-goer. Now there are two of these mechanical "stars."

If our opera season had anything but an indirect traffic with art, Mlle. Emine Destinn would be the artist of whom magazines and newspapers would be full. She is the only complete artist among the prima-donne at Covent Garden. The mere mention of the parts she has played—Senta, Aïda, Nedda, Donna Anna, Madama Butterfly and Armide—gives an idea of the scope of this artist's talents. In all she has acted and sung with refreshing sincerity, and always with dignity, emotion, and fervour. She has not, it is true, the sublime tragedy and spiritual aloofness of a Ternina, but then she has more variety. For instance, Ternina was equally good as Isolde and as Tosca, but then there is something in common in both parts. At any rate, both have expressed tragedy as their basis. Mlle. Destinn's particular triumph has been in her singing and acting of Madama Butterfly in Puccini's opera. In mere length it is a most trying part, and, moreover, it is not one in which Mlle. Destinn's physical gifts actually help her. The naïveté of the little Japanese girl's love for the American naval officer does not demand Destinn's gift for the expression of emotional tragedy. There is the usual Italian emotion in the music, of course, but it is hidden beneath the surface. When Giachetti played the part it was easier to appraise Destinn's performance at its proper value, for Giachetti is a very capable artist. Her Madama Butterfly was much too heavy and obvious. Destinn, by sheer art and imaginative powers, manages to keep the part in its proper environment.

The singer is still quite young, and report says that she is an earnest student of her art, and, in private life, a woman of remarkable individuality and original ideas. There is, therefore, room for hope that she will improve as time goes on. She is already a well cultivated artist and no mere Mlle. Cavalieri who, with numerous jewels and without proper equipment, has worked her way to the opera stage from being a music-hall singer and dancer. Nor is Mlle. Destinn a singer of one part or of one type of character as Mme. Calvé was and Mme. Gay is (for all we know at Covent Garden). But although her great talents are recognised by the public, Mlle. Destinn has not quite succeeded in taking the high position she deserves. In discussing her with those qualified to give a reasoned opinion on operatic matters, you always hear a qualification. If she only did this, or if she only did that, Mlle. Destinn would be one of the greatest artists the opera stage has ever seen.

First of all, she is inclined to force her voice in the stress of emotion so that its quality becomes a little hard. It is impossible to believe that this is a radical and incurable fault, for the voice itself, if not of the rarest type, is a beautiful organ. Rather it is due to the artist not having her feelings under proper control, and is one of the defects of her qualities. Then Mlle. Destinn has curious physical tricks which mar her acting. She has not learned how to sing without distortion of the face. That is probably due to the same cause that makes her voice sound a trifle hard. But, principally, she does not hold herself well. In this respect she has improved, which shows that she has recognised the truth of criticism, but she is still inclined to crouch forward as if about to spring. This characteristic position of the body is not conducive to good singing, nor does it allow the artist to employ a sufficient variety of gesture. In such rôles as Donna Anna and Armide this physical peculiarity of Mlle. Destinn's militates against a proper dignity of carriage, and, it may well be, against proper dignity of singing. It may be that Mlle. Destinn is not fitted for "grand" parts, that she is an emotional and realistic singer rather than an operatic tragédienne, but with her intensity of feeling and great range of emotion this limitation should not be irremovable. She is certainly the most promising and complete artist among the prima-donne at Covent Garden.

THOUGHTS

ON RE-VISITING A CENTRE OF COMMERCE WHERE A VAST CATHEDRAL CHURCH IS BEING ERECTED.

CITY of merchants, lords of trade and gold,
Traffickers great as they that bought and sold
When ships of Tarshish came to Tyre of old;

City of festering streets by Misery trod,
Where half-fed, half-clad children swarm unshod,
While thou dost rear thy splendid fane to God;

O rich in fruits and grains and oils and ores,
And all things that the feastful Earth outpours,
Yet lacking leechcraft for thy leprous sores!

Heal thee betimes, and cleanse thee, lest in ire
He whom thou mock'st with pomp of arch and spire
Come on thee sleeping, with a scythe of fire.

Let nave and transept rest awhile; but when Thou hast done His work who lived and died for men,
Then build His temple on high—not, not till then.

A DREAM.

A FEW days ago I dreamed that I was steering a very gay and elaborate ship upon some narrow water with many people upon its banks, and that there was a figure upon a bed in the middle of the ship. The people were pointing to the figure and questioning, and in my dream I sang verses which faded as I awoke, all but this fragmentary thought, "We call it, it has such dignity of limb, by the sweet name of Death." I have made my poem out of my dream and the sentiment of my dream, and can almost say, as Blake did, "The Authors are in Eternity."

There on the high and painted stern
I held a painted steering oar,
And everywhere that I could turn
Men ran upon the shore.

And though I would have hushed the crowd,
There was no mother's son but said,
"What is the figure in a shroud
Upon a painted bed?"

And fishes, bubbling to the brim,
Cried out upon that thing beneath,
It had such dignity of limb,
By the sweet name of Death.

Though I'd my finger on my lip,
What could I but take up the song?
And fish and crowd and painted ship,
Cried out the whole night long.

Crying, amid the glittering sea,
Naming it with ecstatic breath,
Because it had such dignity,
By the sweet name of Death.

STARLIGHT DISTILLETH.

TREE by tree filleth,
What do they sigh at?
Field by field thrilleth,
Low comes the fiat:
"Let him that willeth,
Cease from his riot.
Starlight distilleth;
Do thóu be quiet!

"Night the tremendous
Grasps thee and veils thee,
Slow thy stupendous
Intelligence fails thee.

"I, the star-crowded,
Outsoar and outsink thee;
No more care-clouded Need'st thou bethink thee!

"Let my primordial
Stupor that seizes
Cure, with the cordial
For all thy diseases . . ."

Tree by tree thrilleth—
What do they sigh at?
Sleep the soul filleth,
Man no more willeth,
Starlight distilleth;
All Earth is quiet.

HERBERT TRENCH.

THE GAD-FLY.

ARAB SONG.

(The poet replies to them who have affronted him.)

YE know not why God hath joined the horse-fly unto the horse,
Nor why the generous steed is yoked with the poisonous fly.
Lest the steed should sink into ease and lose his fervour of nerve,
God hath appointed to him a lustful and venemous bride.

They do not lie supine, the steeds of our folk, to the sting,
Praying for deadness of sense, their wounds the shame of the sun.
They strive—but they strive for this—the vivid and vibrant nerve,
They pant—but they pant for this—the speed that outstrips the pain!

Sons of the Dust, ye have stung—there is darkness upon my soul!
Sons of the Dust, ye have stung—yea, stung to the roots of my heart,
But I have said in my breast, "The birth succeeds to the pang,"
And, Sons of the Dust, behold, your malice becomes my song.

LOVE'S BIRTH.

I HEARD a voice methought was sweet;
Skylark, I mused, thy praise is done;
That voice I'd rather hear than thine
With twenty songs in one.

And she, in sooth, is fair, thought I,
Looking her close with cold, calm eyes—
As the Lily at May's feet, or Rose
That on June's bosom lies.

I heard one day a step; a voice,
Heard in a room next door to mine;
And then I heard long, laughing peals,
For him! from Rosaline.

Again she laughs; what! mocking me?
I shook like coward in the night—
Who fears to either lie in dark,
Or rise to make a light.

For weeks I cursed the day I met
That fair sleep-robber, Rosaline;
Till Love came pure from smoke and flame—
I swore she should be mine.

And in her house I held her firm,
She closed her eyes and lay at rest;
But still she laughed, as if a bird
Should sing in its warm nest.

THE DREAMERS KNOW.

I.

WHEN we built the hopes of youth,
Those high embattled hopes,
When we heard the wonder-call
Ring through the echoing world,
When the solemn vision grew,
Splendour and hope and joy,
Like the mounting hues of dawn
Across the heaven of God,
What was the light that shone?
What was the song we heard?
Whence was the daring plan?
What memory divine
Of the glory whence we came
Was the dream of our desire?
None but the dreamers know,
Only the dreamers know.

II.

When the years are closing in,
When the skies of life are grey,
And the hopes are unfulfilled,
And the wonder-call is dumb,
And still the heart is glad,
Proud for the hope that was,
For the echo in the soul,
For the memory of dawn,
What are the tones that live?
Whence the abiding joy
Of the dream that never dies?
Who but the dreamers know?
Only the dreamers know.

III.

When the light of life is low,
And our lovers stand around
And watch the flickering gleam,
When the soul is far withdrawn
From the communings of earth,
No more to be recalled
From the brink of that beyond,
What vision holds it there,
To what far world withdrawn,
In what far dream absorbed?
None but the dreamers know,
Only the dreamers know.

COMPANIONSHIP.

MEN laughed in ancient Egypt long ago,
And laughed beside the Lake of Galilee;
And my glad heart rejoices more to know,
When it leaps up in exultation too,
That, though the laughter and the laugh be new,
The joy is old as is the ancient sea.

Men wept in noble Athens, so they say,
And in great Babylon of many towers,
For the same sorrows that we feel to-day;
So, stranded high upon Time's latest peak,
I can with Babylonian and with Greek
Claim kinship through this common grief of ours.

The same fair moon I look upon to-night,
This shining, golden moon above the sea,
Imparts a richer and more sweet delight
For all the eyes it did rejoice of old,
For all the hearts, long centuries grown cold,
That shared this joy which now it gives to me.

Whate'er I feel I cannot feel alone;
When I am happiest or most forlorn,
Uncounted friends whom I have never known
Rejoicing stand or weeping at my side—
These nameless, faceless friends of mine who died
A thousand years or more ere I was born.

THE CONTROL OF THE UPPER THAMES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is, of course, a unique possession; perhaps the most precious of our national properties—our oldest and most beautiful highway. The very names on its banks have a peculiar beauty: Lechlade and Bablockhithe, Pangbourne and Streatley, Mapledurham, Sonning, Boveney, Romney, and the rest; they speak to us at once of sunshine and holiday. If a foreigner asks us where to find the best English scenery, we tell him to go and see the Thames. For hundreds of thousands who live in its valley, it is the great common bond of interest. They are not so much inhabitants of this or that country, as dwellers on the banks of the Thames. After being for centuries one of the greatest of our highways, it has now become for all of us, and most of all for the inhabitants of London, the best place of recreation that we have.

And yet, so incurable is our carelessness where public rights and public properties are concerned, that some of the most elementary means of preserving it are wanting. Not only is the Thames Conservancy, which now controls it, an entirely unrepresentative body, with no direct responsibility to those who use the river, but so ill-defined are its powers and its duties that it is in many cases unable to protect the most important interests of the public. Even where it has the necessary powers, it has usually the best excuse for not putting them in force. The duty of preserving the property which they control as a place of public recreation—a duty which in the case of the smallest common under any scheme of regulation is always imposed upon the Conservators—has never been imposed upon the Conservators of the Thames. If they keep open the river as a place of navigation, if they maintain the flow and purity of the water, they are doing practically all that the law requires of them. For the right of landing, for the privilege of walking on the towpath, for the preservation of the ordinary beauties of the river, the public must look after themselves as they can. The Conservancy will not or cannot help them. Even the duty of carrying out measures of flood relief—though in this it must be admitted that the Conservators do their best, with whatever ill success—is not expressly laid upon them.

The result is exactly what might have been expected, and is familiar to all who know the Thames. As the use of the river for commerce has decayed, as private houses and gardens have sprung up along its banks, the rights of the general public have been gradually but steadily restricted. The right of walking along the towpath, even in the neighbourhood of old towns where there is almost certainly a public right of way in addition to the right of towing, is continually disputed. Public landing places have not been kept up or have been allowed to pass into private hands. In more than one case an ancient riverside village, for which the Thames must have been originally the only means of approach, has in recent years been shut out from all public access to the river. Old crossings have been closed, so that travellers between two villages on opposite sides of the river are compelled to walk many miles round to get across it. In every case the Conservancy, when appealed to, have declared themselves unable to intervene. The duty of preserving the beauties of its scenery, though at present this is no public right, has been almost equally neglected. Ugly bridges across it, and offensive buildings on its banks, even advertisements of pills and powders, are erected without protest. In many cases the Conservators themselves have not been altogether beyond criticism in the buildings they have put up. When their powers have been insufficient to check these abuses they have made no attempt to extend them.

The Thames Conservancy, in fact, as an authority for the river is long ago out of date. The great change that has been taking place in the last fifty years in the use of the river has been accompanied by no corresponding change in the character of the body which controls it. During those years the importance of the river as a commercial highway has largely disappeared. Its popularity as a place of residence and recreation has enormously developed. But the Thames Conservancy are still primarily a navigation board, bearing more resemblance to some extinct highway board than to any modern authority. So far as they can be said to have any policy as to the most important problems connected with the river, it has been strictly one of laissez faire. In the conflict that has inevitably occurred between increasing private enclosures along the banks and the ever-growing pleasure traffic, the Conservancy have stood by and taken no part; but it has not been the public that have triumphed.

Under the Port of London Bill a change is to be made. The Lower Thames, consisting of the part below Teddington Lock, will be placed under a new authority, and the old Conservancy, with something of a new constitution, will deal only with the upper river. Unfortunately, the proposed changes, which affect only the authorities who nominate the board, are, for the most part, quite unimportant, and it is possible that, when reconstituted, the Conservancy will be in some respects—particularly in the loss of the London members—even less representative than it is now. Certainly it is by no mere manipulation of the authorities who nominate it that any real reform is to be effected. If the Thames and its banks are to be preserved as a really national possession, the whole character of the Conservancy must be altered. Its duties to the public must be clearly laid down; its powers, where necessary, must be extended. Above all, in the case of a body like this, from which there can be no direct responsibility to those whose rights it should preserve, some power of appeal must be given. The Thames Conservancy must be made directly responsible to a central department of the State. To believe, as we have lately been asked to believe, that the new Conservators, when nominated, will themselves apply for these extra powers, and, presumably, for these greater duties and responsibilities, is merely to evade the question. It is for the Government, who create the new authority, to state also its terms of reference, so that the interests of the public in this great property may in future be adequately protected.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP MORRELL.

Letters to the Editor.

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As several correspondents refer directly to "the writer of the article" on the above subject, will you allow him to reply in the first person singular, and to assume the sole responsibility for what he has to say at present on this subject? The article has had two critics. Lord Russell's letter needs no further reply. Critics of the motor can hope nothing better than that he, and others like him, will write long, and write often, and write everywhere, and so display the naked soul of the motorist for what it really is. Mr. Peter Macdonald is a very different opponent. He is courteous. He does not state absurdities. He does not deny obvious facts. But he does seem to share the fundamental point of view of the motorist, that no one knows or has a right to say anything about motoring except the man inside the motor. I am reminded in this matter of old schoolboy debates on the ethics of fox-hunting, when the defenders of the sport always assured us that the fox enjoyed it. Had the fox been present, and gifted like Balaam's ass, they would have gone on, I suppose, to assure him that he knew nothing about the matter. He had never been on horseback, had never cleared a five-barred gate, had never been in at the death—and never would be, at least under conditions which would enable him to utilise his experiences. Therefore, what business had the fox to say that hunting is not a glorious sport? Now, sir, in this case, I, along with many millions of my countrymen, am in the position of the fox. I am hunted daily. I dodge miserably across streets. I avoid either walking or cycling along the roads of my own neighbourhood as much as I can. I find my favorite forms of exercise rendered disagreeable and often dangerous. In a word, for me the externals of life have been completely changed in a few years—so changed as largely to cut me off from all exercise and the enjoyment of natural beauty. This is what the question of motoring means to me. And I am told I know nothing about it I compare notes with my friends and I find it means much the same to them. But they also know nothing about it. They are not the hunters but the hunted. To less fortunate people than myself it means much more. These less fortunate ones have no garden for their children to play in. They have to send their children on foot to school, and sometimes across streets to the shops. A little girl in my neighbourhood was killed in this way the other day. Lord Russell was not there to "save" her. But neither these less fortunate people nor their children know anything about it. They are the hunted. It is to be feared that they do not appreciate the heroic efforts of motorists to "save their lives." It is quite possible that they would differ from Mr. Macdonald as to the perfect safety of his dash down the street at twenty miles an hour. It is doubtless quite safe—for him. But on the question of the restraint that ought to be exercised on these children Mr. Macdonald may remember that the law itself compels them to go to school. Few can go to school without crossing streets, and children will not habitually cross streets with the sedate caution of a grown-up person. I fear, therefore, that Mr. Macdonald's playgrounds, even when we get them, will not avail to stop the complaints of parents who, urged by a deeply rooted, though, doubtless, irrational and unprogressive, instinct, will continue to agitate for their children's safety.

As to speed, the hunted can sometimes judge. I have, in my day, been in a motor car myself, and, as it happens, was twice asked to guess the speed. Having had some practice in such matters I guessed once within half-a-mile an hour, and the other time exactly right. I am perfectly aware that a speed which would be dangerous in a butcher's cart would not, according to the orthodox contention of motorists, be dangerous for them. I have nowhere alleged the contrary. I said that the furiously driving butcher's boy was despised as a hooligan and checked by the police, and I say that the furiously driving motorist should be treated in the same way. When a motorist tells us that he is a very considerate person I am interested, but I feel that I should like to have a more impartial testimonial. When he tells me that his high speeds are quite safe I bethink me of the reports and inquests I have read in which the car was not going above seven miles an hour (I think seven is the favôrite number), and yet because the "child ran out" from somewhere, or the woman "hesitated," or one of those accidents occurred which every user of the streets ought to allow for, it could not be stopped in time. I ask myself, if the car is really so easily controlled, why these accidents at low speed? Am I to think that there are motorists—men engaged in turning the wheel of progress, men of millions and mechanical genius—men not of the pitiful hunted class, but glorious hunters themselves—who are capable of arithmetical inexactitude?

I so far agree with Mr. Macdonald as to think all speed limits unsatisfactory. We want to go back to the old principle of the common danger as judged by common sense. But I do not think this practicable at present, because the police and the courts have, in the main, become accustomed to treat the twenty-mile speed limit as the one thing to be considered. I am glad that my remarks about the police amuse Mr. Macdonald. It is always pleasant to think one has brought a smile to the lips. But what I said is founded on my own repeated observation of cars tearing round corners and through the most crowded thoroughfare of my own town to the manifest annoyance and danger of numbers of people, while the police look on quite unconcerned. The fining of motorists is neither here nor there. All the risks of their sport can be insured against, and the silly police-trap business—utterly useless for the protection of the roads—is no serious inconvenience to the wealthy "hunters." In fact, we have in motoring as in the game laws an instance of the way in which in England a special class law or class custom arises around the amusements of the mighty. Let Mr. Macdonald try to imagine motoring as a cheap form of amusement followed only by the poor, and ask himself whether law and society would have tolerated it for six months. The fining practice has been a heaven-sent invention. It gives all the appearance of severe judicial condemnation of dangerous driving, while in reality it hurts nobody, is good business for the insurance companies, and secures the motorist absolute freedom—which he uses in the way that Lord Russell has kindly explained—on all but a few selected main roads.

As to dust—the motorist admits that objection. It is the only one which affects him personally. His remedy is characteristic. It is that the roads should be altered.—

July 8th, 1908. THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Any attempt perhaps to join in a discussion raised lately in your paper on "The Lost Liberty of the Road," may simply lead one no further than he started. It seems to me that, until the modern craze for rapid motion is satisfied and over, nothing can be done. The arguments in favor of the motor are irrefutable and legion. How else can a certain member of the country find it possible to reach his country residence when the distances from the station are considered? is one very favorite retort to the anti-motorist's cry, and one which, with many others, leaves me at a loss how to reply. If my neighbour feels no sense of the road's liberty violated, it is merely that he has joined the ranks of the motorist who has become so blinded by his desire to satisfy an instinct for rush that he sees nothing in its true light, and is abnormal in his perceptions. To us of the older school there is a great sadness in the reflection on all that this tendency implies—a tendency evidently so much the result of the present-day craving for movement and excitement that it has probably caused, in the case of a large majority, no stir of surprise; being one of the results they have expected and waited to see realised, a natural evolving from all that has gone before—the machine-made man. To him what matters the polluting of the green lanes and hedgerows, the stifling of the bird's song? What matters if he mar all the good old ways of the simple cottager folk—driving him to a sullen despair, or to the towns that have bred his noisy monster? To him all these things are nothing! He is the creature of the age, seeking to crush all that yet lives of the poet of the age. He would repudiate all responsibility for the ravage he is committing in the places we love so well. The great temptation has come, and he has yielded to it without a glance forward, and the rest suffer and are silent.—Yours, &c., A COUNTRY DWELLER.

July 9th, 1908

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is quite clear from the correspondence in your columns and elsewhere that there is in the country an immense volume of indignation against the cruel tyranny of the motorists; but this feeling will effect nothing without organisation and method.

Presuming that Parliament, as at present constituted, will do nothing to curtail the pleasures of the rich motorist, there are two or three ways in which, it seems to me, the people may abolish the motor tyranny.

1. The stereotyped and indiscriminating verdict of "accidental death" should, in many cases, be superseded by a verdict of "wilful murder," and juries have ample justification for such a course.

2. The ludicrous fines of a few pounds should be replaced by imprisonment of the occupiers of a car which has travelled at a dangerous pace; and, if possible, the car should be confiscated.

3. Some such body as the Highways Protection League should organise public meetings in the larger towns to point out to the people the necessity for putting pressure on their Parliamentary representatives to enact stringent and deterrent penalties against the motorist.

In the smaller towns and villages these meetings cannot be held. When I resided in the neighbourhood of Egham, I endeavoured to have such public meetings called; but in all the shops whose owners I visited I received the same answer: "We are with you heart and soul against the motorists, but we dare not attend such meetings for fear of losing custom." To such a state of slavery have the people been reduced by the rich!

4. The nature of the Automobile Association, and its impudent obstruction of the police, should be enquired into.

If such an Association as this, with its shameless pretence of helping the police, existed among Irish tenants, its members would be at once arrested and imprisoned. Some motoring acquaintances of mine told me recently that they went from Richmond to Hindhead at an average rate of about fifty miles an hour. "But how about the police?" said I. "Oh, we always knew where they were; the scouts met us, standing with one hand at the salute, while with the thumb of the other they indicated the position of the police trap. We then slowed down at once to fifteen miles an hour." It is marvellous that such a thwarting of the law as this is permitted.

I endorse the suggestion made in THE NATION by Mr. H. E. Gribble that you should use your influence to start an Association for removing from the people the intolerable annoyance and injury inflicted upon them by "the tyrants of the road." Perhaps some strengthening of the existing "Highways Protection League" would be effective.

The wide distribution of leaflets among the people would help towards some united and organised action.—Yours, &c.,

Oxford, July 6th, 1908. G. M. M.

P.S.—The necessity for prompt and combined action is shown by the danger that the people will soon be deprived of the use of the sea shore as well as that of the roads and lanes.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I hope your correspondence columns, for another week or two, may be open to opinions pro et con touching this interesting and most important question. Many of your readers, I think, will thoroughly endorse the views so forcibly expressed by the writer of the article, and they will agree with you that it gives unmistakable evidence of knowledge rather than ignorance of the subject, but whether or no I most respectfully protest that this is a matter of common sense—common alike to the expert motorist and the man in the street, by-way, or lane. Are we not all painfully qualified to think, write, and speak from daily personal experience, and is it not quite too late and too absurd that Lord Russell and other promoters of the industry or pastime should think that they, and they alone, know all about it? The "butcher's furious drive" hits off the situation aptly and admirably, and the comparison appears to have generated a little fury in the motor mind. Surely everybody knows quite well that, as regards towns and villages and their approaches, time limits are ridiculous, conditions constantly arise under which even a seven to ten mile speed may be positively dangerous, and in my opinion one of your correspondents rightly maintains that the pace difficulty can only be met by enforcing the law against driving judged to be dangerous according to particular circumstances—this is the case as we know with the furious butcher boy, but will anyone assert that it is so with the motor man?

Like many other pedestrians and cyclists, I have had some unpleasant nerve-destroying experiences. On one occasion, stepping from a tram, so nearly was I run over by a motor car passing on the left and wrong side, that in gratitude to a merciful Providence I was constrained, without any cant or mock piety, to make a thank-offering at the church at which I had alighted. On another occasion, a monster motor, endeavouring to pass my jarvey, was responsible, in my opinion, for the destruction of a bicycle which the rider (happily himself uninjured) had steered too nicely between us. In this matter of passing, as we all know, drivers of horse-driven vehicles exhibit some patience towards one another, judging quite readily when and how to wait, but Gallio, the motor man, too often cares for none of these things, and his car, smelling and grunting, impatiently "hoots" us all out of the way. If no better law is forthcoming from our 670 legislators, it is devoutly to be hoped that the law of mutual consideration will soon begin its beneficent operation in our country roads, lanes, by-ways, and elsewhere.—

THE ANGLICAN CHURCH AND MARRIAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is unfortunate that Mr. Russell should have been so grievously misreported by the "Times." According to the "Times'" report, Mr. Russell grouped together all the three transgressions in question for the same anathema.

Mr. Russell, it may be observed, denounced certain ecclesiastics for not treating the re-marriage of divorced persons as "legalised concubinage," and, by a parity of reasoning, would no doubt wish clergymen to refuse to communicate a man who had married his deceased wife's sister.

If such reasoning as his wins the day, the question immediately arises why we should any longer subsidise a Church which denounces law-abiding and respectable citizens, in the one case as "notorious evil livers," and in the other as "concubines."

An instance has just come to my knowledge of two members of the Church of England electing to be married in a registrar's office instead of in a church, in consequence of Mr. Russell's language.

The answer Mr. Russell applies to all my conundrums, "as he terms them," is that his speech was limited by rule to fifteen minutes. Was also an analogous restriction placed upon his letter to THE NATION?—Yours, &c.,

IS THE DRAMA DYING?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Week by week in your pages and in those of the best of your contemporaries we read bitter wailings over the decay of the drama. We are told, and truly, either that there is no drama, or no dramatist, or no drama lovers in England; or that we have only the imaginations of tradesmen. And the cures we are told of are many, but all equally useless. Our Stage Society is an abortive birth. Our Church and Stage Guild makes us all smile behind our hands. And now H. W. M. writes with confidence that "we must look to the coming National Theatre." But let us look at the matter fairly and tell ourselves the truth, that the day of the drama is, for us, gone by, and will not be stimulated into unnatural life by any of these means, and not even the all powerful State can breathe life into the dead.

The drama belongs to the childhood of man, when he is for ever saying "Let us pretend." And when that is the natural and spontaneous expression of the human mind, it has produced the loveliest art. But when we cannot do this of ourselves any longer or without the help of State, or Society, or Guild, for heaven's sake let us drop it and glory in our past. And it is not as if we had no refuge in which fancy can either rest or disport herself. Our modern novel is barely a hundred years old. And who that genuinely hungers for a refuge from the actual in the world of imagination, would not sooner curl himself in his armchair (itself barely a hundred years old) and clothe his own David Balfour in the rags of his own fancy, or walk with Clara Middleton, or listen to his own Esmond, rather than have his fancy world desecrated by the vulgar, strained voices of actress or actor, while being forced to sit in a plush theatre in the company of unloved pleasure-seekers. And this happy story-book land is within reach of the tiredest and poorest, and, therefore, the proper and lovely retreat for a world of workers. And it does not necessitate a vast army of actors, actresses, stage managers, stage critics, all having a vested interest in forcing us to see what we are better without seeing, and they would be better not doing.

Let us shed the natural tear if we will over the dead drama, then let it lie and betake ourselves to the beautiful art which is our expression of our lives on this planet.—

"OVER-DELICACY OF SPEECH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Surely I shall not be alone in thinking that the article on the decay of homely speech amusingly illustrates its own theme. It may be the fault of my upbringing, but in the phrase of the crow crying "against the rain," I should certainly have taken "against" to mean, not "in opposition to," but "before." So, among Shropshire rustics and Irish people of all degrees, one constantly hears of a house being made ready "against" a person's arrival, or of work being finished "against" a certain time. And may I not invoke Virgil?

"Tum cornix plenâ pluviam vocat improba voce."

THE PREVENTION OF CRIME BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As the writer of the article in "The Humanitarian" quoted in your issue of July 4th, may I thank you for the publicity which you have given to the views of those who regard Mr. Gladstone's Prevention of Crime Bill as a most dangerous measure? Humanitarians have long been misrepresented by Sir Robert Anderson and his friends as opposed to any lengthened imprisonment of habitual offenders through mere compassion for the criminal. As a matter of fact, we have always admitted that there is much to be said for the principle of the indeterminate sentence, if it could be applied under a rational prison system; but this is just what the Bill fails to provide for. It is true that Mr. Gladstone's speech contained promises of an improved treatment, but there is no definite provision for this in the Bill; so that while the actual effect of this Bill becoming law would be to place the liberty of all habitual offenders at the mercy of the present officials, working with the present rules, the "less rigorous" treatment, which is supposed to be an essential condition of the lengthened sentence, might remain in the region of promise.

Surely Liberal members who support the measure should insist on the ameliorative part, no less than the penal part, of Mr. Gladstone's scheme being inserted in the text of the Bill and carried into effect simultaneously.—Yours, &c.,

WHAT DOES "VOTES FOR WOMEN" MEAN?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The above question appears to me pertinent at the present moment, when most Liberal journalists in London are urging Mr. Asquith to commit this particularly superogatory form of political suicide. Of course, if those who provide leading articles for the Liberal public are honestly convinced that such causes as peace, financial reform, land reform, licensing reform, the amendment of the Poor-law and of the House of Lords are comparatively valueless, and that a new sensation is needed for the amusement of the public, I suppose we must bear with it patiently in the hope that before the General Election something more extravagant but less dangerous will turn up. Meanwhile, will you allow me to point out the following reasons why the present Prime Minister and his Cabinet are not likely to adopt Woman Suffrage:—

1. No Cabinet Minister referred to it in his election address, and Mr. Asquith specifically declared himself against it.

2. The electors have never had the slightest opportunity of expressing their views on the matter, but there is every reason to think that not five per cent. of them (probably not one per cent.) favor this revolution.

3. A large majority of women are admittedly indifferent or hostile.

4. If a Bill is brought in, the House of Lords will certainly either throw it out, or so amend it as to ensure that it will operate against the Liberal Party.

5. In the former and more probable case, most Liberals will thank heaven that there is a House of Lords.

I therefore submit that it would be a constitutional crime of the first magnitude, and a political blunder unworthy of any Liberal statesman to have anything to do with Woman Suffrage in this Parliament. To touch the thing at present is to court a huge disaster at the polls.—Yours, &c., MANCHESTER SCHOOL.

National Liberal Club,
July 2nd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have just laid down your correspondence upon "Votes for Women," and as I read it seemed to me that we were getting very far from the "Age of Reason," whirling back somewhere into savagery.

"Radical Ex-Soldier's" challenge gauntlet, "The Bedrock of Force," rings in my ears. If by "Force" he means "brute force," I would remind him that savage nations are dominated, not by brute force, but by the intellectual and moral forces of civilised peoples; even India, with its ancient civilisation, we hold not by force of arms, but by moral power.

"Radical Ex-Soldier" seems to overlook the fact that a nation is composed not of men alone, but of corporate men and women. A nation of "males" is as much a physical impossibility as is the positive pole of an electric battery without its corresponding negative pole; the working of the battery means the existence of both.

"Radical Ex-Soldier," I assume this from the title which he takes, believes that the best possible government is a completely representative one, and yet he would deny representation to one-half of the nation.

The possession of a vote does not imply either administrative or legislative function; it merely means the power to make your own voice heard in the National Concert, the "Body Corporate" of social life. In a healthy human body every part of that body is in communication with the brain centre, and thus harmonious working of the whole is secured. In our present system one-half of the social body has no such communication; its wants are, therefore, dimly and imperfectly felt. Just as the claims of labor have a better chance of receiving due consideration now that labor has its own Parliamentary delegates, so will all questions affecting women and children have a better chance of securing proper public attention when we, too, have our representatives, be those representatives men or women. Even Mr. Asquith has admitted that he considers that delegations from women would be best represented by women. We therefore demand the vote on the same grounds and on the same terms that it is granted to men.

Men and women are mutually advantageous. If men try to save women in the event of shipwreck, women try to save men by nursing them in sickness. All this sentimental talk about chivalry is folly—"action and reaction are equal and opposite."

Then, as to the question of military responsibility. The responsible soldier has no vote, to be a soldier is an electoral disqualification. Moreover, it is the women who bear the soldiers, and, in so doing, there is an annual mortality of 5,000 women. Let "Radical Ex-Soldier" weigh that mortality against his own claims to national responsibility.

We have not yet arrived at universal adult Suffrage, so that question need not, at present, be discussed; but I will say en passant that to deny the vote to any section of the community because it happens to be in the majority is truly a reductio ad absurdum of all Liberal or Radical principles.

The bogie of "Petticoat Government" is flaunted before the public as though it were an inevitable sequence to "Votes for Women." Women are as diverse in their opinions as men, and will, therefore, fall into party groups, just as men have so fallen; the experiences of Australia and New Zealand have shown little or no disturbance of the balance of party power by the enfranchisement of women.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I hope that you will find space for one more suggestion on the subject of Votes for Women?

Can we not, before plunging into adult suffrage, take our stand for a time on the old idea that the family or household, rather than the individual, is the unit in the State? This is, or ought to be, the real meaning of our householder qualification. Can we not, at the same time, admit both sexes to citizenship?

Let us aim, for the present, at having neither "one man, one vote," nor "one adult, one vote," but "one household, one vote." Let this vote be used either by a man or by a woman, but not by both for one household. Widows would have this vote; so would deserted wives and women whose husbands became incapacitated physically or mentally. Married couples, or a father and daughter, or a brother and sister, living together would themselves decide which of the two should be registered as the voter. In most cases it would be the man; but not necessarily in all cases. The reasons for the decision would be no concern of the State; but under special circumstances the State might interfere; e.g., if any man neglected to provide for his wife and children the right of registration might be taken from him and given to the woman. This would work in with the reforms suggested by your correspondent "R. N."

Single women who occupy the position of responsible householders would have the vote. Sisters, friends, &c., living together would be in the same position as a married couple.

Persons who found it impossible to settle this question as they settled other questions of their joint life could resort to the plan of periodically changing the name on the register, just as the political parties take turns in governing the country.

The proposal to give every married woman a vote on her husband's qualification is somewhat suggestive of plural voting. Marriage may be a means of developing individuality; but that is not the reason why it is upheld by the State.

Any form of lodger franchise would have to be very carefully considered.

Without attempting to work out this idea in detail, or to answer the objections that will be made to it, I would point out:—

That it is a form of compromise.

That it satisfies the main Suffragist claim by allowing women to vote. This I take to be the meaning of the demand for votes "on the same terms as men."

That it would not suddenly create a large body of women voters.

That careful observation of the results of a limited measure, such as this, would be advisable, before such a measure as adult suffrage is forced upon the country.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Allow me to thank "R. N." for her very able and well reasoned letter.

Is not the first benefit to be looked for from any extension of the suffrage, the education and mental improvement of the new voters, their being made more reasonable, more widely thoughtful, and less hysterically clamorous?

Has anyone ever suggested that the municipal vote has done a particle of harm either to women or to municipalities?

There are two things in "R. N.'s" letter that I do not understand.

1. What is the insulting form of State maintenance now offered to women in return for their honorable work?

2. What is the Limited Bill?

I do not agree with "H.," who writes from Lucerne, that the House of Commons is discredited. On the contrary, I agree with Lord Morley of Blackburn that this is the best House of Commons ever assembled.

What does "H." mean by strong and virile services that will cease to be respected? Is it the army? A male Army is needed for defence, to back up the police, and to hold India, but it gets rather too much than too little respect, especially from women.

Mr. F. Bowly's letter makes me feel shame for my sex. Does he suppose that all women of property will vote Tory? If so, on what evidence? As for women as allies of various supposed enemies of the people, are they not now hired by both parties as canvassers? And why not? Wiser men than Mr. Bowly opine that this question must be the principal issue at a General Election. If so, that election will be held at a very quiet time. As for offence given by certain regrettable extravagances, even breaking two panes of glass is not comparable to the burning of Nottingham Castle on the eve of the Reform Bill. If our opinions were to be changed every time anyone on our side used a bad argument, or committed a foolish act, party government would be impossible.

It is to the last part of Mr. Bowly's letter that I most object. I am not a Chaucer scholar; but till I know better I interpret the second line of his quotation from the "Wyf of Bathe's" tale:—

"As wel over hir husbond as over hir love," to mean that this woman had a love or a lover other than her husband. If so, I submit she is a tainted witness. Anyway, as Ruskin says, a wife mainly rules in her husband's heart, but not in his business, political or other. Nor do I know whence Mr. Bowly takes his other quotation, "the monstrous regiment of women." I am sure he will not apply it to the regiment of Queen Victoria. "A knot of women," "a handful of women," these expressions all must see would damage any cause, even if it were a good one.

One thing I take to be certain; the suffrage will not be given to women by this Parliament, so there will be ample time for his unworthy resentment to die down.—Yours, &c.,

T. Wilson.

ASSOCIATION OF SUBSCRIBERS TO CHARITIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The establishment of this Association at the Mansion House, on Friday, the 26th ult., has created so much public interest that the Committee appointed to take the necessary initial steps for its formation are desirous to make known through your columns the methods by which they think the work of the Association should be carried on.

The City Council for Organisation of Charity has now been in operation for six years, and, although their actions have been upon a comparatively small scale, they have satisfied themselves that there is a large field open, as was stated at the Mansion House meeting. At the same time it must be obvious that until the Association is fairly started no one is in a position to state the exact line of action which it may see fit to adopt.

The aims of the Association, as defined by Lord Rothschild and others at the Mansion House, are the promotion of co-operation; uniform principles of administration, and the systematic interchange of information between the charities of the Metropolis.

A council has been appointed of influential subscribers to London charities to conduct the business of the Association. It is suggested that the council shall nominate committees, each of which will devote its attention to the administration and work of a group of charities to which members of the Association subscribe. These committees will be largely composed of subscribers to the charities with which they are to deal. In this way the personal co-operation of the administrators of charities will be secured for the furtherance of the objects of the Association, in conjunction with the subscribers to their institutions who desire to take active part in such work.

All supporters of charities who are desirous of bringing about unity of action in charitable work for the prevention of overlapping and the waste of resources, promotion of efficiency, and economy in administration by co-operative work among institutions with kindred objects, are invited to join the new Association.

The minimum subscription proposed for membership is £1 1s. Communications may be sent to us at the office of the Association of Subscribers to Charities, Clark's Place, Bishopsgate Within, or to Mr. A. R Prideaux, Honorary Treasurer pro tem. Subscriptions may also be sent to Messrs. Robarts, Lubbock & Co., 15, Lombard Street.—Yours, &c.,

Avebury, Chairman,
Lichfield, Vice-Chairman.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

QUITE a number of novels by writers of some distinction are announced for the early autumn. One of the most promising is Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "Halfway House," at present running as a serial in the "Times." The book marks a new departure in Mr. Hewlett's art, since it is the first novel in which he describes the English social life of our own day. He calls it "a comedy of degree," the heroine being a nursery governess who marries a man of higher social rank, much older than herself. Two other men persist in their attentions after her marriage, and these, as well as the husband, are brought into collision in a way which calls forth Mr. Hewlett's powers of style and coloring, together with some qualities of analysis which have not hitherto been his strength.

THEN there is Miss Beatrice Harraden's "Interplay," a study of the influence exerted by a powerful on a weak personality. Miss Mary Johnston's new book, "Lewis Rand," is said to deal with American political life in a sufficiently direct manner. The scene of Mr. Booth Torkington's "The Guest of Quesnay" is laid in a little Norman village, and the story is concerned with the doings of a group of Americans who have settled in France. Mrs. Katherine Thurston has also chosen France as the scene of her next novel. She has been over to Paris in search of "color," and most of the book was written during her visit. In "Mrs. Allenby's Suspicions," Maxwell Gray tells the story of the pretty, frivolous wife of a London journalist who, discontented with the prose of her life, sets out for an adventure among the towns of the Mediterranean. Mr. Jerome K. Jerome has finished a humorous novel called "The Passing of the Third Floor Back." Miss Elizabeth Robins's "The Mills of the Gods" is now appearing in "The Fortnightly Review," and Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett has finished a book for young readers, to be called "The Good Wolf." We may also expect novels during the season from Mr. Robert Chambers, Miss Rosa Nouchette Carey, Miss Myrtle Reed, Mr. Shan Bullock, Mr. J. E. Patterson, and—it goes without saying—Miss Marie Corelli.

WHEN "La Maison du Péché" made its appearance a few years ago the critics were unanimous in predicting great things for its author. Succeeding novels did not quite fulfil the promise of that work, but we learn that Marcelle Tinayre has almost finished a new book which is believed by some of her friends to be better than anything she has done before. The title is "L'Ombre de l'Amour," and the theme bears a close resemblance to that of "La Maison du Péché." In both books the conflict is between love, or "the shadow of love," on the one hand, and religion and family obligations on the other. The scene is the department of Corrèze, Madame Tinayre's native district, which she is fond of describing in her novels

MISS CONSTANCE HILL, to whom we already owe a couple of entertaining books upon Jane Austen and Fanny Burney —both of them charmingly illustrated by her sister, Miss Ellen G. Hill—has almost completed another volume on similar lines, the subject this time being Maria Edgeworth. Miss Hill has managed to unearth a good deal of fresh material, particularly about Maria Edgeworth's great visit to Paris in 1802, when, owing to a rumour that Richard Lovell Edgeworth was the brother of the Abbé Edgeworth, the whole party only escaped arrest through a friendly warning. It was during this visit that Count Edelcrantz, "a Swedish gentleman of superior understanding and mild manners," offered Miss Edgeworth "his Hand and Heart" to no purpose. Although the visit was so abruptly ended, Miss Edgeworth greatly enjoyed meeting the Parisian celebrities of the day, nearly all of whom sought her acquaintance. Foremost in her estimation was the Abbé Morellet. "Oh, my dear Aunt Mary," she wrote, "how you would love that man!" though she is careful to add, "And we need not be afraid of loving him, for he is near eighty!" In her account of some other incidents of the visit, Miss Edgeworth turns to good use what she calls elsewhere "that gift of sportive, but cutting, médisance," a quality that seasons her letters as well as her novels with many a touch of shrewd and engaging humour.

GERMAN scholars have of late years given us several learned and powerful biographical studies of British statesmen. One of the most recent was Dr. von Ruville's "Life of Pitt," an English translation of which appeared last year. Another work that promises to be of great value is Dr. K. Stechlin's "Sir Francis Walsingham und seine Zeit." The first volume, dealing with Walsingham's career in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and the first twelve years of Elizabeth, will be issued immediately. The second, which will be devoted to his embassy in France at the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, may be expected next year. The book is published by Winter of Heidelberg.

THE "Memoirs of Mademoiselle George" is the book of the hour in Paris, and we may expect an early translation of it here, as Mr. Eveleigh Nash has secured the English rights. The famous actress began to write her reminiscences in 1857, but did not carry the narrative farther down than 1808. She intended her manuscript to be simply a collection of notes, which would be presented in literary form by Madame Desbordes Valmore. The plan, however, miscarried, and the manuscript was bought by M. P. A. Cheramy at an auction at the Hotel Drouot in 1903. The chief interest of the book lies in the glimpses they give of Napoleon, whose mistress Mademoiselle George was during the Consulate Other historical personages are also mentioned, and the book on the whole gives a most interesting account of certain phases of life, political, social, and literary, during the opening years of the last century.

THE "Memoirs and Impressions" of Madame Helena Modjeska, a work upon which the famous actress has been engaged for several years, is announced for publication in the autumn. It runs to two bulky volumes, the first dealing with Madame Modjeska's life in Poland, where she was intimately associated with Sienkiewicz, the de Reszkes, Paderewski, and other celebrities. The second tells of her life in America, to which she first went as the leader of a colony of Poles, who hoped to establish a communistic settlement in California. Madame Modjeska made her first appearance in English at San Francisco in 1877, when she played Adrienne Lecouvreur, perhaps the most brilliant and affecting of all her representations. She has since appeared in nearly every European capital, though by an Imperial decree she is now forbidden to enter Russian territory.

MR. STANLEY PAUL, who has been for many years connected with Messrs. Hutchinson & Co., has decided to start publishing on his own account. He has taken premises at Clifford's Inn, and hopes to issue his first list of books at an early date.

ANATOLE FRANCE.*

"The time has come," it seems, for a translation into English of the collective works of Anatole France. "It has long been a reproach to England" that such a time has been so long delayed. Those who, by previous study or training, are most likely to be attracted to this gospel of irony have already familiarised themselves with France's work. The late-comers who have not mastered France's idiom are not likely to be very enthusiastic purchasers. The publisher who ventures upon a large work of translation is nearly always confronted with this dilemma. Acceptance of the risk means a fairly substantial conviction that there are enough people in England who feel that they owe it to themselves to know something of Anatole France to make a wholesale translation worth while. In any case such a translation marks a very distinct stage in the European fame of an author. A collective edition at all means a considerable speculation in futures; a collective translation in thirty volumes constitutes a ponderable monument of literary faith.

Such a monument is raised to exceedingly few authors in their lifetime. To how many, with the exception of Tolstoy, has such a tribute been accorded since the death of Ibsen, of Renan, and of Taine? The popularity implied is one that for several reasons is not very readily attributable to Anatole France. He is, in the first place, a scholar to the finger-tips, and the scholarly cast of mind is hard to reconcile with that of the popular author of fiction. The cases of Dumas, Hugo, Sand, Dickens, and Zola are among the first that occur to the mind to prove how negligible an element is scholarship among the qualities that combine to attract a world-wide fame. Merimée and Flaubert may be regarded as partial exceptions. Fielding, Smollett, and Scott may all be regarded, perhaps, as scholars, and scholars in a very real sense, but hardly in the more precise, classical, and cosmopolitan sense in which Anatole France is a scholar.

Then, in the second place, the author of the "Histoire Contemporaine" is a profound ironist, and mankind in the mass will probably find it harder to understand the pity of France than the hate of Swift. Pagan though he is, M. France attaches an importance to the Christian virtue of humility second only to that of Tolstoy himself. Self-respect according to him is the root of evil. If men only despised themselves and each other sincerely, how much better the world would be! Of all detestable things the most hateful to him is that which renders men proud and cruel, and which requires them to honor themselves and to honor their neighbours. As if anyone of the race of Adam could be worthy of honor. What apishness, what idolatry is this! Of the tiny and unsuspected group of human beings who are destitute of an importunate sense of their own importance, France stands, as an author, almost alone. Like his own Dechartre he realises to the full his own insignificance; he feels how very little the individual counts for in a world where persons are like corn and chaff united and winnowed by one movement of the fan in the hand of a rustic or of a god. A sensation of surprise, therefore, mingles with the pleasure, tinged already with the gentlest atom of regret, with which we welcome this brave and handsome translation of "The Works of Anatole France." That it is handsomely done cannot be denied. The first shock of France in red cloth having been encountered, it is only fair to describe the decorations, the paper and the print, as being in good taste. The translation, too, is faithfully done. Miss Stephens has already done a buoyantly written expository sketch of the chief French novelists of to-day, among whom M. Anatole France enjoys the pride of place; and to her, we understand, without apprehension, has been entrusted the far more difficult task of rendering the "Vie de Jeanne d'Arc." Apart from "The Red Lily" the only novel by France in the full English meaning of the word, "Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard," has already been translated by Lafcadio Hearn. The work, we have heard, was done in a fortnight, and did not by any means satisfy its fastidious master. Hearn could never have attained to that flawless simplicity which gives the last touch of artistic perfection to the style of Anatole France. His translation, nevertheless, contains memorable and exquisite qualities of its own. It could never have quite satisfied Hearn.

The selection of "The Red Lily" to head the list of volumes is probably an astute one. Alone among France's fictions it contains a love intrigue of more or less orthodox pattern. And it is certainly calculated in other respects to amaze and to shock the ordinary English novel-reader not a little. It has often seemed to us the weakest spot in France's armour, this rather voluptuous roman of the most conventional modern French pattern. And how ludicrously and almost nauseously narrow that convention is apt to become! What a grotesque exaggeration it implies in the general scheme of life of a kind of ritual adultery practicable only in Paris by a very wealthy, privileged class for a comparatively short period of life. To readers conversant with the school of Bourget, Maupassant, Prévost, Hervieu, Formont, and their imitators every trick and every ruse, every limitation and every variation of the complicated etiquette which governs these refined latitudes of sense is as familiar as the ten commandments. The correct flowers, the correct phrases, the correct clothes, the correct localities in which to seek the correct apartments with two entrances, have all been reduced to an exact science. The necessary mottoes, such as "The mouth that is kissed keeps its freshness," and "The beauty of a woman feeds on caresses as a bee on flowers," are a fine art in themselves. But what is M. Anatole France doing in this galley? Dickens submitting to the spells of Wilkie Collins or suffering Lytton to dictate an ending to his finest novel is a spectacle far less pitiful than that of the creator of M. Bergeret sitting at the feet of the author of "Le Scorpion." The book, therefore, though not lacking either in force or individuality, seems to us to lack the infinite delicacy and distinction of "Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard"; it lacks, moreover, the fine scope for meditative soliloquy in which its author's greatest strength lies.

Even if this diagnosis be accepted, however, let us admit at once that "The Red Lily" has a hundred redeeming features. It contains portraits of the subtlest and caricatures of the most mordant type. In his early days M. France had fraternised with all the poets from Heredia, to whom he dedicated one of his best books, to Verlaine, and Choulette is a wonderful caricature of Verlaine combined with what seems to be a playful après-Renan conception of Christ. Choulette gives expression to one of France's favorite theories on the absurdity of drawing distinctions of honor and virtue between vermin so imperceptibly differentiated as "honest" and "dishonest" men. "Prostitutes," he maintains, "are nearer God than honest women; they have lost all vainglory; they have been shorn of pride. They are unadorned by those empty nothings, the matron's boast. They possess humility, that is the corner-stone of the heavenly house of virtue. After a brief repentance they will be first in the Kingdom of Heaven; for committed without malice and without joy, their sins are their own atonement. Their vices in that they are sorrows have the merit of all suffering. Slaves to the brutality of passion, these women have denied themselves pleasure. Thus they resemble men who have become celibate that they may enter the Kingdom of God. Like us, they are sinners, but by their shame they atone for their sins; suffering purifies like fire. Therefore, the first prayer they address to Him God will hear. He has prepared for them a throne on the right hand of the Father. In the Kingdom of God, the queen and the empress will be happy to sit at the feet of the women of the street." Choulette is often an echo of Coignard, and Coignard is often an echo of France himself. There is an element of cruelty in the caricature portraits thinly concealed under the labels of Marmet, Schmoll, and Miss Bell. The inhuman preciosity of the last-mentioned lady, with her close-clipped head and her dilettante heart, is remorselessly observed. The restraint of the scene in which Miss Bell comes to ask "darling" whether it would be right for her to marry, approaches a sublimity of satire. "You are not a child," darling counsels her, "if you love and are loved, do what you think right and don't complicate love by material interests which have nothing to do with feeling. This is the advice of a friend." For a moment Miss Bell failed to understand. Then she blushed and rose. She was shocked. It cannot be denied that there are delightful things in "Le Lys Rouge," even if it be true that the somewhat conventional love plot sullies them. The author's idea of a wicked man is one who is hard on the weak, the humble, and the unfortunate. He cannot be hard even on Louis Napoleon, of whom we have a quaint miniature here. He was a kind man really, but he had no influence whatever. "He appealed to me more than the first, I thought him more human." Quaint, too, is the scene with his mistress in the sculptor's own neglected but picturesque dwelling. "See here are my mother's spectacles," he says, opening a little drawer in a bureau, "how often she used to look for them." The juxtaposition of this homely touch with the scene of passion that follows is one of France's subtleties.

Although "The Red Lily" cannot be described as a characteristic piece of work, it is capable of giving the reader a foretaste of something quite new (yet as old, perhaps, as Lucian) in the way of benevolent scepticism, philosophic nihilism, and impartial disdain of the hardness, ingratitude, injustice, pride, forgetfulness of others, and inveterate self-love of incorrigible man. There is much of the French Rénaissance about France, a quantum of the esprit Gaulois, and a recognisable affinity to Rabelais and to Voltaire. It is not possible to match him in English literature, and not very easy to illustrate him. He is allied, perhaps, with that cloistered, bookish, contemplative class of authors of the dynasty of Wotton, Cowley, Marvell, Gray, Cowper, Lamb, FitzGerald, and Pater. But he is far more self-critical, analytic, contemptuous of intellectual "superiority." With the complex innocence of the scholastic and contemplative mind he delights to contrast the crowded splendour of the rich. To the long trances of study which have destroyed the savant's sense of action he opposes the rapid operation of the man of affairs. With his naïve gallantry and erudite senility he compares with malicious detail and unsparing innuendo the significant graces and intrepid love-making of aristocratic society. Among modern English writers there was early promise of something akin to the same spirit of polite cynicism and scholarly satire in Mr. Lang and Mr. Mallock. The talent for destructive analysis was very clearly marked in all three alike; all three were fine scholars and the precocity of the two Englishmen was much more remarkable than that of their French senior. We hesitate to say that their development has been arrested. But it has certainly diverged in a most signal way from that of the great Academician.

In the handling of inconvenient truth M. Anatole France is as shameless as "darling" herself. Mr. Lang cannot tolerate such frankness. He blushes like Miss Bell. He is shocked. His attack on the master's chef-d'œuvre is a profoundly interesting manifesto of intellectual repugnance to the Frenchman's mental libertinism. The theory that Jeanne d'Arc was fundamentally nothing more or less than a mascotte with which M. Bergeret scandalised the patriots of Turcoing proved irresistible to the ironic spirit of France. Mr. Lang has devoutly defended the heroines of Sir Walter Scott. The whole deep-rooted loyalty of his nature revolted against the innuendo of M. France. Hence his vivacious attack upon the "Jeanne d'Arc" in the "Fortnightly Review." But his attack is double-edged, and it is much to be feared that it will recoil with terrible force upon Mr. Lang himself. He has a good deal of our sympathy. We have analysts and disillusionists among us in alarming numbers. We are in far more need of a few of those simple, enthusiastic illusions which gild the lives and the hopes of millions. But Mr. Lang, with all his brilliant talent, has not even a small fraction of the historical instinct of M. France, and we feel that to make headway against this master of flouts and sneers, this heroic disillusionist, we have need of a far stronger and more creative mind. Against M. France, Mr. Andrew Lang is more powerless even than was Freeman against Froude.

THE GREAT DAYS OF IRELAND.*

Mrs. Green possesses all the qualities which a historian needs. She has the faculty of research, without which history cannot be written, and the faculty of style, without which it will not be read. In "The Making of Ireland and its Undoing"—a book of 494 pages, excellently printed—these qualities, rarely to be met with in a single person, are combined. Mrs. Green enters fresh woods and pastures new. Most of us are more or less familiar with the story of the wars which devastated Ireland from the coming of the Normans to the accession of the Tudors—a fight of three centuries for freedom; but few know anything about the commercial condition of the country or the state of education and learning during that eventful period. It is the story of Irish "trade and industries" and of Irish "education and learning" between the twelfth and sixteenth centuries, which Mrs. Green tells in the volume before us. This book will be a surprise to English readers. John Mitchell once said that England had the ear of the world, and that she used her power and influence to defame the people whom she had ruined. Mrs. Green says much the same thing. Only too often have English writers expanded discreditable incidents of a trivial nature—incidents common in the story of every country—while they have minimised or kept out of sight—it might have been through sheer ignorance—vital facts which lie at the foot of the nation's history and disclose the true character and genius of the people. Mrs. Green writes with trenchant truth:—

> "In no other country in the world has it been supposed the historian's business to seek out every element of political instability, every trace of private disorder, every act of personal violence, every foreign slander, and out of these alone, neglecting all indications of industry or virtue, to depict a national life. Irish annals are still in our own days quoted by historians as telling merely the tale of a corrupted land—feuds and battles, murderings and plunderings, with no town or church or monastery founded, no law enacted, no controversy healed by any judgment of the courts. If the same method had been followed for England, what an appalling story we should have had of that medieval time, of its land-thefts, its woman-lifting, its local wars, the feuds handed on from father to son with their countless murders and atrocities, devastating for generations whole country sides! In Germany or Italy or France the picture of anarchy would appear like hell let loose on earth. In all other histories, however, than that of Ireland a certain convention has been observed. Men, by some high instinct of faith, have agreed, amid all disorders, to lay stress on every evidence of reason, humanity, justice, and to leave out of the record the tale of local barbarities, the violences of the rich, the brutalities of the ignorant and the starving."

Ademar, a monk of Angoulême, writing in the eleventh century, describes Ireland—the name by which the whole island was known in Southern France, at least, as early as 1000 A.D.—as

> "that very wealthy country in which there were twelve cities, with wide bishoprics, and a king, and which had its own language and Latin letters."

The wealth of Ireland and the beauty of the country tempted the cupidity of the Normans. The Norman settlement would probably have done no harm if Normans and Celts had been allowed to fight out their differences among themselves, and to have formed, as they would have formed, a solid and a compact nation. It was the hordes of "new English" which swarmed into the country, after the Norman settlement, and the policy of the Government in London bent on keeping Norman and Celt apart, that interrupted the progress of Irish civilisation. Nevertheless, during the Plantagenet period, Irish trade and commerce flourished. In France, in Spain, in the Low Countries, in Italy, in Germany, Irish merchants were known, and Irish merchandise was prized. At home there were growing and prosperous towns, rich and enterprising citizens. Galway to-day is a city of decay. In the past it was the home of merchant princes. Prosperous Ireland existed outside the range of English influence. Within it were disorder and anarchy, wars and desolation. Englishmen fled from the Pale to seek the shelter of Shane O'Neil, one of the strongest of Irish chiefs.

> "'Within this year and a half,' wrote Shane O'Neil to Elizabeth, 'three hundred farmers are come from the English Pale to live in my country, where they can be safe.'"

* "The Making of Ireland and Its Undoing." 1200-1600. By Alice Stopford Green. Macmillan. 10s net.

He added:—

"'Please, your Majesty, to send over two Commissioners that you can trust that will take no bribes nor otherwise be imposed upon, to observe what I have done to improve the country. . . . Then let them go into the Pale and hear what the people say of your soldiers, with their horses, and their dogs, and their concubines.'"

The Viceroy Sidney, who had visited Shane's country, wrote: "Tyrone is so well inhabited as no Irish county in the realm was like it." Campion wrote:—

"'O'Neil ordered the North so properly that if any subject could approve the loss of money or goods within the precinct, he would assuredly either force the robber to restitution or at his own cost redeeme the harme to the loser's contentation.'"

The trading relations between Ireland—Irish Ireland, not the Pale—and the Continent form the most interesting and instructive pages in this valuable book. Mrs. Green writes:—

"The imports were rich and various—iron, salt, silks and satins, cloth of gold and embroideries, carpets, wines and spices—all the luxuries of a wealthy country. Irish merchants of the towns were sailing their ships to the chief ports of Europe, and amassing substantial fortunes."

What were the Irish exports? Hides, skins of all kinds, and meat; stone, polished marbles, timber, leather, choice wood for furniture, painting, and sculpture. "Great oaks were felled in successive centuries for the roof of Westminster Hall, for the Palace at Whitehall, for the Dutch Stadthouse at Amsterdam." Linen and cloth were special products of Irish industry, and the former were exported in enormous quantities to foreign nations. Flax was grown everywhere in Ireland.

"Irish friezes formed a good market in France. They passed up the Rhine; Richard II. gave leave to a Cologne merchant to export Irish cloth. At Bruges and Antwerp, and the Irish establishments in the Brabant fairs, the Irish sold both a low-priced cloth and the famous serges, Irish cloaks, and linen sheets. The trade was so large that when foreign cloth was forbidden a clamour arose from all the poor in the Netherlands to be allowed still to buy the cheap cloth and linen, Irish cloaks and Scot kerseys; and Archduke Philip gave orders that these cloths from Ireland and Scotland and elsewhere should be freely sold as before by the strangers frequenting the country and occupied in the trade."

The Irish Seas abounded in fish, and a famous trade was carried on by Irishmen and foreigners. The Irish Seas swarmed with French and Spanish and English vessels, and the wealth which the trade produced enriched Ireland and excited the easily aroused jealousy of her English neighbour. Of all the foreigners who visited the Irish coasts the English were alone unwelcome, for they tried to interfere with the free exercise of the industry, passing an Act of Parliament "to forbid any strangers from fishing on the Irish shores without licence." The following extract is characteristic of the times:—

"O'Sullivan, Prince of Bear and Bantry, ruled over a people who lived by fishing, and had his native fleet: when an English ship seized a Spanish fishing vessel off the coast he manned a small squadron, brought both ships to Bearhaven, hanged the English captain, and set the other free."

There were skilled craftsmen and artificers, the excellence of whose work was seen in the mansions and castles and churches which rose in the land. The charm of the Irish home and family, the courtesy, the culture, chivalry, and hospitality of the Irish chief, the softness of manners, fascinations of life, the freedom, ease, and pleasantries of society, the bravery of the men, the beauty and virtue of the women, won the hearts of the Norman settlers, and soon made them more Irish than the Irish themselves. The blood of the Geraldines and the blood of the O'Neils mingled, and the fusion of Norman and Celt promised a great future for a consolidated Irish nation. But the wars of Elizabeth, and the persecutions, plantations, and confiscations which followed destroyed everything, arrested the civilisation of the country, and accomplished the ruin of the people. Mrs. Green, in a notable passage, has summarised the story of the wanderings of Irishmen in ancient, medieval, and modern times. The passage is an epitome of Irish history:—

"There have been three periods in which Ireland has poured out her people over the sea. The great and singular missionary movement, when for 500 years (600-1100) Irishmen were dispersed over England and the Continent in the cause of religion and learning, has been to some extent studied by historians. With the spread of Christianity the missionary work came to a natural close: Irish scholars still studied and taught in the universities of Europe, but there was a new dispersion, of which the records have not been sought out nor the history written, when for some five hundred years (1100-1600) Irish merchants wandered over Europe, taking a peaceable part in the new progress of manufactures and international trade. These movements had enriched the land from which they sprung; they had broadened its culture and its wealth. But the violent suppression of Irish commerce and industry under Elizabeth opened a last phase of emigration—the dispersion of a people outlawed and exiled, whose hopeless banishment could only herald the death of their country. The lament of the first great exile has been the prophetic story of his race in its later days:—

"'There is a grey eye
That looks back upon Ireland.
It will never see afterwards
Ireland's men, nor her women.'"

Mrs. Green's account of Irish trade and industries during the Plantagenet period will be a surprise to English readers. Her account of Irish educational learning will be a surprise too. The trading relations between Ireland and the Continent were remarkable. The intellectual intercourse was equally remarkable. Irish scholars were as well known as Irish merchants in France and the Netherlands, in Italy and Spain. Nor were they strangers even in England. The business intercourse between Celt and Norman in Ireland made it necessary for the Irish to know English law and English ways; and accordingly Irish students flocked to Oxford and the London Inns of Court.

Mrs. Green writes:—

"So it came about that Oxford, Cambridge, the London Inns of Court, were thronged with Irish students, graduates, serjeants, apprentices of the law. Oxford had no sooner risen to the dignity of Studium Generale, or University with a Chancellor, than students flocked to it from all the four provinces of Ireland in such numbers as to form one of the most important 'Southern nations' of the University. There was already an Yrysshemanstrete, an Ireland Meadow in the west of South Bridge, an Irishman's Mile belonging to Brasenose, an Irishman's Pool and Piscaria in Holywell. Irish scholars gathered in 'the Ancient Patrikehall'—'Aula Hibernorum'; there were halls set apart for law students—Aula Aquilæ, or Hyron Hall, Vine Hall, Aristotle Hall, Coventry Hall, and others were either Irish or enrolled Irish students—de la Schield Hall, la Chymney Hall, Dunstan, and some of the old neighbouring halls, while the ancient Bovina or Buf Hall was inhabited by Irish clerks. Some of these Irish scholars rose to posts of importance, as Master Mody of Hibernia, Principal of Ape Hall, and Master Laurence of Hibernia, Principal of St. Andrew's Hall, and Richard FitzRalph, born in Dundalk, who was Chancellor of the University."

Mr. Richey, the Irish historian, once said that Irish writers were fond of charging English statesmen with tyranny and violence. "But,' said Mr. Richey in effect, "that is not the charge I bring against them. I only charge them with imbecility." One would suppose that English statesmen would have been glad to encourage friendly intercourse between English and Irish. The true policy of the conqueror is assuredly to draw the conquered towards him by bonds of justice and sympathy. But imbecility has been the keynote of English rule in Ireland all the time. The Irish students were driven from England by Henry IV. and Henry V. It was thought that they might learn too much and use their knowledge to injure the English interests in Ireland. Henry VIII., wiser in his generation, adopted different tactics, and tried to tempt Irish students to visit English schools. But it was too late. The chasm which separated the two nations had grown wider and wider; and the English policy of the three centuries which followed the wars of Elizabeth has left a heritage of international hatred which, it may be, no man can obliterate. But without more ado we must send our readers direct to Mrs. Green's valuable work. She has written a great book, vindicating the character and genius of her nation, and recording home truths for those who have eyes to read and minds to learn.

THE OUTLOOK FOR ENGLISH FICTION.

While our British drama is stirring its disused members within the tight commercial toils that have contracted its development for many generations it may be of interest to consider the outlook before its younger, more fortunate sister, Fiction. More fortunate, because Fiction, though not popularly recognised as a serious art, has, unlike Drama, always been practised with seriousness by the best English novelists. From Fielding to Meredith, the achievement of the leaders has been to mirror the life and spirit of their generation, and in furtherance of this aim the novel has been developed as the most flexible artistic instrument we possess, an instrument unmatched by its commanding reach, breadth, and subtlety for the representation and criticism of modern life. The trouble is, and has always been, that the majority of educated Englishmen have so crude an artistic sense that they fail to appreciate the rare sincere creation, or to recognise the highly original performance. At the sunset of his career an illustrious figure, such as Meredith, receives, indeed, the conventional honors of public tribute, but his work has stood isolated, little esteemed, and little affecting the mental life of society. This Philistine temperament of the practical-minded Englishman does not, it is true, succeed in suppressing the strongest and most original creative talents, such as Samuel Butler's. But it isolates many, and depresses others, and in the general confusion of good and bad standards of art many fine and rare talents are but dimly recognised. Had Leonard Merrick, for example, been born in France, his brilliancy, wit, pathos, and keen insight into life would have made his name a household word no less than Alphonse Daudet's. But for every six Englishmen that have heard of "Tartarin," we doubt whether one has heard of "Conrad in Quest of his Youth." And had Joseph Conrad chosen to sail in the French instead of the English marine his stories of exotic lands, no less than Pierre Loti's, stamped by the approval of the French Academy, would have reached every cultivated Frenchman, whereas in England———. It is only in England that the flashing irony and human sympathy of the author of "Thirteen Stories," that the wild charm and deep, passionate tenderness of the author of "Green Mansions" and "El Ombù" could fail to stir the imagination of the intelligent public. It is only England that could produce the poetic realism of "Amaryllis at the Fair," and let it lie neglected, while the author of "All Sorts and Conditions of Men" seeks to find excuse for the book's creation. We can show, indeed, a surprising array of original talents, but talents isolated, with ideas and ideals strikingly divorced from the people's life, talents that are soon overlaid and buried by the ever shifting, inexhaustible sands of mediocrity.

Were a sociological map of the British population to be colored to show what particular sections of the life of the community have been adequately treated by modern novelists, we should find that the work of ninety-five per cent. of the latter (themselves of middle-class extraction) sets forth in amazing variety the middle-class themes, atmospheres, tones, and problems of about two million people. The life of the thirty-eight millions is scarcely examined, except in certain examples of "local color fiction." We have only to think of the exceptional case of George Gissing, and his drab-colored paintings of the lower middle-class Londoner, and of his few followers, Edwin Pugh, Arthur Morrison, and Pett Ridge, to realise how effectually the great barrier of class shuts out the life of the democracy from our novelists' vision. The success of Mr. Galsworthy in "The Man of Property" and "The Country House," illustrates how rarely do our novelists show the breadth of view or philosophic grasp of the French realists, in their social outlook. They fail, unlike Thackeray, to see their class as a whole, or the larger significance of the stratified layers of class interests and class prejudices. Hilaire Belloc's "Mr. Burden," was, for instance, the only novel that satirized the social changes in our midst that helped to engineer the Transvaal war, and we may suggest to Mr. Chesterton that his talent might find material lying nearer to hand than that utilised in "The Napoleon of Notting Hill." Mr. H. G. Wells, the most audacious critic of our social institutions, is probably the only novelist we have who can penetrate the dense mass of the general public by his brilliant lighting up of the social problems now facing our democracy. What makes the average English novel, however, inferior to Continental fiction is that our writers assess character and conduct less by broad human standards than by parochial or suburban tests. The Englishman's love of "appearances" at all costs, is, perhaps, the national disease. In the work of such a typical English novelist, as Mrs. Humphrey Ward, we find aristocratic bias and moral strenuousness in league to discount feminine insight and intellectual breadth; in the work of Rudyard Kipling we see extraordinary powers of observation bound to the wheels of an extravagant Imperialism. The serious humanity and spirituality of Thomas Hardy did not save him from the misunderstanding of the finest of his tragic works, "Jude the Obscure." And we cannot deny that the want of truthfulness with which problems of sex are regarded in middle-class England reacts unfavorably on the work of our novelists, who may be salacious or suggestive but not sincere. What weighs on our novelists with even greater pressure is the optimistic idealism which has the greatest aversion for any picture of life that is sombre, tragic, or even uncompromising. This mental temper of our average reader makes directly for lack of depth in our novelists, and we have only to glance through the newspapers to see how little the dark, ironic side of life, the sin, the suffering, the tragedy of the modern world, find their rightful place in the work of the English novelist. While we equal the Continental schools in studies of character, and perhaps excel them in the variety and originality of our novels of domestic life, we are far inferior in the novel of psychological analysis.

Dare we hope for a more unflinching gaze at the realities of life, from the younger school of writers? The question is one of popular pseudo-realism versus true realism, and false romanticism versus true romanticism. Current literature reflects very faithfully the feeling of the day, and the dominant class of reader now asks only to be amused and distracted, and to have his prejudices and illusions respected. Should our national prosperity have to meet the rude shock of a European war, or grave peril to any part of the Empire, we should immediately see arrive a far more serious school of writers to interpret for us the handwriting on our walls. It would be superfluous to name in this connection our most popular novelists, such as Mr. Anthony Hope, Mr. Stanley Weyman, Sir Conan Doyle, Mr. Marion Crawford, Sir Gilbert Parker, Mr. A. E. W. Mason, &c., but we may express the hope that with the newcomers of great promise, such as Mr. Masefield, Mr. E. M. Forster, Mr. Perceval Gibbon, Mr. John Ayscough, Mr. Ashton Hilliers, Mr. W. B. Maxwell, Mr. H. N. Dickinson, Mr. Thurston, Mr. J. C. Snaith, Mr. Booth, Miss C. A. Dawson Scott, to mention only a few, that truth to nature and intellectual courage may be found less displeasing to the English palate than a decade ago. One of the most encouraging signs of our time is to be found in the increasing activity of feminine talent in the field of fiction. After Thomas Hardy's pictures of Wessex life, we must place Mrs. Mann's realistic East Anglian novels. Mrs. Gertrude Bone has revealed in her two works on Lancashire peasant life a more earnestly spiritual, if narrower, field of vision than Mr. Quiller Couch's Cornish studies, or Mr. J. S. Fletcher's Yorkshire stories. Mrs. Dudeney's naturalistic vignettes of Sussex farm folk are indubitably as genuine as Mr. James Prior's and Mr. George Bartram's vigorous sketches of life in the Midlands. In the satirical novel of manners Miss MacNaughtan is quite as successful as Mr. Percy White, Mr. Archibald Marshall, or Mr. Paul Newman. Miss Barlow, Miss Lawless, and the Misses Findlater are the equal of their countrymen Mr. Birmingham, Mr. Shan Bullock, and Mr. Neil Munro. The four clever women writers on American life, Miss Elizabeth Robins, Miss Van Vorst, Miss Margery Williams, and Miss Anne Douglas Sedgwick, hold their own with such clever studies of Transatlantic valuations as Mr. Ford Hueffer's "An English Girl." Miss Sinclair and Miss Evelyn Underhill show as much power of incisive insight and more spiritual delicacy than Mr. W. F. Maugham, Mr. Arnold Bennett, and Mr. Howard Sturgis. Mrs. Barbara Baynton's tales of Bush life in Australia are artistically more powerful than anything Mr. Marriott Watson or Mr. Morley Roberts have given us, though the latter are far superior in fertility and range. Mrs. Steel has shown workmanship as brilliant as Mr. Maarten Maartens, and Mrs. Margaret Woods and Mr. Maurice Hewlett are alike masters in their own genre.

The list of women novelists is by no means exhausted by the names of Miss Dolf Wyllard, Mrs. Belloc Lowndes, Miss Montrésor, Miss Violet Hunt, Mrs. M. E. Francis,

GRANT RICHARDS NOVELS

AUNT MAUD

This new novel by Ernest Oldmeadow, the author of "Susan," is just ready. In "Aunt Maud" he goes back to the method and manner of "Susan," and the public—the public of two continents who delighted so much in that fragrant romance—will delight equally in this." With frontispiece in colour. 6s.

CAPTAIN MARGARET

"An heir to Stevenson," says The Nation of John Masefield, whose new novel "Captain Margaret" is just ready. "Mr. Masefield is a poet fortified with a seaman's knowledge and experience, and where Stevenson, as an amateur, failed with his sea romances, our author succeeds. . . . Mr. Masefield has written a brilliant romance of a rare spiritual beauty . . . rare and exquisite." Price 6s.

CAPTAIN MARGARET

The Daily Telegraph says of it: "Kingsley would have liked this story and so would Robert Louis Stevenson. It is indeed essentially original . . . a splendid story. Real life beats in every corner of it, and the tale is told with a brisk and sunny vigour which is always full of vitality and never falls short of distinction." Get your copy to-day. 6s.

A COMMENTARY

By John Galsworthy, author of "The Country House," &c. The Daily Telegraph says, "He describes the things he sees with consummate power . . . If only enough people could see and feel things as Mr. Galsworthy sees and feels them, we should be far on the road to amelioration." 3s. 6d.

LOVE'S SHADOW

Mrs. Leverson's new novel is already in its second edition. The Spectator says, "It has inspired at least one reviewer with the desire to read it again before the year is out. . . . Nothing to sear the heart nor perplex the understanding." With coloured frontispiece. 6s.

THE JAPANESE SPY

A Novel of Japanese Life, by Lancelot Lawton.

"Mr. Lawton's book rings uncommonly true. . . . The account of the Lourdes of the East, and the vivid picture of the storming of Port Arthur, are striking bits of an exceedingly pithy and absorbing novel." —The Observer. With coloured frontispiece by Frank Haviland. 6s.

THE BLACK BAG

"Mr. Louis J. Vance has surpassed himself," says the Morning Post of "The Black Bag." "It is not only a story that cannot be left for an instant, but it also contains some quite Stevensonian touches . . . . there are breathless pursuits and equally breathless flights." With 10 illustrations. 6s.

THE HEART LINE

By Gelett Burgess, author of "The White Cat," &c.

"The interest of the book centres in a group of spiritualistic mediums, clairvoyants, and fortune-tellers and he has shown them to us with a power and vividness that mark him as a novelist of no common stamp." —The Westminster Gazette. With ten illustrations. 6s.

GRANT RICHARDS, LONDON

Miss Netta Syrett, Mrs. Stepney Rawson, and Miss Coleridge, who can hold their own with any additional men we can name except Mr. William De Morgan. We will not speak of Mrs. Edith Wharton, since she, like her master, Mr. Henry James, is, we understand, of American birth. The rise of a remarkable school of women novelists in France has lately been commented on by a "Times" critic, and we have only to cite the titles of "Wuthering Heights" and "Pride and Prejudice" to prove that in the field of romance as in the field of realism, feminine genius can show artistic originality equal to that of the men.

A COMB OF HONEY.*

How shall poetry be modern? is a question the wise would leave unanswered. But it may safely be asserted that the usefulness of poetry to its own time is of two kinds: either to draw out from the present's "measureless grossness and the slag" those qualities which will most vitally affect the next formation of society, as a magnet draws filings of iron from out a heap of dirt; or to flatter our dust-annoyed mouths with unwonted and delicious relishes. To the first belong (in intention, at least) such writings as those of Mr. Meredith, Mr. Carpenter, or Mr. Davidson; of the second kind Michael Field's "Wild Honey from Various Thyme" is a rarely pleasant example. Judicious users of honey know that all other varieties must give way to that which comes from thyme, for it has a race of aromatic wildness which surprises the palate far more than the most penetrating sweetness. There is a similar quality very evident to the taste in this aptly named book of honey—a sort of unusual process of thought, betrayed not only in unfamiliar treatments of old legends, but also in fresh and heady flavors in the verbal substance.

The book consists of a great number of short poems on a great number of themes; but it is a book—not an adventitious collection fumbled up into one binding. It is a complete and personal whole, and therefore truly a book, just as "Hesperides" and "Silex Scintillans" are books. The critical device of dividing matter from manner is clumsy and false, for there is really no such division possible in any poetry worth the name; but as long as it is recognised to be only a critical device, comparable to the way mathematicians treat of motion apart from force and of force apart from motion, it is perhaps allowable. It is certainly convenient. The matter, then, of these poems is widely various; but in most it is a fine statement of that innocence which Blake demanded—the capacity to see a heaven in a wild flower. The poet must be thus far pantheist, that to him "there is no great and no small." But if this refusal to discriminate is deliberated, and not innocent, it becomes preciosity; and it must be confessed that occasionally in "Wild Honey" this sin appears. These lines on "Camellias" are an instance:—

> "And one of them—how lovely in her mode!—
> One of them had the magic power to die;
> Slid from the stem where she abode
> With mournful violence: her petals lie,
> Broke on the sudden from their mass, and all
> The action stately as a funeral."

As counteraction to that, however, consider this exquisite interpretation of the botanist's "sporadic albinism"—the strange pallor that sometimes blanches individual flowers of a species usually well colored; to the poet's delicate fantasy, it is that some flowers in a "white madness" become "distraught, made very bashful by the sun":—

> "Thus a gold daffodil grows white and dumb,
> Trembling a little; even for this cause
> 'Mid lusty forest hyacinths a'hum,
> One silver cluster into light withdraws;
> * * * *
> "And there beside are violets, so shy
> They would not bear the name we love them by,
> That in white madness, witless and undone,
> Creep through unhaunted hedgerows to the sun."

Towards the end of the book comes a group of poems closely akin to those we have just been describing. That wonderful and reverend thing, the love of a dog for a man, Michael Field here salutes with a more intent admiration, a finer muster of poetic powers, than most singers give to their mistresses. A welcome to an arriving Chinese dog begins thus splendidly:—

> "Jasper and jacinth, amber and fine gold,
> The topaz, ruby, the fire opal, grey
> And lucent agate covered thee with glory,
> O Eastern Prince, from fuming China hoary,
> That on thy orient rug celestial lay,
> Thy coat a web of treasure manifold."

And there are three more verses of worship suitable for an Eastern Prince, of large thought and rich image. The death of this dog calls forth a lament in which occurs this poignant verse:—

> "If I should wander on till time had close
> Thee with thy shuffled paws I should not find:
> No chasm, nor any heinous shadow knows
> Thy haunt, nor may I fear thee left behind."

It is matter for thanks that the relationship of dog and man is here treated with frank seriousness and reverence, not in the usual half-humorous, arch, apologetic way. As result, one cannot help loving the dogs that Michael Field loves.

Antique legends and religious ideas—mainly Greek, some Egyptian, a few Celtic—have much place in the book; and their treatment shows a faculty of absorbing them till they become almost as intimate as they were to those who had them for the foundation of their thought. Consequently, the modifications they are made to undergo seem, while one reads, natural and inevitable. Mention must also be made of the four "Royal Sonnets" dealing with the story of David, of which two are fine achievements in static drama; the first, wherein beneath his father's kiss the "thief's face" of Absalom glitters—

> "Sniffing at the gems
> Of the bent crown as they were cassia-stems"; and the fourth, wherein the old king sits between "hoar-snooded" Bathsheba's imperiousness and Abishag's not undeserved contempt. These two are worthy pendants to Peele's great play.

As to the manner of these poems, it may perhaps be described as the expression of a keen spiritual vigor, and a power to capture rare and elusive moods and innermost sensations. For example, we find uprising Day described as—

> "Scouring our very souls, as trumpeter
> The inside of his trumpet, to confer
> A brilliancy on our wide blasts of joy."

That is surely a noble invention. Or, again, we have old age—

> "Quiet as a plough laid at the furrow's end"; or that kind of human beauty which cannot be attributed to any excellence of feature, due neither to—

> "Conference of the temples and the brow, > Nor marge nor parting of the trembled lips."

but which surrounds a face—

> "As finest air a-quiver with the heat."

And here is a sonnet that, once read, will not easily be forgotten:—

> "Who art thou, Aspic of the dazzled eyes,
> And swaying as a drunkard from his drink?
> Seaward thou glidest, in the sea to sink,
> A sacred alien, a sacrifice.
> Who hath devoted thee? What hast thou done?
> That wound is as a jewel 'mid thy scales;
> Thy forkéd tongue still tenderly assails.
> As some amazing honor thou had'st won,
> As thou wert stricken by too vast a doom,
> And to the gods must recommend thy plight,
> Thou foamest through the sand. Back to a tomb
> I follow thy fresh steps. Ah, there in sight
> The golden spindle that devised thy wound,
> And Cleopatra marvellously swooned!"

The lips of Comatas might have been glad of such a honey-drop as that last line.

It is said that "Michael Field" is the name under which two ladies choose to write. That is none of the critic's business; but it is his business to point out "Wild Honey from Various Thyme" as a book of singular beauty.

THE TEMPLE OF ART.*

THE first volume of "A History of Art," translated by Miss Alice Todd from the Italian of Dr. G. Carotti, and revised by Mrs. S. Arthur Strong, deals with the art of the Ancients. In her prefatory note Mrs. Strong points out that certain illustrations have been substituted for those in the Italian edition, and draws attention to some points on which the author's data differ from those now generally current; but whatever may be the importance of these discrepancies, they hardly affect the total value of a work that, considering the vastness of its scope, is more complete in its facts and deductions than any that has hitherto found its way into our language. Since, during the period covered, art and architecture had not become divorced, but were practically interdependent, a great deal of the book is purely architectural. Dr. Carotti's literary method is, in a sense, architectural also. His piecemeal plan of construction suggests that of a builder engaged in the erection of a mighty temple. Beginning with the foundations, to which the Oriental arts of ancient Egypt and Chaldea may be said to correspond, he adds stone by stone until his edifice assumes noble proportions in the earlier classical art of Greece, and reaches its consummation in the golden age of Pericles. Hellenistic art, the efflorescence of the Hellenic, comes later. Out of it that of Rome is evolved; one might regard the latter as an important wing added to a structure already complete in itself. Cornices and ornamentation, even supporting columns and entablatures—to carry on the architectural parallel—are contributed by other countries in other ages, until the whole stands out, a great rich monument against the sky—a monument not merely to human skill, but to humanity itself.

It is a truism that the history of art is that of nations, and that it is only from what was built, sculptured, or painted before the age of writing that we can learn some of the secrets of a long-dead past. This book, however, renders invaluable service in making the truism more true. Within its two broad divisions of Oriental and classical art are contained short but eloquent histories of Egypt and Asia Minor, the Persian Empire, Greece and Magna Graecia, Etruria and Rome, in so far that the arts of all these reflect in varying degree the life of their peoples as well as the majesty of their kings and the pomp of their priesthoods. In all, or nearly all, art outlived the political life of the nation who practised it. Egypt, where it began with the Memphite period and the pyramids, retained in her heathen temples most of the outward and visible signs of her art impulse until as late as 393 A.D., when Theodosius ordered all such temples throughout the Roman Empire to be closed. Greek art flourished for long after the country's political downfall, and in its Hellenistic phases invaded and almost, if not completely, conquered Rome. Roman art is, perhaps, the greatest of the exceptions to this general longevity. It was the art of the Empire, and may be said to have lived and died with the Empire, to have reached its apex and declined to its decadence and final extinction before the onslaught from the North. And here, remembering Mrs. Strong's own views on Roman art, we may interpolate those of Dr. Carotti, as they are expressed in a very simple comparison on p. 255. After a brief summary of its formation and characteristics he adds: "We cannot, however, conceal the fact that, if we put Greek art and Roman art together, and contemplate them, as it were, side by side, the former will appear to us the image of the youthful maturity of a great people (the Graeco-Italic people) the latter of its robust but somewhat late maturity. In the one there is the smile of youth, in the other the thoughtfulness of later years. When at last, at the end of the ancient world, this thoughtfulness lost its vigor and finally disappeared, the smile of Greek art was not yet spent, it was still radiant."

That "smile" of Greek art is still radiant and, if it does not prove the Greek's superior merit over every other in the world, including that of Rome, it does suggest a reason for his ancient and modern popularity. Dr. Carotti, however, pays full tribute to what was truly great and national in Roman art, though he voices the very general opinion that it is on architecture that the Romans have left "the clearest and most characteristic imprint of their splendid, and at the same time so practical, genius," and reminds us that the spiral sculptures of the Trajanic and other columns were anticipated in the Alexandrian reliefs. To return to the matter of longevity in the art of nations, the duration of Egyptian art was far greater even than that of Greece. But to the modern mind there is this important difference between the two that, whereas the art of ancient Egypt has been dead for two thousand years, and to-day contains for us no elements of artistic life, that of Greece, more particularly that part which centres round Pheidias, is as fresh and living to-day as when it found expression. Greek art discovered the elixir of eternal youth. The Egyptians built up a great art slowly and laboriously, and the monuments of it survive. But they are not monuments that can quicken the senses to life as can the monuments of good Greek sculpture. Their immortality has proved itself less truly immortal.

Dr. Carotti deals very thoroughly with Greek art. He shows how here, as in all great movements of national self-expression, architecture took the lead, while sculpture and painting followed comparatively slowly in the rear. The Doric order, the first in Greek architecture, reached its vigorous maturity in the archaic age, while the cult of physical human beauty, that controlled the sculpture of the perfect period, was still in infancy. The less robust Ionic followed upon that, and lastly came the more graceful form of Ionic, the Corinthian, a product of the general efflorescence of art in the fourth century B.C. Sculpture was mainly developed by two schools, the Peloponnesian and the Attic, and it is worthy of note that, though the former produced most of the great artists who made the Greek tradition what it is, it was the Attic school that gave birth to its greatest genius, Pheidias. From the latter to Scopas, Praxiteles, Pergamon, and the whole host of Hellenistic masters, the course of Greek art is traced with scrupulous exactitude. The special attention paid to this subject need not, however, surprise one. Greek art, with the frieze of the Parthenon for its symbol and crown, is the most important thing in all ancient art history. Like that of the Persian Empire, which synthetised practically every other Oriental art, welded them into a national product and added something of its own, Greek art was a derivative from many sources. But what was eclectic in its elements was transformed and modified, as neither the art of Persia nor the later one of Rome was modified, by the truly national genius. When we look at a piece of Roman sculpture we can hardly fail to be reminded of the Greek, and old Persian art almost inevitably carries with it a far-away faint odour of Assyria or Egypt. But a good Greek sculpture recalls nothing but the Greek, though, historically speaking, we know it to have been largely based on the Aegean. Dr. Carotti briefly suggests the reasons, climatic and ethnological, for this perfect triumph of Greek art over its ancestry, and the whole section, with its numerous illustrations and detailed classification, should be studied by the British reader as a concise and illuminating commentary on what Dr. Ernest Gardner and other scholars have already written upon the same subject. From a literary point of view the book lacks the picturesqueness that distinguishes Professor Muther's histories of painting, Signor Molmenti's of Venice, and certain other works by distinguished foreign writers of to-day, but one must remember that there is not much room for picturesque writing in a faithful survey of several thousands of years, when confined within 350 short pages. We are grateful accordingly for the soundly handled account of ancient art that it presents; for a detailed picture of the temple of art, with Greek art as its corner-stone.

Josephine, under the argus eyes of the Rev. Gerald St. Lawrence, rector of Cullyfracky, a widower, famously well connected and ill-tempered, is unfortunately true to the traditions of generations of Irish "quality." Monotonous days passed in isolation, with no duties or amusements, the years passing swiftly with no outlook for the girls, who are finally forced out into the world to try and earn a living, for which they are totally unfitted—all this Miss Mayne sketches with a relentlessly sure touch. The figure of Josephine, "a volcanic little being," early chilled into old-maidish frigidity by her ignorance of life, her proud isolation, her uselessness, is capitally drawn, and the analysis of the kindly plebeian Dr. Morrogh's blundering wooing of her, and of the girl's frozen scorn and shuddering disdain, is masterly. Remarkably ably drawn, too, in the sequel thirty years later, is the situation developed in the Maryon household, between the girls Christabel and Rosamund, and their married sister, Mrs. Leigh, when the latter knows that her "affair" with Major Secretan has been discovered. The author has a remarkable faculty of divining the finest shades of feminine emotion, whether of girlhood, wifehood, motherhood, or spinsterhood, and with veiled irony she makes her men characters move throughout the story in profound ignorance, for the most part, of the significant feminine dramas enacted under their noses. Miss Mayne writes a clever but elliptic style, and her novel is so elusive in feeling that it needs all the mental alertness a reader can bring to bear on it.

Miss Willcocks has put so much patient observation, active imagination, and cultured philosophising into her vivid picture of peasant life on the north coast of Devon ("A Man of Genius." John Lane, 6s.), that it may seem a little ungrateful if we hint that in art the half is greater than the whole. No doubt she herself recognises that there is a curious cleavage between the simple, but shrewd, philosophy of her humble farming and fishing folk, and the amateurish and highly artificial mental atmosphere by which their doings and sayings are put on record. And, feeling this, she has invented the figure of Damaris Westaway, a type of the glorified ideal of suburban culture, to act as a natural channel by which the outlook of villager and novelist can meet and be reconciled. At least one half of the matter in the book has the note of reality, and the other half, that presents to us Ambrose Velly, the man of genius, and Damaris, and her philosophic speculations, is strained and unnatural. Many of the little descriptions of the North Devon coast, of farmhouse and fishing village life, have the air of clever sketches from life, and, more than this, some of the rural characters, such as old Mrs. Velly and Thyrza Braund, are deftly portrayed. The complex relations, too, between the two girls, Thyrza and Damaris, who each love the same man, Ambrose, and their skilful juggling with their feelings in consequence, are also quite true to life, but Miss Willcocks has fallen into the mistake of making Damaris such a noble and superior young person, and one so prone to improving every occasion by her highly intellectual comments, that it is with difficulty we endure her company. The sharpest criticism of that young lady's high-flown idealism is, in reality, called for in every chapter, and the author would have scored a distinct success if she had reversed her moral and shown how inappropriate are the words of culture when used to comment on the hard realities of working folk's lives.

In "My Son and I" (George Allen, 6s.), Mrs. M. H. Spielmann has had the happy idea of writing the domestic chronicle of a sweet, quiet, and patient woman, who is old-fashioned enough to live for her joy in her son, from the days of his babyhood till he is grown-up and married, a woman who, herself, remains quite young in spirit when her grandchild is old enough to patronise her. The account of her son's love affairs, of his flirtations with the girls whom she, his mother, dreads, and of his indifference for Dulcie, the girl on whom she has set her heart on his marrying, is natural and charming, and there is a restful domesticity in this picture of a little Victorian circle which recalls the flavour of Miss Thackeray's novels. Mrs. Spielmann, of course, does not possess the latter's haunting charm and tender mellowness of style, but she writes with a simplicity and ease that are very pleasing. The book is one that will appeal particularly to English people who are exiled or domiciled abroad, and it will conjure up for them visions of particular English country homes and gardens sleeping in July sunshine, with thrushes calling near, and the fresh echo of young voices from the tennis lawn below the house.

On the title-page of "The Flemings" (Smith, Elder, 6s.) the authors have set the very pertinent motto, "He gave them their desire and sent leanness withal into their souls." Roger Fleming is one of thousands of painters who can neither express themselves in their art to their own satisfaction or find contentment within the limits of their power. Married to a delicate wife, and settled down in an ideal country home, "The Old Hall," at Everleigh, Roger soon finds that he has a sense of loss of power. Shut up in his comfortable surroundings he drifts insensibly into painting potboilers on sporting subjects, because they sell, and when his wife points out to him that he cannot have everything, that he used to hate his old feverish Bohemian life, with his fits of depression and inspiration, without comfort or leisure or home pleasure, Roger can only reply that he will get back his lost powers or that he will be miserable for life. Art points in one direction and domestic duty in the other, and our authors trace with considerable skill the mental paralysis that falls on the man when he at last determines to sacrifice his art. Years pass, and a big fortune falls to Roger's lot, but he discovers that the responsibilities and duties of wealth bring him more trouble than pleasure, that he was "far happier as a student with a few francs in his pocket, and far happier wrestling with his painting in Brittany and Everleigh." Into Roger's further development as a man and a father we must leave the reader to enquire for himself, but we may say that the merit of the novel lies in the neat readjustments of the hero's mental focussing of life, and the change of his valuations and ideals at the successive stages of his career.

There is considerable imaginative power shown in Mr. Clegg's romance of French convict life in New Caledonia ("The Bishop's Scapegoat." John Lane, 6s.). The first and last chapters of the book in which the plot is outlined and wound up show the characteristic weakness of English fiction, sensational improbability, but we are fain to confess that the body of the narrative is on a much higher level, and that its exciting pages are rich in incident and dramatic force. The best figure in the story is that of the convict Cacalouche, whose fertility and resource in his daring escape from the convict settlement, and his outwitting of the pursuing Canaques are worthy of a Napoleonic soldier of the Old Guard. Mr. Clegg's sketch of the generous-hearted "Madame," who shelters Cecile, the castaway heroine, after her escape with Cacalouche and "Papa" Bertrand in an open boat, to the Queensland coast, proves that he has a good eye for character, and had he cut out of the framework of his story the unconvincing figures of Miss Betty and her brother, the English Bishop, who, having strangled the villainous Marquis de Remusat, lets an innocent man suffer for his crime, we should have little fault to find with his romance. The story is not constructed on a good model, but for his descriptive powers and dramatic instinct the author merits hearty praise.

There is a recklessness in the Irishman's blood which makes social intercourse with him for his cautious, self-controlled English neighbours somewhat of a terror. In literature, as in life, this quality has the power of leaping social obstacles and annihilating fine-drawn distinctions, of fusing reality and romance, so as to nonplus the cool-headed onlooker. In "The White Wedding," by M. P. Shiel (Werner Laurie, 6s.), this dashing quality exists in excelsis in the character of the hero, the gamekeeper Shan. Sceptical people may deem this portrait of an Irishman a caricature, but the picture, though a glorified one, is fundamentally true to Irish nature. Shan and Arthur Gordrige, the young master of Glanncourt, are both madly in love with the sweet and arch girl Rosie, and after a Homeric fight between them, in which Arthur is worsted, the latter goes off to the Transvaal War, Shan vowing to "look after" Rosie for him till he returns. Only an Irishman could be capable of Shan's ingenious device of first marrying an old hag and then going through a mock marriage with Rosie in order to keep troth with his absent master. Rosie, only a wife in name, is naturally piqued by her husband's coldness, and after bringing her battery of arts to bear, falls as much in love with Shan as he, despite his self-sacrifice, is with her. Arthur, on his return, thrashes Shan at sight for "basely robbing him of Rosie, and affairs are only straightened out by Rosie's declaration that she hates Arthur and that life is no good to her without Shan." Despite the apparent extravagance of the plot, the novel is a vigorous and enticing piece of work, and one capitally adapted for holiday reading.

"The Dual Heritage," by Mabel Godfrey-Faussett (Grant Richards, 6s.), traces for us with more or less skill the life story of two sisters, Barbara and Mona Mallory, who inherit, in varying degree, the strain of spiritual longing for righteousness bequeathed them by a Calvinistic mother, and the strong-willed and resolute spirit of a clever and dissipated father. Anne Mallory has been "cold, unresponsive to her husband's courtesies, and colourless to a man of his vivid temperament," and after his death she sums up her experiences thus, "My husband's whole life was unspeakable sin, and mine one long purgatory. I have never loved my children, for they were the seed of degradation, and a shuddering horror to me from their conception." Human nature we know is capable de tout, and it is not surprising after the harsh and gloomy fear of Hell fire with which her unnatural mother strives to poison her life, that Mona, with her wild and sensuous temperament, should react against her cold and stern up-bringing, and follow in her father's footsteps. The author of "A Dual Heritage" shows, in marked degree, that blend of spiritual earnestness and moral intensity which distinguishes the finest puritanic temperament. Endowed with quick feminine sympathy, she paints in her portrait of Barbara an ideal of English womanhood, and the same quality leads her to be a little over-serious in her treatment of her worldly and pleasure-loving types. The novel is, of course, specially designed for those readers who believe in the disciplining of our natures by constant vigilance against the forces of evil influence. And, as such, it is certainly likely to do far more good than most volumes of moral essays.

The central idea of "The Key of the Door," by R. Ramsey (Hutchinson, 6s.), is highly ingenious. The hero of the story, General Rankin, who is lionised in London, after a campaign, as the man "to whose gallantry and daring we owe half Africa," is confronted soon after landing with a certain Lady Mary, who claims with conviction that he is her husband, that, years before, he had married her for her money and had deserted her basely after a few days. The claim appears fantastic and impossible to the General, who has no recollection of having married anybody, but Lady Mary's relatives know that it is so, and recognise the General as the man. In an interview with the grim Mrs. Haggard, Rankin admits that, while the whole situation is incomprehensible to him, he "woke up in hospital thirteen years ago and found them calling me Rankin," which he claims is not his right name, and Mrs. Haggard charitably concludes that the hero has lost his memory through a surgical operation. The manœuvres of fate by which the General is gradually forced into paying court to the woman he is held to have wronged, but whom, in fact, he has never before met in his life, are skilfully outlined, and the reader needs little beguilement, once he has opened the story, to follow it to the last page.

Readers already familiar with "The Human Boy" (those who are not had better go forth instantly and procure it) will rejoice to learn that Mr. Eden Philpotts has issued, under the title of "The Human Boy Again" (Cassell, 6s.), some further chronicles of Dr. Dunstan's school. The new volume is not inferior to the old; it displays the same verve, subtlety, and humour, and beneath the sheer merriment of the stories lies a solid psychological foundation. "The Bolsover Prize," for instance, is not only a clever and amusing study in temperaments, but also an acute piece of criticism. Perhaps "Peters, Detective," which occupies the place of honour, is the most artistically complete of these sketches. Peters, the disciple of Sherlock Holmes, is a delightful youth, and the imbroglio of the prize guinea-pig and the patent pencil sharpener, in which he becomes involved, is, in its way, quite as interesting as any unravelled by his favourite hero. For reading aloud to a young—or, indeed, to a mature—audience, the history of Peters may be confidently recommended. One's enjoyment of it clamours for participation. It also clamours for more of the same kind. Some day, but not too hurriedly, Mr. Philpotts must give us yet a third volume.
